

✓43034

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

<http://archive.org/details/nation135julnewy>

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

43034

==
BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXXXV

JULY 6, 1932, to DECEMBER 28, 1932

==

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET. NEW YORK

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXXV

JULY 6, 1932, to DECEMBER 28, 1932

(Nos. 3496-3521)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
Arc Architecture
C Correspondence
Ct Cartoon
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

Academic freedom
Columbia university retreats from repressive attitude; retrograde step at College of city of New York; EP.... 385
Gallagher, L., forced out of Southwestern university staff for defending political minorities; EP.242; see also C 479
Repression of liberalism at American colleges; E..... 343
Adamic, Louis
War, next; C..... 310
Advertising and radio; Dt..... 309
Aerial warfare. See War Aeronautics
Haizlip flight from Los Angeles to New York in record time; EP..... 223 Agriculture
Balance sheet of an Indiana farmer; E. C.; C..... 83
Plight; EP..... 544
Rebellion. W. Gard; S..... 207
Revolt spreads; EP..... 413
Roosevelt and Hoover views on farm relief. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 280
Wisconsin eviction case; violence used; EP..... 600
Aiken, Conrad
Prelude; P. 15; 85; 127; 231; 507; 565; 648
What I believe; S..... 79
Alcoholic liquor
Butler liquor-control plan; EP..... 294
Alcott, Louisa May
And children's books. S. L. Goldsmith; S..... 510
Alice in wonderland. J. W. Krutch; D.... 654
Aliens. See Deportations
Allen, Albert
On World Jewish congress; C..... 285
Allen, Devere
Appeal to reason; C..... 38
Position on economic questions; C. 457; see also..... 395
Program for revolt, a; S..... 80
Allen, Robert S.
Dismissal by Christian Science Monitor for being coauthor of "Washington merry go-round"; EP..223; see also C 354
Alling, Kenneth Slade
Desert picture; P..... 589
Alper, Max
On socialism; C....105; see also..... 52
Amadell, Mehetabel Thankful
Reasons for voting for Thomas; C.... 401
American civil liberties union
Annual report, "Sweet land of liberty," published; EP..... 183
American federation of labor
And labor racketeers; E..... 69
Convention. J. B. S. Hardman; S..... 615
Foreigner's view of. F. Rager; S..... 614
American legion
Demanding payment of bonus; EP.... 201
Militarism; EP..... 1
Willard Straight post suspended for opposition to bonus; EP..... 67
American madness. A. Bakshy; MP..... 198
American-Russian institute for cultural relations
Lectures on Russia. W. T. Brown; C.. 284
Americana
First number issued; EP..... 341
Anderson, Paul Y.
Articles praised. H. A. Leader; C.... 194
Beer and taxation; sales tax prospects; S 557

Beer bill; no likelihood at present session; S..... 54
Bonus army; death of baby from gassing; S..... 189
Eviction; S..... 138; 280
Eviction defended by F. T. Davison; S 230
In Washington; impending danger; S 102
Investigation of Washington affair needed; S..... 189
Budget, balancing; S..... 280
Business depression; relief bill passed; S 54
Buying California for Hoover; S..... 392
Cabinet members on the stump; S.... 447
Campaign's last mile; S..... 447
Catholics, insulting; S..... 230
Congress, hard-working; S..... 102
Congress, special session; S..... 610
Coolidge, C., elevation to presidency; S. 392
Crisp, C. R., defeat in primary and appointment to tariff commission; S... 331
Curtis, Vice-president, against prohibition repeal; S..... 230
Election results; S..... 504
Farm relief; Hoover and Roosevelt views; S..... 280
Future; S..... 557
Holding companies, attack by J. B. Eastman; S..... 392
Hoover, Herbert; acceptance speech; S.. 188
Attempt to wreck water power act; S. 447
Campaign; S..... 102
English; S..... 230
Errors; S..... 504
Farm relief views; S..... 280
Looking to 1936; S..... 610
Message to congress; S..... 610
Mooney report, suppression charged to Hoover; S..... 447
Mourning becomes Herbert; S..... 280
Saint Lawrence waterway, Hoover refusal to confer with Roosevelt; S... 103
"Turning the tide" for Hoover; S.... 392
Hunger marchers, treatment of; S.... 610
Labor prisoners; C..... 646
Mooney report by Wickersham subcommittee; suppression charged to Hoover; S..... 447
Mussolini wanted; S..... 9
Office seekers; S..... 557
Prohibition repeal, vote on; S..... 610
Radio debunks political conventions; S. 9
Reconstruction finance corporation attempt to buy California for Hoover; S 447
Republican campaign desperation; S... 331
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, nomination; S..... 54
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, turns to progressives; S..... 331
Saint Lawrence waterway; Hoover refusal to confer with Roosevelt; S.... 102
"Turning the tide" for Hoover; S.... 392
War debts; S..... 557
Washington Evening Star; S..... 557
Wilkinson, Judge, promotion prevented; S..... 102
Wisconsin defeat of progressives; S.331; see also C..... 619
Young, Owen D., on "preferred" list of Insulls; S..... 392
Anderson, Sherwood
Appeal for mother of Scottsboro Negro boy; C..... 506
Letter to President Hoover on unemployment and depression; S..... 191
Search for salvation. C. Fadiman; S.. 454
Anglo-Persian oil company. See Persia
Anti-war congress. See War
Ape man
Discovery reported in Sumatra; E.... 3
Appeal to reason
History. D. Allen; C..... 38
Architecture
Bauhaus, closing of. D. Haskell; Arc. 374; see also C..... 533
see also C..... 533
Dishes to break. D. Haskell; Arc.... 44
Grain elevators and houses. D. Haskell; Arc..... 485
News from the field. D. Haskell; Arc. 598
Arctic regions
Soviet ship sails from Europe to Asia; EP..... 469
Arena, the. G. S. Kaufman; S..... 145
Armament limitation and disarmament
British reply to Hoover proposal; EP.. 45
French plans. E. D. H.; S..... 531

French suggestion for European military staff; EP..... 468
Geneva conference:
Adjourns; EP..... 93
Hoover politics at; E..... 5
Optimism over; EP..... 468
Progress at; E..... 117
Sabotage at. R. Dell; S..209; see also C..... 354
Saved by five-power agreement; EP... 599
Petitions ignored. L. H. T. Heyl; C 354; see also..... 209
German and French armies. E. D. H.; S..... 478
German request for permission to arm equally with other powers; E..225; EP..... 267
German request, Hoover's answer; E.. 296
German request, various responses; EP. 488
German warning of increase of its armament; EP..... 114
Herriot plan; E..... 443; E..... 519
Herriot plan; E. D. H.; S..... 607
Hoover proposal opposed abroad; EP.... 20
Japanese naval limitation scheme; EP. 600
League of nations, final test. R. Dell; S 502
Munition makers in way of disarmament or limitation; EP..... 384
Roosevelt, F. D., reported to favor navy reduction; EP..... 580 Arnold, C. P.
Thomas, vote for; C..... 646
Art
Artist in soviet Russia. L. Lozowick; S..... 35
Communism and art; E..... 583
Forms in nature, photographs by K. Blossfeldt; E..... 520
Lesson of; E..... 49
Arvin, Newton
Pessimism, doom of; C..... 126
Ashley-Montagu, M. F.
Comment on criticism of "Breakdown" by S. Hook; C.....36; C..... 170
Auctions, country; Dt..... 479
Ault, Warren O.
League of nations, moral suasion; C.... 171
Auslander, Joseph
But Plato; P..... 214
Strict acre; P..... 85
Austria
Financial dictatorship threatened; EP... 67 Authors
Henpecked; E..... 604
Automobiling; Dt..... 82
Autumn crocus. J. W. Krutch; D..... 577
Autumn in New England; Dt..... 193
Aviation. See Aeronautics
Ayres, Malcolm B.
Asks Union county, New Jersey, readers to meet; C..... 58

B

Babson, Roger W.
Cure for depression; EP..... 629
Views on unemployment; Dt..... 145
Back street. A. Bakshy; MP..... 239
Bacon, Ernst
What is left of Goethe? C..... 12
Bailey, Richard Hughes
Doctor Brinkley of Kansas; S..... 254
Bakshy, Alexander
American madness; MP..... 198
Back street; MP..... 239
Bal, le; MP..... 338
Bill of divorcement, a; MP..... 409
Bring 'em back alive; MP..... 18
Cabin in the cotton; MP..... 409
Conquerors, the; MP..... 576
Dark horse, the; MP..... 18
Dialogue, moving-picture; S..... 151
Doomed battalion, the; MP..... 18
Goona goona; MP..... 338
Horse feathers; MP..... 198
I am a fugitive from a chain gang; MP. 513
If I had a million; MP..... 624
Kameradschaft; MP..... 513
Kid from Spain, the; MP..... 576
Kongo; MP..... 576
Life begins; MP..... 239
Love me tonight; MP..... 239
Mädchen in uniform; MP..... 338
Make me a star; MP..... 63
Million dollar legs; MP..... 111
Most dangerous game, the; MP..... 576
Once in a lifetime; MP..... 513

- Sign of the cross; MP..... 624
 Strange interlude; MP..... 292
 Trouble in Paradise; MP..... 576
 Washington merry-go-round; MP..... 466
 What price Hollywood? MP..... 111
 Bal, le. A. Bakshy; MP..... 338
 Baldwin, Roger N.
   On European writers' anti-war congress; C..... 126
   Recognizes service of Maryland civil liberties committee in E. Lee case; C. 234 Ballyhoo of 1932. H. H.; D..... 266
 Baltimore Sun
   Dismisses D. Pearson, as coauthor of More merry-go-round; EP..223; see also C.....259; C..... 354
 Banks
   Failures continue; EP..... 154
   Red "plot" to destroy banks; EP..... 115
 Barber, Joseph, junior
   Revolt in the middle east; S..... 635
 Bauhaus, closing of. D. Haskell; Arc...374; see also C..... 533
 Beebe, William
   Descent in bathysphere; EP..... 295
 Beer. See Prohibition
 Berg, Samuel M.
   Elect both Hoover and Roosevelt; C.... 258
 Bilevitz, William
   Connecticut needle trades; S..... 475
 Bill of divorcement, a. A. Bakshy; MP.... 409
 Billboards; Dt..... 126
 Billings, Warren K.
   Collins, W., may be pardoned; Billings stays in prison; EP..... 21
   See also Mooney, T. J.
 Bingham, Senator Hiram
   Renamed for senate by Republican reactionaries; EP..... 294
 Biography. J. W. Krutch; D..... 654
 Birth control
   Gaining in Italy, Mrs. Sanger finds; EP. 295
 Black, Forrest Revere
   Prohibition repeal, pending; S..... 428
 Black Tom explosion. See War claims
 Blackman, R. B.
   Asks Manila readers to meet; C..... 57
 Bianshard, Paul
   Action in New York telephone company case; EP..... 321
 Blanshard, Paul, and N. Thomas
   Jimmy Walker; S..... 300
 Blossfeldt, Karl
   Art forms in nature; photographs; E... 520
 Blossom, Frederick A.
   Asks aid for Centralia prisoners' publicity committee; C..... 213
 Blue laws and red blood; E..... 632
 Bodenheim, Maxwell
   Sonnet without words; P..... 460
 Bolivia-Peru
   War over Gran Chaco; EP..... 321
 Boll weevil. See Cotton
 Bonds. See Stocks and bonds
 Bonus. See Veterans
 Books
   Children's, L. M. Alcott and. S. L. Goldsmith; S..... 510
   Children's, list, S. L. Goldsmith; S.... 510
   Fall list..... 376
   Prices; E..... 272
   Workers, appeal for books for. B. Carter; C..... 647
   See also Novels
 Borah, Senator William Edgar
   Will not support Republican prohibition plank; E..... 4
 Borglum, Gutzon, sculpture with dynamite; Dt..... 617
 Bourne, Randolph
   Biographical material sought. D. Teall; C..... 592
 Bow, Long
   China, new crisis in; S..... 143
 Boyd, Ernest
   Irish academy of letters; S..... 590
 Boyd's city dispatch; name lists; EP..... 489
 Boys, homeless and workless; EP..544; EP.. 628
 Bradford, Charles R.
   On socialism; C.....105; see also.... 52
 Brains to rule brawn eventually; Ir on V. F. Calverton's review of "Rebels and renegades," by M. Nomad; C...194; Ir by Nomad..... 258
 Brenner, Anita
   Tampa's reign of terror; S...555; see also C..... 647
 Bridge (card game)
   Contract scoring, changes in; EP..... 441
 Briffault, Robert
   Charity and the state; S..... 30
   Criticism of book, "Breakdown," by S. Hook commented upon. M. F. Ashley-Montagu; N. Morris; R. Briffault; C.....36; see also C..... 170
 Bring 'em back alive. A. Bakshy; MP..... 18
 Brinkley, Doctor John R.
   Campaign for governor of Kansas. R. H. Bailey; S..... 254
 Brinton, Ellen Starr
   Cuba, terror in; C..... 458
 Brite, Mary D.
   Asks Thomas supporters in Cincinnati to organize; C..... 283
 British empire
   Imperial economic conference, at Ottawa; E..... 136
   Agreements increase tariff barriers; EP 384
   And world trade. R. A. MacKay; S 74
   Free trade at Ottawa; E.185; see also C..... 283
   Opens; EP..... 94
   Seeks tariff formula. S. P. Harman; S. 84
 Brookwood labor college
   Help asked; C..... 592
 Brown, William Thurston
   Lectures on Russia by American-Russian institute for cultural relations; C.... 284 Bryne, Woodruff W.
   On Reserve officers' training corps and militarism; C..... 172
 Buda, Mario. See Sacco-Vanzetti
 Budenz, Louis Francis
   Suffering in the mine fields; C..... 561
 Budget. See United States—Finances
 Buell, Raymond Leslie Getting out of Central America; S.... 32
   Hypocrisy and the Philippines; S..... 639
 Bullerjahn, Walther
   Conviction reversed; EP..... 600
 Bunk
   Butler, Borah and bunk; E..... 4
 Burns, Robert, forgotten poet; E..... 24
 Business depression
   Actual conditions worse; EP..... 385
   Babson, Roger W., cure; EP..... 629
   Bootstrap economics; E..... 156
   Causes, as seen by C. H. Douglas. G. Munson, W. A. Nyland, and J. Rior-dan; C..... 311
   Crises, cause and cure. B. Watson; U. Sinclair; C..... 83
   Destruction of capital by competition. R. Spreckels; C..... 333
   Economists defended; EP.415; see also C 592
   Hobson, J. A., views; S..... 53
   Hoover appeals for aid shift responsibility; EP..... 268
   Hoover defended for not telling full truth; E..... 223
   Hoover tactics; EP..... 153
   "Job-sharing" movement; EP..... 222
   Letter to Hoover. S. Anderson; S.... 191
   Predicted by Major C. H. Douglas. C. V. Kerslake; C...592; see also E.. 415 Prosperity by headlines; E..... 204
   "Recovery"; E..... 245
   Relief bill passed. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 54
 Butler, Nicholas Murray
   Liberalism, attitude toward; E..... 343
   Pleads for rational policy on Europe; E. 4
   State liquor-control plan; EP..... 294
 "Buy American" movement; E..... 631
 Byington, Steven T.
   Wasted votes; C....233; see also C... 171
 C
 C., E.
   Farmer's balance sheet; C..... 83
 Cabin in the cotton. A. Bakshy; MP..... 409
 Cabinet, Hoover. See Hoover, Herbert California
   Election. See Presidential campaign of 1932 Reconstruction finance corporation loan, attempt to buy state for Hoover. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 447
 Calkins, Raymond
   On "new morality"; C...400; see also E. 271
 Calverton, V. F.
   American literature, views on; C....400; see also E..... 297
 Camille. J. W. Krutch; D..... 512
 Capitalism
   Doomed. O. Dittmann; C..283; see also E..... 185
   Open letter to O. G. Villard by N. Thomas, and replies...52; see also C. 105
 Cardenas, Jorge
   Colombia's case; C..... 618
 Carson, Saul
   Philadelphia graft; S..279; see also C. 354
 Carter, Beulah
   Asks books for workers; C..... 646
 Castor oil and cod-liver oil; Dt..... 532
 Cather, Willa: The past recaptured. C. Fadiman; S..... 563 Catholics, insulting. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 230
 Catlin, George E. G.
   What I believe; S..... 398
 Censorship
   Nudes and the law. M. L. Ernst; S.. 591
   Sex wins in America. M. L. Ernst; S...122; see also E, 271; C, 355; C, 400
 Censorship, literary Authors, henpecked; E..... 604
 Central America
   Getting out. R. L. Buell; S..... 32
 Central Europe. See Europe, central Centralia, Washington
   Aid asked for prisoners' publicity committee. F. A. Blossom; C..... 213
 Chaco, Gran. See Bolivia-Peru
 Chanute, Kansas
   Municipal ownership. P. Meigs, third; C..... 400
 Charity and the state. R. Briffault; S..... 30
 Chase, Stuart, and others
   Ask help for Brookwood labor college; C..... 592
 Chattopadhyaya, Mrs. Kamaladevi
   Imprisonment. H. T. Muzumdar; C... 83
 Chicago board of trade
   Suspended; EP..... 94
 Children, educating; Dt..... 400
 Children's books. See Books
 China
   Crisis, new. L. Bow; S..... 143
   See also Chinese-Japanese relations; Chinese-Russian relations
 Chinese-Japanese relations
   Conference in Peiping; EP..... 440
   Japan defies the world..356; see also C. 532
   Japan recognizes Manchukuo, new "independent" Manchurian state; E..... 203
   League of nations refers Manchurian question to committee of nineteen; EP 599 League of nations, test of. R. Dell; S 502
   Lytton commission report charges denied by Japan; EP..... 517
   Lytton commission report on Manchuria; EP.....319; E..... 343
   Manchukuo. H. H. Villard; S..... 421
   Manchukuo; Japan's challenge to world; E..... 271
   Manchuria (Manchukuo) part of China; EP..... 20
   Mongolia, Japanese drive toward; EP.. 183
 Chinese-Russian relations
   Diplomatic relations resumed; checkmating Japan; E..... 631 Chrysalis. J. W. Krutch; D..... 577
 Churches
   And economic inequality; E...246; see also C..... 310
   Eviction; violence used; EP..... 600
 Cigar-makers
   Tampa's reign of terror. A. Brenner; S.....555; see also C..... 647
 Civil liberties union. See American civil liberties union
 Clark, Colonel Bennett Champ
   Candidacy for senate; EP..... 135
 Clark, Evans
   How to budget doctors' bills; S...586; see also E..... 583
 "Class war" and literature. H. Hazlitt; S.....361; see also C..... 506 Clear all wires; J. W. Krutch; D..... 290
 Coal miners, American Appeal for. L. J. Seco; C..... 646
   Conditions in southern Illinois; EP.... 182
   Disturbances in Indiana and other states; EP..... 134
   Harlan county, Kentucky; I. W. W. and communists. H. Mahler; C..... 37
   Harlan county, Kentucky; unions in. T. Huff; C..... 37
   Kentucky, private war, deaths and woundings; EP..... 21
   Military terrorism in Illinois; EP..... 385
   Mining to moonshine. M. Kelsey; S.. 397
   Relief, appeal for. K. H. Pollak and J. Herling; C..... 459 Suffering in mine fields. L. F. Budenz; C..... 561
   Toys for miners' children asked. League for industrial democracy; C..... 647
   United mine workers of America betrays workers; EP..... 155
   West Virginia, situation. T. Tippet; C. 57
 Cod-liver oil and castor oil; Dt..... 532
 Coe, George A.
   On students' refusal of military drill; C 311
 Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
   Catch, the; P..... 611
   Inner temple, the; P..... 148
 Coghlan, Ralph
   Missouri election; S..... 422
 College of the city of New York
   Censorship of student publication; EP.. 385
   Repression of liberalism; E..... 343
 College students
   Englishwomen, and men; EP..... 601
 Colleges and universities
   Conference on colleges and social conditions; E..... 548 Repression of thought; E..... 344
 Collier, John
   Indian bureau's record; S..... 303
 Collins, William
   May be pardoned; Mooney and Billings remain in prison; EP..... 21
 Colman, Louis
   Scottsboro decision; C..560; see also EP. 545

- Colombia, case against Peru. J. Cardenas; C..... 618
- Columbia university
Repression of liberalism; E..... 343
Retreats from repressive attitude; EP.. 385
- Communism
And art; E..... 583
McKee, J. V., interview with communists; EP..... 242
- Concerts. See Orchestras
- Conference, international economic. See Economic conference, international
- Congress
Adjourns; EP..... 65
Gerrymander; supreme court decision; E 443
Hard-working. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 102
"Lame-duck" session, futility; EP..... 599
Special session. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 610
- Connecticut
Farmhouse life; Dt..... 170
Insurgents in. G. C. Edgar; S..... 395; see also C..... 457
Needle trades. W. Bilevitz; S..... 475
Republican reactionaries name Bingham for senate; EP..... 294
- Connolly, Alice G.
La Guardia defeat; C..... 561
Conquerors, the. A. Bakshy; MP..... 576
Consortium for public works, European; EP. 516
Constitution, United States
Amending, methods of. W. Seagle; S.. 141
Conventions. See Presidential campaign of 1932
- Cooking, American; Dt..... 591
- Coolidge, Calvin
Elevation to presidency, cause of. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 392
New York speech; EP..... 383
- Corporations. See Holding companies
- Cotton
Boll weevil to help farmers; EP..... 95
- Cotton industry
Lancashire strike; EP..... 222
- Cowan, Irene Lois
On prohibition in small town; C..... 194
- Craig, Archibald
On socialism; C....105; see also..... 52
- Crandall, Irene Jean
Defends J. L. Gill; C..... 57
Criminal at large. J. W. Krutch; D..... 438
- Crises. See Business depression
- Crisp, Representative Charles R.
Defeat in primary, and appointment to tariff commission. P. Y. Anderson; S 331
- Cuba
Terrorism in; letters by E. S. Brinton and M. Kaufman; C..... 458 Torment; E..... 323
- Currency
Anti-boarding drive fails; EP..... 20
Circulation, according to Vice-president Curtis; EP..... 182
Circulation not increased by home loan bank bill; EP..... 222
Inflation; Glass bill passed; EP..... 65
- Curtis, Vice-president Charles Against prohibition repeal. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 230
As economist; EP..... 182
Reply to heckler on feeding veterans; EP..... 115
- Czecho-Slovakia
Apprehension in; EP..... 628
- D
- Dahlberg, Edward
Hunger on the march; S..... 642
- Daily Graphic
Suspension; EP..... 67
- Dana, Henry W. L.
Barred from Great Britain; EP..... 202
Dangerous corner. J. W. Krutch; D..... 484 Danubian states. See Europe, central
- Dark horse, the. A. Bakshy; MP..... 18
- Dark hours, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 542
- Davis, Senator James John Indicted on lottery charges; EP..... 182
- Davis, S. L.
Asks Nation readers in Toledo to meet; C..... 430
- Davison, F. Trubee
Defends eviction of bonus army. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 230
- Dell, Robert
Disarmament conference at Geneva; S.....209; see also C..... 354 League of nations, final test; S..... 502
- Democratic party and convention. See Presidential campaign of 1932
- Denmark
Tariff; government plans to remove restrictions; EP..... 600
- Deportations
Aliens; EP..... 544
Arrests without warrants, White Plains, New York; EP..... 183
- Depression. See Business depression
- De Reszke, Jean and Edouard
Biographical material sought. C. M. Leiser; C..... 83
- Detroit
Danger in. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 99
- Dewey, John, and others
Ask help for Brookwood labor college; C..... 592
- Dickinson, G. Lowes
Death; EP..... 135
Tribute to. H. N.; C..... 233
- Diffie, Bailey W.
Spanish republic meets test; S..... 226
- Dilliard, Irving
Illinois campaign; S..... 352
- Dinner at eight. J. W. Krutch; D..... 464
- Disarmament. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Dishes to break. D. Haskell; Arc..... 44
- Dittmann, Otto
Capitalism doomed; C.....283; see also E. 185
- Dmitri, letters to. M. Ryskind; S.....125, 473
- Doctors. See Medical profession
- Domestic workers. See Unemployment
- Donovan, William J. See New York state Doomed battalion, the. A. Bakshy; MP.... 18
- Dos Passos, John
Appeal for Scottsboro Negroes; C..... 172
- Douglas, Major C. H.
Predicted business depression. C. V. Kerslake; C.....592; see also E..... 415
Questionnaire on his views on economics, with answers. G. Munson, W. A. Nyland, and J. Riordan; C..... 311
- Douglas, Paul H.
Pairing votes for Thomas; C..... 430
- Douty, H. M.
Ferment in railroad unions; S..... 526
- Drama. See H., H.; Krutch, J. W.; Theater, the
- Dreiser, Theodore
And the American dream. C. Fadiman; S..... 364
- Drugs
Bad, and the law; ergot and ether. A. Kallet and F. J. Schlink; S..346, 608; see also C..... 561
- Dubarry, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 596
- Duffy, Edmund
Have one on me; Ct..... 25
Handwriting on the wall, the; Ct..... 445
Morning after, the; Ct..... 472
One elephant that did forget; Ct..... 389
Road back, the; Ct..... 273
Unless you elect Mr. Hoover; Ct..... 417
"Dumping." See Trade, foreign
- E
- Earhart, Amelia. See Putnam, Amelia Earhart
- Eastman, Joseph B.
Attacks holding companies. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 392
- Eat and be poisoned. A. Kallet and F. J. Schlink; S..... 325
- Economic conditions. See Business depression
- Economic conference, international Reparations, debts and tariff rates barred by United States; EP..... 114
- Economic depression. See Business depression
- Economics
Douglas, C. H., views; questionnaire with answers. G. Munson, W. A. Nyland and J. Riordan; C..... 311
Economists deflected, in current depression; E.....415; see also C..... 592
- Edelman, Louis
Colonel House and the war; C..... 213
- Edgar, G. C.
Connecticut insurgents; S.....395; see also C..... 457
- Einstein, Albert
Admission to United States opposed by Woman patriot corporation; EP..... 581
Passport incident; Consul general Messersmith not to blame; EP..... 601
To head mathematics department, Institute for advanced study; E..... 387
- Election
Causes for thanks and for mourning; E. 489
Results. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 504
Results. Democratic revolution. O. Welsh; S..... 523
See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- Election, primary Results; EP..... 268
- Ellentuck, Irving
On formation of Young progressive league; C..... 284
- Ergot. See Drugs
- England. See Great Britain
- Ernst, Morris L.
Dissenting opinion:
Beer, down with; S..... 644
Capital levies; S..... 617
Nudes and the law; S..... 591
- Scottsboro; S..... 559
Sex wins to America; S..122; see also E, 271;...C, 355;...C..... 400
- Ether. See Drugs
- Europe
Eastern and southern, troubled; EP.... 488
- Europe, central
Stresa conference. E. D. H.; S..... 348
Unscrambling attempt. J. Gunther; S.. 275
- European war
House, E. M., and the war. L. Edelman; C..... 213
Wilson for war in March, 1916. C. H. Grattan; S....76; see also..... 588
See also War claims
- Evictions
New York city cases, January to October; EP..... 600
Wisconsin case; violence used; EP..... 600
- Evjue, William T.
Wisconsin election; S..... 425
- Explaining to Dmitri. M. Ryskind; S.125; 473
- F
- Fadiman, Clifton
Anderson, Sherwood; search for salvation; S..... 454
Cather, Willa: The past recaptured; S. 563
Dreiser, Theodore, and the American dream; S..... 364
Fall in New England; Dt..... 193
Far off hills, the. L. G.; D..... 484
- Farm relief. See Agriculture
- "Farmers' holiday." See National farmers' holiday association
- Farming. See Agriculture
- Ferguson, "Ma"
Wins again. H. Preece; S..... 255
- Ferrill, Thomas Hornsby
Time of mountains; P..... 195
- Fiction. See Novels
- Finance, articles on. See Harman, S. P.
- Finance, international Helplessness confessed by M. C. Norman; EP..... 413
- Finances, United States. See United States
- Finney, Ruth
Saint Lawrence treaty; S..... 119
- Firebird. J. W. Krutch; D..... 596
- Fischer, Louis
Fifteen years of the soviets; S..... 492
Pants, recovery in Russia; Dt..... 505
Private profits in Russia; S..... 159
Recognition of Russia; S..... 633
Scheffer, Paul, case of; S..... 195
Soviet-Japanese deal against America; S. 419
Soviet-Japanese war; S..... 50
Soviet progress and poverty; S..... 552
Soviet Russia, what is? S..... 6
Week in a soviet factory; S..... 248
- Fishing; Dt..... 258
- Flournoy, B. C.
Closing of the bauhaus; C..533; see also 374
- Food
Eat and be poisoned. A. Kallet and F. J. Schlink; S..... 325
- Ford, Henry
Urges employees to vote for Hoover; EP 411
- Foreign Affairs
Tenth anniversary number; EP..... 341
- Foreign trade. See Trade, foreign
- Fortgang, E. M.
Fadiman and Goethe; C..... 172
- France
And Spain; Herriot visit. E. D. H.; S..... 531
Army, and Germany's. E. D. H.; S.. 478
Sympathy of other nations. E. D. H.; S..... 478 Tariff. See Tariff; French
- Franco-Russian treaty signed; EP..... 543
- Frankfurter, Felix
Nominated for Massachusetts supreme court; EP..... 3
Declines appointment; EP..... 67
- Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
- Frost, Frances
Boy sowing; P..... 593
Epilogue; P..... 286
- G
- G., L.
Far off hills, the; D..... 485
- Gallagher, Leo
Forced out of Southwestern university staff for defending political minorities; EP.....242; see also C..... 479
- Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand. See India
- Gard, Wayne
Farmers' rebellion; S..... 207
- Garfield, W. H.
On professional forecasters; S..... 162
- Garment industry
Connecticut needle trades. W. Bilevitz; S..... 475

- Garner, John Nance
Announces candidacy for presidency; views on socialism and communism; EP ..... 1
What really happened; M. Ryskind; S. 256
See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- Garrison, Lindley M.
Death; EP ..... 413
- Gay divorce. J. W. Krutch; D. .... 625
- Geiser, Karl Frederick
Hitler's hold on Germany; S. .... 474
- Geneva conference. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Geography
As defined by Van Loon; E. .... 205; see also C. .... 355
Modern teaching. E. Van Cleef; C. .... 355; see also E. .... 205
- Georgia
Prison brutality; EP ..... 517
- Germany
Armament, request for enlargement; E. 225
Army, and France's. E. D. H.; S. .... 478
Brüning cabinet ousted; East Prussian landlords in power; EP ..... 2
Bullerjahn case; conviction reversed; EP 600
Economic situation worse; EP ..... 182
Financial measures; EP ..... 202
Hindenburg-Hitler negotiations; EP .... 517
Hitler, Adolf:
Declines post as head of coalition cabinet; EP ..... 543
Demands dictatorship; EP ..... 153
Hold. K. F. Geiser; S. .... 474
Victory in reichstag elections may be his end; E. .... 115
Loses sympathy of other nations. E. D. H.; S. .... 478
Nationalistic extremes; EP ..... 202
Political situation dependent on reparations settlement; EP ..... 2
Reichstag election; EP ..... 441
Reichstag election, stalemate; EP ..... 468
Reparations. See War debts and reparations
Republic passing away; EP ..... 267
Schleicher, General von, becomes chancellor; EP ..... 580
Schleicher, General von, boss; E. D. H.; S. .... 531
Schleicher program; EP ..... 629
Spirit, flight of. E. Ludwig; S. .... 391
Terrorism; EP ..... 133
Terrorism gaining; EP ..... 66
Von Papen for dictatorship; EP ..... 384
See also Armament limitation and disarmament; Prussia; War debts and reparations
- Gerrymander. See Congress
- Gershwin, George, and American music. B. H. Haggin; S. .... 308
- Gill, Joseph L.
Work defended. I. J. Crandall; C. 57; apology by M. A. Hallgren; C. .... 57
- Ginzburg, Benjamin
Philosophy, possibility of return; S. .... 190
Spinoza: 1632-1932; S. .... 528
- Girton college
Restrictions on women students lightened; EP ..... 601
- Glass bill. See Currency
- Glassford, General Pelham D.
Efforts for homeless and workless boys; EP ..... 544
Reply to Mitchell attack on bonus army; E. .... 269
- Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von
Fadiman and Goethe. E. M. Fortgang; C. .... 172
What is left of Goethe? H. Clochower; M. Plaut; E. Bacon; L. G. MacFarland and friends; C. .... 12
- Gold
Power of; Dt. .... 13
Standard was in peril, according to President Hoover; EP ..... 339
- Goldsmith, Sophie L.
Alcott, L. M., and children's books; list of children's books; S. .... 510
- Good earth, the; J. W. Krutch; D. .... 438
- "Good-for-nothing"
Unemployed; C. .... 430
- Goona goona. A. Bakshy; MP ..... 338
- Government ownership. See Ownership, government
- Grahame, Kenneth
Death; E. .... 47
- Grain elevators and houses. D. Haskell; S. 485
- Gran Chaco. See Bolivia-Peru
- Grattan, C. Hartley
Wilson for war in March, 1916; S. 76; see also. .... 588
- Great Britain
Cabinet, withdrawals from. E. D. H.; S. .... 478
Economic situation not improved; EP. 2
Finances; war loan converted. S. P. Harman; S. .... 58
- India, relations with. See India
- Parliament; conservatism in peril; EP. 21
- Parliamentary crisis; W. A. Robson; S. 549
- Persia, relations with. See Persia
- Unemployment; worse than ever; disturbances; EP ..... 412
See also British Empire
- Great lakes-Saint Lawrence waterway. See Saint Lawrence waterway project
- Great Magoo, the. J. W. Krutch; D. .... 625
- Gregg, Richard B.
Troubles in India; S. .... 186
- Gregory, Horace
Emerson: last days at Concord; P. .... 59
Homage to an ancestor (1783-1880); P. 366
- Gumbel, Professor Eric
Persecuted by German nationalists; EP. 202
- Gunther, John
Danube blues; S. .... 275
- H
- H., E. D.
Behind the cables; S. .... 348; 478; 531; 607
- H., H.
Ballyhoo of 1932; D. .... 266
Men must fight; D. .... 464
Smiling faces; D. .... 266
- Haggin, B. H.
Gershwin and American music; S. .... 308
- Haiti
Bonds that bind republic; E. .... 243
Haitian senate refuses to confirm treaty with United States; EP ..... 294
- Haizlip, James
Flight from Los Angeles to New York in record time; EP ..... 223
- Haldane, J. B. S.
On perfectibility of man; EP ..... 203
- Haller, Frederick
Wants to organize Nation dining club in Washington, District of Columbia; C. .... 58
- Hallgren, Mauritz A.
Billions for relief; S. 521; see also E. 518
Bonus army; S. .... 71
Detroit, danger in; S. .... 99
Gill, J. L., apology to; C. .... 57
Japan, revolutionary crisis; S. .... 448
Manton, Judge, and Interborough rapid transit scandal; S. .... 394
Milwaukee miracle; S. .... 28
- Hansen, Harry
Carps at The Nation's literary judgments; E. .... 297; see also C. .... 400
- Hardman, J. B. S.
American federation of labor convention; S. .... 615
- Harlan county, Kentucky. See Coal miners, American
- Harman, S. Palmer
Great Britain converts war loan; S. .... 58
How Germany may pay; S. .... 38
Public utility regulation; S. .... 106
Tariff; British imperial conference seeks formula; S. .... 84 Taxes, new; S. .... 14
- Harris, Abraham
Mexico's new "finger-president"; S. .... 327
- Harris, Lement, and H. M. Ware
In the "jungle"; S. .... 55
- Haskell, Douglas
Closing of the bauhaus; Arc. .... 374; see also C. .... 533
Dishes to break; Arc. .... 44
Grain elevators and houses; Arc. .... 485
Hillside school; Arc. .... 598
Slum clearance; Arc. .... 598
- Hawthorne, Nathaniel
Censored by wife; E. .... 604
- Hayti. See Haiti
- Hazlitt, Henry
Literature and the "class war"; S. 361; see also C. .... 506
- Heatter, Gabriel
On socialist party's future; with reply by N. Thomas; S. .... 585
- Henry street settlement
Visiting nurse services need aid; EP .... 47
- Herberg, Will
Lassalle and the German labor movement; C. .... 355; see also B. .... 177
- Here today. J. W. Krutch; D. .... 265
- Herling, John
Relief for miners, appeal for; C. .... 459
- Herriot, Edouard
Armament limitation plan, new; E. 443; E. .... 519
Armament limitation plan. E. D. H.; S. 607
Visit to Spain. E. D. H.; S. .... 531
- Heyl, Lynda H. T.
Petitions at Geneva; C. 354; see also. 209
- Hicks, Arthur C.
On Thomas campaign as a futile gesture; C. .... 171; see also C. .... 233
- Hicks, Granville
Literature and the class war; reply to H. Hazlitt; C. 506; see also. .... 361
- Higman, N.
On Mooney protest at Olympic games; C. 284
- Hillquit, Morris. See New York city
- Hillside school. D. Haskell; Arc. .... 598
- Hitch-hiking; Dt. .... 233
- Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
- Hoan, Daniel W.
On pairing votes for Thomas; C, with editorial comment. .... 560
- Hoarding. See Currency
- Hobson, J. A.
World's economic crisis; S. .... 53
- Hogs
Prices, rise in; EP ..... 66
- Holberg, Ruth Langland
Midas touch; P. .... 328
- Holding companies
Wisconsin court holds up dividends; EP. 66
See also Power and power industry
- Home Friend Magazine
Letters on prohibition in small town. I. L. Cowan; C. .... 194
- Hook, Sidney
On scientific research; rejoinder to M. F. Ashley-Montagu's letter on Hook review of "Breakdown"; C. .... 170
- Hoover, Herbert
Acceptance address. P. Y. Anderson; S. 188
Acceptance address; stands pat; E. .... 157
Administration, defended by Stimson; EP ..... 319
Administration, errors. P. Y. Anderson; S. .... 504
Appeals for aid for victims of depression shift responsibility; EP ..... 268
Armament limitation proposal, at Geneva; E. .... 5
Attack by J. B. Eastman. P. Y. Anderson; S. .... 392
Bonus army scares him. M. A. Hallgren; S. .... 71
Budget message; E. .... 602
Business depression; tactics; EP ..... 153
Cabinet; E. .... 322
Cost to the nation in White House expenditures; E. .... 185
Defended. J. N. Moore; C. .... 311
Defended for not telling full truth; E. 223
Failure. D. J. Meserole; C. .... 457
Gold standard was in peril, according to president; EP ..... 339
Looking to 1936. P. Y. Anderson; S. 610
Message to congress. P. Y. Anderson; S. .... 610
Mourning becomes Herbert; over Maine election. P. Y. Anderson; S. .... 280 Prohibition stand indorsed by Dean Pound; EP ..... 221
Pronunciation of English. P. Y. Anderson; S. .... 230
Radio takes up Ed Wynn's time on air; EP ..... 341
Saint Lawrence waterway; refusal to confer with Roosevelt. P. Y. Anderson; S. .... 102
"Too busy" to see writers on veterans' eviction; EP ..... 154
Unemployment and depression; letter to the president. S. Anderson; S. .... 191
Unemployment; Hoover holds up relief measures; EP ..... 1
Unemployment; murder, Mr. Hoover? E. .... 96; see also C. .... 171
War debts and reparations; know-nothingism wins; E. .... 546
War debts and reparations; plan for reduction in exchange for markets; EP. 516
War debts and reparations; special message; EP ..... 627
War debts and reparations; "warns" Europe; E. .... 68
Water power act, attempt to wreck. P. Y. Anderson; S. .... 447
See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- Horse feathers. A. Bakshy; MP ..... 198
- House, Colonel E. M.
And the war; C. .... 213
Self-defense. C. H. Grattan; S. 588; see also. .... 76
- House of commons
Tabasco sauce issue; EP ..... 629
- Houses
Little wonder house; E. .... 157
- Housing
Slum clearance. D. Haskell; Arc. .... 598
- Howland, Charles P.
Death; EP ..... 489
- Huff, Tess
Unions in Harlan county, Kentucky; C. 37
- Hull, Senator Cordell
Calls for tariff reduction; EP ..... 579
- Humanity. See Man
- Hunger marches. See Unemployment
- Hygiene, social. See Social hygiene

I

- I am a fugitive from a chain gang. A. Bakshy; MP..... 513
- I loved you Wednesday. J. W. Krutch; D.. 438
- If I had a million. A. Bakshy; MP..... 624
- Illinois
- Gubernatorial campaign; Len Small tries comeback. I. Dilliard; S..... 352
- Imperial economic conference. See British empire
- Inauguration. See Roosevelt, F. D.
- India
- British policy; EP..... 154
- Chattopadhyaya, Mrs. K., imprisonment. H. T. Muzumdar; C..... 83
- Gandhi proposes to starve as protest against British communal awards; EP. 267
- Gandhi starvation plan succeeds; E.... 295
- Gandhi still in jail; EP..... 469
- Round table conference, third; E..... 519
- Troubles. R. B. Gregg; S..... 186
- Indian bureau
- Criticized. C. Nice; C..... 57
- Record. J. Collier; S..... 303
- Institute for advanced study
- A. Einstein to head mathematics department; outlook for institute; E..... 387
- Insull, Samuel and Martin
- Fall and indictments; EP..... 340
- Insull system
- Young, Owen D., on "preferred list." P. Y. Anderson; S..... 392
- Young, Owen D., testimony; EP..... 627
- Insurance, social
- Headway; EP..... 516
- Interborough rapid transit company
- Manton, Judge, and scandal. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 394
- International economic conference. See Economic conference, international
- Investments. See Stocks and bonds
- Iowa
- Farmers. See National farmers' holiday association
- Safe for Republicans? D. R. Murphy; S..... 306
- Iraq
- Admitted to League of nations, but tied to Great Britain; EP..... 340
- Irish academy of letters. E. Boyd; S..... 590
- Irish free state
- Crisis over land annuities; EP..... 413
- De Valera-McNeill controversy; EP.... 46
- Iron. See Steel and iron
- Ishii, Viscount. See Japan
- Italy
- Foreign and domestic policies. E. D. H.; S..... 607
- Mussolini amnesty for fascist celebration; EP..... 468

J

- James, Edward Holton
- On Sacco and Vanzetti, and Buda and Orciani; C..... 146
- Japan
- Budget, largest in its history; EP..... 543
- Fisheries treaty with Russia; EP..... 153
- Irritated by presence of United States fleet in Pacific; EP..... 580
- Ishii statement on policy; EP..... 2
- Revolutionary crisis. M. A. Hallgren; S. 448
- Soviet-Japanese deal against America? L. Fischer; S..... 419
- War with Russia. L. Fischer; S..... 50
- Japanese-Chinese relations. See Chinese-Japanese relations
- Jennings, Leslie Nelson
- Dark woman; P..... 312
- Fable; P..... 432
- Last hour; P..... 39
- Lion house, the; P..... 558
- Mural for evening; P..... 173
- Jews
- As radicals. W. Seagle; S..... 307
- World congress, called by World Jewish conference; EP..... 222
- World congress, opposition to. A. Allen; C..... 285
- Johns, Orrick
- On defense of political prisoners; C.... 285
- Johnson, Senator Hiram Warren
- Against Hoover; EP..... 383
- Jones, J. M.
- On socialism; C..... 105; see also.. 52
- Journalists. See Newspapers
- Jugoslavia
- Apprehension in; EP..... 628
- "Jungle," in the. H. M. Ware and L. Harris; S..... 55
- Juries and jurymen. See Negroes
- Jusserand, Jules
- Death; E..... 95
- "Justice"
- On dismissal of D. Pearson by Baltimore Sun; C..... 259

K

- Kallet, Arthur, and F. J. Schlink
- Bad Drugs and the Law; S..... 546
- Eat and be poisoned; S..... 325
- Poison for profit; S..... 608; see also C.. 561
- Kameradschaft. A. Bakshy; MP..... 513
- Kansas
- Brinkley campaign for governor. R. H. Bailey; S..... 254
- Kaufman, George S.
- Arena, the; S..... 145
- Kaufman, Malwon
- Cuba, terror in; C..... 458
- Kelsey, Mary
- From mining to moonshine; S..... 397
- Kendall, H.
- Brains and brawn; Ir on V. F. Calverton's review of "Rebels and renegades," by M. Nomad; C..... 194; Ir by Nomad..... 258
- Kennan, Ellen A.
- League for mutual aid; C..... 561
- Kentucky. See Coal miners, American
- Kerslake, C. V.
- Credits Major C. H. Douglas with predicting business depression; C..... 592; see also E..... 415
- Kid from Spain, the. A. Bakshy; MP.... 576
- Kjar, Nels C.
- Deportation case; EP..... 544
- Kohler, Walter J.
- Denies blaming Hoover for defeat in 1930; C..... 619; see also..... 331
- Kongo. A. Bakshy; MP..... 576
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
- Alice in wonderland; D..... 654
- Autumn crocus; D..... 577
- Biography; D..... 654
- Camille; D..... 512
- Chrysalis; D..... 577
- Civilization and the poet; S..... 167
- Clear all wires; D..... 290
- Criminal at large; D..... 438
- Dangerous corner; D..... 484
- Dark hours, the; D..... 542
- Dinner at eight; D..... 464
- Dubarry, the; D..... 596
- Flying colors; D..... 317
- Firebird; D..... 596
- Gay divorce; D..... 625
- Good earth, the; D..... 438
- Great Magoo, the; D..... 625
- Here today; D..... 265
- I loved you Wednesday; D..... 438
- Late Christopher Bean, the; D..... 484
- Mad Hopes, the; D..... 625
- Mademoiselle; D..... 464
- Man who reclaimed his head, the; D.... 290
- Music in the air; D..... 542
- Nona; D..... 408
- Passionate pilgrim, the; D..... 464
- Show business. I. Crisis in the theater; S..... 211
- II. Mow it works; S..... 227
- III. What it costs; S..... 252
- IV. Can anything be done? S..... 277
- Show off, the; D..... 654
- Success story; D..... 336
- Vanities; D..... 375
- Walk a little faster; D..... 654
- When ladies meet; D..... 408

L

- Labor
- Racketeers; E..... 69
- Southern. A. J. Muste; S..... 121
- Labor prisoners, appeal for. S. Anderson; C..... 646
- Labor unions
- Railroad unions, ferment in. H. M. Douty; S..... 526
- La Follette, Philip Fox
- For Roosevelt; EP..... 411
- La Follette, Robert Marion, junior
- For Roosevelt; EP..... 411
- La Follette, Robert Marion, junior, and Philip Fox
- Future; EP..... 293
- La Guardia, Fiorello H.
- Defeat. A. G. Connolly; C..... 561
- Defeat mourned; E..... 489
- "Lame-duck" session. See Congress
- Lancashire. See Cotton industry
- Late Christopher Bean, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 484
- Laurel and Hardie
- Stampede on their arrival in Glasgow; EP..... 183
- Lausanne conference. See War debts and reparations
- Lavery, Charles J.
- On liquor traffic; C..... 233
- Laws, blue. See Blue laws
- Lay-offs. See Unemployment
- Le bal. A. Bakshy; MP..... 338
- Leader, H. A.
- Praises Anderson articles; C..... 194

- League for independent political action
- Conference; program. D. Allen; S.... 80
- Indorses Thomas for president and generally progressive party platform; EP. 46
- League for industrial democracy
- Asks for toys for miners' children; C.. 647
- League for mutual aid
- Work. E. A. Kennan; C..... 561
- League of nations
- Events. E. D. H.; S..... 607
- Lytton commission and report. See Chinese-Japanese relations
- Massachusetts referendums on United States entry; EP..... 601
- Moral suasion; C..... 171
- Worries. E. D. H.; S..... 348
- Lechlitner, Ruth
- Shadows of leaf; P..... 532
- Lee, Euel
- Decision in case on unjust barring of Negroes from jury; he gets new trial; EP..... 46
- Service of Maryland civil liberties committee. R. N. Baldwin; C..... 234
- Leeuwenhoek, Anthony van
- Tercentenary; E..... 444
- Lehman, Herbert H.
- As gubernatorial candidate; support of Nation; N. Thomas, W. Maslow and E. M. White; C..... 213
- Commended; EP..... 155
- See also New York state
- Leiser, Clara M.
- Seeks material for De Reszke biography; C..... 83
- Letters, three; E..... 224
- Levinson, Edward
- Dismissal as assistant editor of New Leader; EP..... 21; see also C..... 171
- McKee, Joseph V., reformer? S..... 605
- Lewis, Alfred Baker
- Liberalism and sex; C.. 355; see also E. 271
- Lewis, Sinclair, and others
- Ask help for Brookwood labor college; C 592
- Liars, patriotic; E..... 223
- Liberalism
- And sex; E.. 271; see also C, 355; C. 400
- Repression at American colleges; E.... 343
- Liberia
- Slavery and financial difficulties; E.... 69
- State department disapproves League of nations plan for reconstruction; EP.. 294
- United States attitude; EP..... 320
- Life begins. A. Bakshy; MP..... 239
- Lindeman, Edward C., and others
- Ask help for Brookwood labor college; C..... 592
- Literary digest poll. See Presidential campaign of 1932
- Literature
- And the "class war." H. Hazlitt; S. 361; see also C..... 506
- See also Books, novels
- Literature, American
- Views of V. F. Calverton; C..... 400; see also E..... 297
- Little entente
- Apprehension in; EP..... 628
- Little wonder houses; E..... 157
- Lotteries
- Charges against Senator Davis and others; EP..... 182
- Love me tonight. A. Bakshy; MP..... 239
- Lowell, A. Lawrence
- Retirement from Harvard presidency; EP..... 545
- Lozowick, Louis
- Artist in soviet Russia; S..... 35
- Ludwig, Emil
- Flight of the German spirit; S..... 391
- Lunacharsky, Anatole
- On art; E..... 583
- Lusk, Graham
- Death; EP..... 95
- Lytton commission and report. See Chinese-Japanese relations

M

- M., R. M.
- On editorial on eviction of veterans, Washington; C.... 171; see also E.. 96
- McAllister, Jessie R.
- Fun to be hungry? S..... 530
- McCurdy, Allen
- Sumner's "forgotten man"; C..... 333
- MacDonald, J. Ramsay
- Change in ideas; EP..... 202
- Macfadden, Bernarr
- Penny restaurant; E..... 70
- MacFarland, L. G., and friends
- What is left of Goethe? C..... 12
- McIntyre, E. R.
- Skimmed milk and watered stocks; S.. 281
- MacKay, Robert A.
- Imperial economic conference; S..... 74

- McKee, Joseph Vincent
Breaks with Tammany hall; EP..... 516
Communists, interview with; EP..... 242
Reformer? E. Levinson; S..... 605
- McLean, Robert N.
Mexican return, the; S..... 165
- Macy, John
Death; EP..... 203
- Mad Hopes, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 625
- Mädchen in uniform. A. Bakshy; MP..... 338
- Mademoiselle. J. W. Krutch; D..... 464
- Mahler, Herbert
I. W. W. and communists in Harlan county, Kentucky; C..... 37
- Maine
Election; EP..... 268
Election; mourning becomes Herbert. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 280
Goes Democratic; EP..... 241
Make me a star. A. Bakshy; MP..... 63
- Man
Diversity desirable; EP..... 203
Man who reclaimed his head, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 290
- Manchuria (Manchukuo)
Trade, foreign. T. S. Miyakawa; C.532; see also ..... 356
See also Chinese-Japanese relations
- Manton, Judge Martin T.
And Interborough rapid transit scandal. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 394
- Manumit school
Asks support. A. J. Muste; C..... 355
- Maryland civil liberties committee
Service in E. Lee case. R. N. Baldwin; C..... 234
- Maslow, Will
On Nation's support of H. H. Lehman; C..... 213
- Massachusetts
Drift to Hoover. J. H. Powers; S..... 329
- Meade, Julian R.
Intolerance, southern; C..... 457
- Medical profession
Budgeting doctors' bills. E. Clark; S.586; see also E..... 583 Socialization of medicine. E. Clark; S..... 586; see also E..... 583
- Medicine, patent. See Drugs
- Meigs, Peveril third
Chanute, Kansas, municipal ownership; C..... 400
- Mellon, Andrew William Campaign speech in England; EP..... 412
- Men must fight. H. H.; D..... 464
- Mendel, Arthur
European potpourri; M..... 540
Ravel piano concerto; M..... 652
Stokowski, L.; M..... 652
- Meserole, Darwin J.
Hoover's failure; C..... 457
- Messersmith, Consul general George S.
Not to blame in Einstein case; EP..... 601
- Mexicans
Return to Mexico from United States. R. N. McLean; S..... 165
- Mexico
President, new. A. Harris; S..... 327
- Microbe hunter. A. van Leeuwenhoek; E..... 444
- Militarism
Drill, refusal, by college students. G. A. Coe; C..... 311
Instilled by Reserve officers' training corps. R. Wohlforth; S..... 10; see also C..... 172 Spread before Democratic national convention; EP..... 46
See also Pacifism
- Milk
Skimmed milk and watered stocks. E. R. McIntyre; S..... 281
- Million dollar legs. A. Bakshy; MP..... 111
- Mills, Secretary Ogden Livingston
Protectionist, quotes W. G. Sumner, free trader. A. McCurdy; C..... 333
- Milwaukee
Government, miracle. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 28
- Miners, coal. See Coal miners
- Missouri
Election. R. Coghlan; S..... 422
- Miyakawa, T. Scott
Manchuria's foreign trade; C.532; see also ..... 356
- Moley, Raymond
Roosevelt and public utilities; C..... 82
- Money. See Currency
- Mongolia. See Chinese-Japanese relations
- Moody, Minnie Hite
Say this of horses; P..... 638
- Mooney, Thomas J.
Collins, W., may be pardoned; Mooney stays in prison; EP..... 21
Poem on. L. Ridge; P..... 235
Protestants at Olympic games jailed and fined. N. Higman; C..... 284 Wickersham commission suppression of subcommittee report charged to Hoover. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 447; EP..... 467
- Moore, Jane Newell
Defends Hoover; C..... 311
- Morality
Liberalism and sex; E..271; see also C..... 355; C..... 400
- More merry-go-round (book). See Pearson, D.
- Moreland, Marc
On use of "who" and "whom"; C.... 234
- Morris, Nelson
Comment on criticism of "Breakdown" by S. Hook; C..... 36; see also C.... 170
- Morrow, Felix
Bonus and hunger marchers; C..... 619
Most dangerous game, the. A. Bakshy; MP. 576
- Motion pictures. See Moving pictures
- Moving pictures
(For reviews of pictures, see names of pictures; also Bakshy, A.)
Dialogue; A. Bakshy..... 151
Laurel and Hardy arrive in Glasgow; cause stampede; EP..... 183
- Municipal ownership. See Ownership, government
- Munson, Gorham; W. A. Nyland and J. Riordan
Questionnaire on C. H. Douglas's views on economics, with answers; C..... 311
- Murchison, Claudius
Defends economists; E..415; see also C. 592
- Murphy, Donald R.
Iowa in presidential elections; S..... 306
- Music
European potpourri. A. Mendel; M.... 540
Gershwin and American music. H. B. Haggin; S..... 308
Proletarian, Russia. A. Pettis; S..... 500
See Orchestras; also Mendel, A.
Music in the air. J. W. Krutch; D..... 542
- Mussolini, Benito
Praises war; EP..... 135
See also Italy
- Muste, A. J.
On Manumit school; C..... 355
Southern labor; S..... 121
- Muzumdar, Haridas T.
Chattopadhyaya, Mrs. K., imprisonment; C..... 83
- N
- N., H.
Dickinson, G. Lowes; C..... 233
- Nadejina, Lydia
Soviet women; S..... 498
- Nadejina, Lydia, and J. Rorty
Shock brigades..... 496
- Names, lists of; EP..... 489
- Nassau county "third-degree" case. See Police
- Nation, The
Literary judgments called into question by H. Hansen; E....297; see also C. 400
Manila readers asked to meet. R. B. Blackman; C..... 57
South Orange and Maplewood, New Jersey, readers, asked to form club; C..... 311
Statement of ownership, et cetera..... 381
Toledo readers asked to meet. S. L. Davis; C..... 430
Union county, New Jersey, readers asked to meet; C..... 58
Washington, District of Columbia, readers asked to form dining club. F. Haller; C..... 58
- National committee for the defense of political prisoners
California branch activity. O. Johns; C. 284
- National conference of business and industrial committees
Part of Hoover campaign; EP..... 201
- National farmers' holiday association
Demonstration in Iowa; E..... 184
- Naval limitation. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Navy, United States
Fleet in Pacific irritates Japan; EP.... 580
See also Armament limitation
- Needle trades. See Garment industry
- Negroes
Alabama boys' case. See Negroes—Scottsboro
Jurymen; unjustly barred in Lee case, Maryland court decides; EP..... 46
Scottsboro case:
Appeal for mother of boy. S. Anderson; C..... 506
Appeal for youngest two. J. Dos Passos; C..... 172
Decision denounced by representatives of International labor defense; EP 545; see also C..... 560
Scheduled to come before supreme court; EP..... 320
United States supreme court sets aside death sentences; EP..... 467
- Neumann, Henry
On World congress against war, need for funds; C..... 533
- New Leader, The
Dismissal of E. Levinson as assistant editor; EP..... 21; see also C..... 171
- New York city
Election; Hillquit for mayor; EP..... 415
Election; independent vote; EP..... 488
Eviction cases; EP..... 600
Government changes suggested by A. E. Smith; E..... 581
Judiciary elections; EP..... 440
McKee breaks with Tammany hall; EP. 516
McKee, Joseph V., reformer? E. Levinson; S..... 605
Mayoralty candidates; EP..... 339
Walker—and after; E..... 244
Walker hearing; EP..... 155
Walker removal case before Governor Roosevelt; EP..... 134
Walker resigns; EP..... 221
- New York state
Gubernatorial campaign; EP..... 339
Gubernatorial campaign; Jew, H. H. Lehman, and gentile, W. J. Donovan, as candidates. O. G. Villard; S.... 345
Gubernatorial campaign; Lehman commended; EP..... 155
- New York telephone company
Donation to unemployment fund must be charged to profit and loss; EP.. 321
- Newspapers
Decrease in number; loss in depression; EP..... 441
Lying press, American; E..... 547
Pearson, D., Washington correspondent of Baltimore Sun, dismissed for being coauthor of More merry-go-round; EP..... 222; see also C..... 259, 354
- Nice, Constance
Indian bureau, criticism of; C..... 57
- Niebuhr, Reinhold
Thomas for president; C..... 147
- Night of June 13th, the. A. Bakshy; MP. 338
- Nomad, Max
Interprets his "Rebels and renegades"; C..... 258; see also book review.. 42; C..... 194
- Nona. J. W. Krutch; D..... 408
- Norman, Montagu Collet
Confession of helplessness; EP..... 413
- Northwest, revolt in. E. W. Shimmmons; S. 452
- Novels
"Only a novel"; E..... 118
- Nudism; Dt..... 56
Nudes and the law. M. L. Ernst; S.. 591
- Nurses. See Henry street settlement
- Nyland, W. A.; G. Munson and J. Riordan
Questionnaire on C. H. Douglas's views on economics, with answers; C..... 311
- O
- Office seekers. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 557
- Oil. See Persia
- Once in a lifetime. A. Bakshy; MP..... 513
- Oneal, James
On dismissal of E. Levinson from staff of New Leader; C..171; see also EP. 21
- Orchestras
Concerts, popular, New York city; E.. 245
- Orciani, Riccardo. See Sacco-Vanzetti
- Ottawa conference. See British empire
- Ownership, government
Chanute, Kansas. P. Meigs, third; C.. 400
Taxation eliminated in Kansas cities having public ownership; EP..... 134
- P
- Pacific islands
Mandated; fate if Japan leaves league of nations. E. D. H.; S..... 478
- Pacifism
European writers' anti-war congress. R. Baldwin; C..... 126
Peoples and wars. R. Rolland; S.... 251
Rombaut, C., French war resister, sentenced; E..... 24
- Palmer, Colonel Frederick
Deplores apathy toward political questions; EP..... 341
- Palmer, K. M.
Asks Nation readers in South Orange and Maplewood, New Jersey, to form club; C..... 311
- Papen, Chancellor von. See Germany
- Parker, Sir Gilbert; death; EP..... 243
- Parliament. See Great Britain
- Passionate pilgrim, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 464
- Patent medicines. See Drugs
- Patents; Dt..... 36
- Patriotic liars; E..... 223
- Paulding, J. K.
Asks for biographical material on C. B. Stover; C..... 561
- Peace
Stimson views; E..... 158

- Pearson, Drew
Dismissed by Baltimore Sun for being co-author of More merry-go-round;
EP...223; see also C...259; C, 354
Public works, curtailment; S... 640
Penny restaurant. B. Macfadden's; E... 70
Pennsylvania
Election; Hoover victory due to poll-tax disfranchisement. G. Seibel; C... 533
Election; prospects. T. S. Williams; S... 451
Pensions
Spanish-American war; E...298; C, with editorial comment... 480
Peoples and wars. R. Rolland; S... 251
Perkins, Alfred P.
On socialism; C...105; see also... 52
Persia
Anglo-Persian oil company; annulment of concession; and relations of Persia and Great Britain. J. Barber, junior;
S... 635
Trouble with Great Britain over annulment; EP... 581
Persinger, Mrs. D. W.
Ousted from Virginia congress of parents and teachers for allegiance to Thomas.
J. R. Reade; C... 457
Peru; case of Colombia against. J. Cardenas; C... 618
See also Bolivia-Peru
Pessimism, doom of. N. Arvin; C... 126
Petroleum. See Persia
Pettis, Ashley
Music, proletarian; S... 500
Philadelphia
Graft. S. Carson; S...279; see also C... 354
Philippine islands
Independence; congress vote for; EP... 627 Independence; hypocrisy. R. L. Buell;
S... 639
Philosophy
Return, possibility of. B. Ginzburg; S... 190
Photography
Art forms in nature, by K. Blossfeldt;
E... 520
Pittsburgh, university of Repression of liberalism; E... 343
Platforms, national. See Presidential campaign of 1932
Plaut, Margaret
What is left of Goethe? C... 12
Plays. See H. H.; Krutch, J. W.
Poems
Boy sowing. F. Frost... 593
Bread and wine. J. Rorty... 402
But Plato. J. Auslander... 214
Catch, the. R. P. T. Coffin... 611
Country clothes line, a. I. Schneider... 427
Dark woman. L. N. Jennings... 312
Desert picture. K. S. Alling... 589
Emerson: Last days at Concord. H.
Gregory... 59
Epilogue. F. Frost... 286
Fable. L. N. Jennings... 432
High city. L. Speyer... 260
Homage to an ancestor (1783-1880). H.
Gregory... 366
Inner temple, the. R. P. T. Coffin... 148
Last hour. L. N. Jennings... 39
Lion house, the. L. N. Jennings... 558
Midas touch. R. L. Holberg... 328
Mural for evening. L. N. Jennings... 173
Prelude. C. Aiken... 15; 85; 127; 231;
507; 565; 648
Say this of horses. M. H. Moody... 638
Shadows of leaf. R. Lechlitter... 534
Sonnet without words. M. Bodenheim... 460
Stone face. L. Ridge... 235
Strict acre. J. Auslander... 85
Time of mountains. T. H. Ferril... 195 Poetry
Civilization and the poet. J. W.
Krutch; S... 167
Poet, characteristics of. H. F. Reves;
C... 58
Poison for profit; patent medicine traffic.
F. J. Schlink and A. Kallet; S... 325;
346; 608... see also C... 561
Poisoning. See Food
Police
"Third degree"; Stark case in Nassau county, Long Island; EP... 94
Political front
Kansas. R. H. Bailey; S... 254
Texas. H. Preece; S... 255
Political prisoners
Fight for, in California. O. Johns; C... 285
Politics
Progressives only people awake to nation's condition; EP... 341
Pollak, Katherine H.
Relief for miners, appeal for; C... 459
Pope, Frederick
Works for United States recognition of soviet Russia; EP... 46
Postley, Maurice G.
Regulating utilities; C... 645
Pound, Roscoe
Indorses Hoover stand on prohibition;
EP... 221
Power and power industry
Holding companies, control advocated by power commission; EP... 94
Hoover attempt to wreck water power.
P. Y. Anderson; S... 447
Powers, James H.
Massachusetts drift to Hoover; S... 329
Preece, Harold
"Ma" Ferguson wins again; S... 255
Presidential campaign of 1932
Cabinet members take to stump. P. Y.
Anderson; S... 447
California, buying state for Hoover.
P. Y. Anderson; S... 392; S... 447
California, campaign in. R. E. Wade, junior; S... 350
Campaign touches low-water mark; EP... 439
Campaigning; Dt... 456
Coercion of employees; Ct... 417
College students' straw votes; EP... 440
Convention "bunkum." H. J. Smith; C... 126 Conventions debunked by radio. P. Y.
Anderson; S... 9
Conventions, national, cost of. W. H.
Y.; C... 147
Coolidge speech in New York; EP... 383
Democratic beer plank; EP... 45
Democratic trough at Chicago; S... 26
Elect them both. S. M. Berg; C... 258
Elections, primary, and presidential election; EP... 221
Elephant that did forget; Ct... 389
Explaining to Dmitri. M. Ryskind;
S... 125; S... 473
Garner activity; EP... 113
Handwriting on the wall; Ct... 445
Hoover, Herbert:
Campaign. P. Y. Anderson; S... 102
Defeat; E... 470
Goes on stump; EP... 439
Indianapolis speech; EP... 440
Misquotation of his own speech; EP... 467
Praises Hoover; E... 342
Prohibition stand indorsed by Dean
Pound; EP... 221
Takes up Ed Wynn's time on air; EP... 341
Iowa; safe for Republicans? D. R.
Murphy; S... 306
Johnson, Senator, against Hoover; EP... 383
La Follette comes out for Roosevelt; EP... 411
Last mile. P. Y. Anderson; S... 447
League for Independent political action indorses Thomas for president and generally progressive party platform;
EP... 46
Maine, election; EP... 268
Maine, election. P. Y. Anderson; S... 280
Maine, goes Democratic; EP... 241
Massachusetts drift to Hoover. J. H.
Powers; S... 329
Missouri. R. Coghlan; S... 422
Morning after; Ct... 472
Nation finds ideal candidate; EP... 383
National conference of business and industrial committees part of Hoover campaign; EP... 201
Northwest, revolt in. E. W. Shimmons;
S... 452
Ohio law bars minor candidates; EP... 113
Pennsylvania, Hoover victory due to poll-tax disfranchisement. G. Seibel; C... 533 Pennsylvania, prospects. T. E. Williams;
S... 451
Platforms, Republican and Democratic;
E... 23
Pot and the kettle:
Bipartisan hypocrisy. O. G. Villard; S... 247 Bipartisan tariff humbug. O. G. Villard; S... 418
Calling names. O. G. Villard; S... 446
Jew and Gentile in New York. O. G.
Villard; S... 345
On throwing away your vote. O. G.
Villard; S... 299
Our invisible government and "wasted votes." O. G. Villard; S... 229
Roosevelt and Hoover militarists both.
O. G. Villard; S... 390
Roosevelt turns to God. O. G. Villard; S... 324
Testimony of a great expert. O. G.
Villard; S... 274
Prohibition, Democratic and Republican strategy; EP... 201
Prophecies, straw votes and campaign chests. O. G. Villard; S... 206
Republican campaign desperation. P. Y.
Anderson; S... 331
Republican coercion of employees; EP... 411
Republicans try panic; E... 386
Result. P. Y. Anderson; S... 504
Result; Democratic revolution. O. Welsh;
S... 523
Road back, the; Ct... 273
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano:
And J. N. Garner nominated; E... 22
And Hoover, views on farm relief. P.
Y. Anderson; S... 280
Campaign; E... 414
Campaign addresses; EP... 181
Candidacy supported by progressives;
EP... 19
Leads in Iowa poll; EP... 293
Nomination. P. Y. Anderson; S... 54
Outlook bright; EP... 412
Radio speech; EP... 113
Renounces pretensions to progressivism; EP... 1
Speech on railroads; EP... 268
Speech on unemployment relief; EP... 383
Tour of west; EP... 319
Turns to progressives. P. Y. Anderson; S... 331
Victory; E... 490
Views on public utilities; E... 297
Sham battle, end of; E... 442
Socialist ticket; reasons for voting. M.
T. Amadell; C... 401
Socialist vote. C. P. Arnold; C... 646
Socialist vote disappointing; EP... 487
Thomas, Norman:
Campaign; EP... 439; see also EP... 439
Campaign as a futile gesture. A. C.
Hicks; C... 171; see also C... 233
Committee asks recruits. R. Niebuhr;
C... 147
Indorsed by League for independent political action; EP... 46
Pairing votes for. P. H. Douglas; C... 430
Pairing votes for. D. K. Hoan; C... with editorial comment... 560
Showing in Literary Digest poll; EP... 384 Supporters in Cincinnati asked to organize. M. D. Britte; C... 283
"Turning the tide" for Hoover. P. Y.
Anderson; S... 392
Wisconsin turns to Roosevelt. W. T.
Evjue; S... 425
Presidential election. See Presidential campaign of 1932
Press. See Newspapers
Primary elections. See Presidential campaign of 1932
Prisoners, political. See Political prisoners
Program for revolt, a. D. Allen; S... 80 Prohibition
Ballyhoo. B. F. Thompson; C... 284
Beer and taxation. P. Y. Anderson; S... 557
Beer and unemployment; Ct... 25
Beer bill; no likelihood at present session. P. Y. Anderson; S... 54
Beer, down with. M. L. Ernst; S... 644
Butler liquor-control plan; EP... 294
Curtis, Vice president, against repeal.
P. Y. Anderson; S... 230
Democratic beer plank; EP... 45
Home Friend Magazine letters show anti-prohibition sentiment prevalent in small towns. I. L. Cowan; C... 194
Hoover stand indorsed by Dean Pound;
EP... 221
Repeal first; E... 603
Repeal, pending. F. R. Black; S... 428
Repeal, vote on. P. Y. Anderson; S... 610
Taking profit out of liquor traffic suggested. C. J. Lavery; C... 233
Victory in election; EP... 487
See also Presidential campaign of 1932
Prosperity
Prosperity, true and false; reply to U.
Sinclair. R. Vance; C... 234
Prussia
Militarists in control; E... 98
Public ownership. See Ownership, government
Public utilities
Decisions, two, of importance; EP... 66
Donation to unemployment fund must be charged to profit and loss, interstate commerce commission decides; EP... 321
Regulation; S. P. Harman; S... 106
Regulation. M. G. Postley; C... 645
Roosevelt, F. D., views on. R. Moley;
C... 82; see also C... 22; E... 297
Public works
Consortium, European; EP... 516
Curtailment. D. Pearson; S... 640
Putnam, Amelia Earhart
Achievements; EP... 202
R Racketeers. See Labor
Radicals
Jews as radicals. W. Seagle; S... 307
Radio
Debunks political conventions. P. Y.
Anderson; S... 9
Decrees against patent combination; EP... 544
WEVD rebuilt and rededicated; EP... 321
Rager, Fritz
Looks at American federation of labor;
S... 614

- Railroads
Consolidation of eastern lines; EP.... 94
Roosevelt, F. D., views; EP..... 268
Unions. See Labor unions
Wages, negotiations; EP..... 628
- Ratcliffe, S. K.
Wallas, Graham, death; S..... 232
- Ravel piano concerto. A. Mendel; M..... 652
- Rebels without ideas; E..... 184
- Reconstruction finance corporation
Attempt to buy California for Hoover.
P. Y. Anderson; S..... 447
Bootstrap economics; E..... 156
Democrats put in control; EP..... 113
Loans; EP..... 269
Loans, discrimination in making; EP.... 133
- Regulation of public utilities. See Public utilities
- Religion. See Churches
- Rent strike, New York; E..... 344
- Reparations. See War debts and reparations
- Republican party
Future; EP..... 487
Future. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 557
See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- Reserve officers' training corps. See Militarism
- Restaurant, penny. B. Macfadden's; E.... 70
- Reszke, Jean and Edouard de
Biographical material sought. C. M. Leiser; C..... 83
- Reves, Haviland Ferguson
Poet, characteristics of; C..... 58
- Revolt, a program for. D. Allen; S..... 80
- Richard, Frances G.
Styles for the unemployed; C..... 560
- Ridge, Lola
Stone face; P..... 235
- Riordan, John; G. Munson, and W. A. Nyland
Questionnaire on C. H. Douglas's views on economics, with answers; C..... 311
- Rivers; Dt..... 283; 353
- Roads, dirt; Dt..... 429
- Robinson, William J.
Russia has changed; C....311; see also 195
- Robson, William A.
British parliamentary crisis; S..... 549
- Roche, Josephine
Receives honorary degree from Smith college; EP..... 47
- Rockwell, Harrison
On church and social problems; C..310; see also E..... 246
- Rodriguez, General Abelardo L.
Mexico's new "finger-president." A. Harris; S..... 327
- Rolland, Romain
Peoples and wars; S..... 251
- Rombaut, Camille, sentenced; E..... 24
- Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
Inauguration to be simple; EP..... 579
On federal aid for unemployed; EP.... 467
Public utilities, views on. R. Moley; C.....82; see also C..... 22
Renounces pretension to progressivism; EP..... 1
Tariff nonsense; E.....270; see also C 532
Walker removal case; EP.....134
See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- Roosevelt, Theodore
On both major political parties as machines. O. G. Villard; S..... 274
- Rorty, James
Bread and wine; P..... 402
- Rorty, James, and L. Nadejena
Shock brigades. Translated by L. Nadejena and J. Rorty..... 496
- Rumania
Apprehension in; EP..... 628
- Russia
Artist in. L. Lozowick; S..... 35
Factory, a week in. L. Fischer; S..... 248
Fifteen years of the soviets. L. Fischer; S..... 492
Fisheries treaty with Japan, and peace policy; EP..... 153
Land of youth. H. F. Ward; S..... 103
Lectures by American-Russian institute on cultural relations. W. T. Brown; C..... 284
Methods, official; Dt..... 505
Music, proletarian. A. Pettis; S..... 500
Private profits in Russia. L. Fischer; S. 159
Progress and poverty. L. Fischer; S..... 552
Questions answered. L. Fischer; S..... 6
Recognition, by Roosevelt administration; EP..... 580
Recognition by United States. L. Fischer; S..... 633
Recognition, work of. F. Pope; EP..... 46
Russian-French treaty signed; EP..... 543
Scheffer, P., case of. L. Fischer; S.... 195
Shock brigades. Translated by L. Nadejena and J. Rorty..... 496
Soviet-Japanese deal against America? L. Fischer; S..... 419
- War with Japan. L. Fischer; S..... 50
Women. L. Nadejena; S..... 498
Youth in Russia. S. Trone; C..... 505
See also Chinese-Russia relations
- Ryskind, Morrie
Letters to Dmitri; S..... 125; 473
What really happened; S..... 256
- S
- Sacco-Vanzetti
Bombing of Thayer home not in keeping with past actions of sympathizers; EP 320
Not forgotten. P. Walsh; C..... 146
On Sacco and Vanzetti, and the case of Buda and Orciani. E. H. James; C.... 146
- Saint David's island; Dt..... 645
- Saint Lawrence waterway development
Agreement with Canada. R. Finney; S. 119
Agreement with Canada signed; EP.... 93
Hoover refusal to confer with Roosevelt. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 102 Hoover-Roosevelt correspondence; EP... 45
- Saint Louis
Unemployment crisis; EP..... 65
- Scheffer, Paul
Case of. L. Fischer; S..... 195
- Scherman, Harry
What England could have said; S..... 637
- Schleicher, Chancellor von. See Germany
- Schlink, F. J., and A. Kallet
Bad Drugs and the Law; S..... 346
Poison for Profit; S..... 608
Eat and be poisoned; S..... 325
- Schnader, William A.
Defends record; C.....354; see also 279
- Schneider, Isidor
Country clothes line, a; P..... 427
- Schroeter, J. P.
On socialism; C.....105; see also 52
- Schumacher, John J.
On academic freedom at Southwestern university; C.....479; see also EP 242
- Schwedersky, Herve
Sugar tariff; S..... 426
- Scott, Sir Walter
"Social significance" E..297; see also C 400
- Scottsboro case. See Negroes
- Sculpture with dynamite; Dt..... 617
- Seagle, William
Constitution, methods of amending; S... 141
Jews as radicals; S..... 307
- Seco, Lawrence J.
Plea for miners; C..... 646
- Securities. See Stocks and bonds
- Seibel, George
Pennsylvania election; why Hoover won; C..... 533
- Seipel, Ignaz
Death; EP..... 135
- Senior, Clarence
Socialist locals; C.....647; see also EP 439
- Sex
In the arts; E..... 547
Wins in America. M. L. Ernst; S..122; see also E.....271; C....355; C.... 400
- Shimmons, Earl Wright
Northwest, revolt in; S..... 452
- Shipping
Subsidies; E..... 603
Shock brigades. Translated by L. Nadejena and J. Rorty..... 496
- Show business. See Theater, the
- Show off, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 654
- Siam; revolution; EP..... 3
- Sign of the cross. A. Bakshy; MP..... 624
- Sin; Southern baptists' handbook's views; EP..... 469
- Sinclair, Upton
Crises, cause and cure; C..83; see also C..... 234
- Slatin pasha, Rudolf; death; E..... 387
- Slochow, Harry
What is left of Goethe? C..... 12
- Slums. See Housing
- Small, Len
Tries comeback. I. Dilliard; S..... 352
Smiles; Dt..... 559
Smiling faces. H. H.; D..... 266
- Smith, Alfred Emanuel
Editor of the New Outlook; EP..... 202
New York city government, changes suggested; E..... 581
What really happened. M. Ryskind; S. 256
- Smith, H. Jeffrey
Convention "bunkum"; C..... 126
- Smith, W. Millar
Tariff, "effective"; C, with editorial comment; see also E..... 270
- Smyth, W. H.
"Technocracy"; C..... 646
- Social hygiene
Vera Cruz system; EP..... 629
- Social insurance. See Insurance, social
- Socialism
I teach socialism. A. Templar; C..... 82
Open letter to O. G. Villard by N. Thomas, and replies....52; see also C. 105
- Socialist party
Dissension; EP..... 21
Future. G. Heater and N. Thomas; S. 584
See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- South, the Intolerance. J. R. Meade; C..... 457
See also Labor
- South Africa
Race problem growing; EP..... 340
- Southern Baptists' handbook on sin; EP.... 469
- Southwestern university
Gallagher, L., forced out of staff for defending political minorities; EP.242; see also C..... 479
- Soviet Russia. See Russia
- Spain
And France; Herriot visit to Spain. E. D. H.; S..... 531
Land reforms; EP..... 242
Land reforms. E. D. H.; S..... 348
Monarchist revolt fails; EP..... 154
Republic meets test. B. W. Diffie; S.. 226
Spanish-American war pensions; E.....298; C, with editorial comment..... 480
- Speculation. See Stocks and bonds
- Speyer, Leonora
High city; P..... 260
- Spinoza, Baruch
Spinoza: 1632-1932. B. Ginzburg; S.. 528
- Spreeckels, Rudolph
On destruction of capital by competitors; C..... 333
- Standardization; E..... 416
- Stark, Hyman. See Police
- Steel and iron
Industry, new policy needed; EP..... 132
- Stein, Gertrude
"Scenery and George Washington: A novel or a play"; comment on; EP.. 67
- Stephens, C. F.
On Spanish-American war pensions; C, with editorial comment....480; see also E..... 298
- Stewart, Maxwell S.
War-debt misconceptions; S..... 524
- Stimson, Secretary Henry Lewis
Defends Hoover; EP..... 319
On peace; E..... 158
- Stimson doctrine
New policy on recognition of gains by war; E..... 137
- Stocks and bonds
Forecasters, professional. W. H. Garfield; S..... 162
Stock market recovery; EP....133; E... 245
- Stokowski, Leopold. A. Mendel; M..... 652
- Stover, Charles B.; biographical material asked. J. K. Paulding; C..... 561
- Strange interlude. A. Bakshy; MP..... 292
- Stresa conference. See Europe, central
- Stresemann, Gustav
Letters published; he is accused of duplicity; EP..... 340
- Strike, cotton. See Cotton industry
- Students
Foreign must not compete with Americans; EP..... 320
- Subsidies, shipping; E..... 603
- Subway
New York city line opened; EP..... 242
- Success story. J. W. Krutch; D..... 336
- Sugar
Tariff. H. Schwedersky; S..... 426
- Sumner, William Graham
Free trader, quoted by Mills, protectionist. A. McCurdy; C..... 333
- Supreme court, United States
Gerrymander, supreme court and; E.... 443
Liberal trend; EP..... 320
Scottsboro case; sets aside death sentences; EP..... 467
- Switzerland
Firing on radicals in Geneva; EP..... 488
- T
- Tabasco sauce. See House of commons
- Tall tales; Dt..... 106
- Tampa, Florida
Reign of terror. A. Brenner; S..555; see also C..... 647
- Tariff
British imperial conference seeks formula. S. P. Harman; S..... 84
"Effective." W. M. Smith; C, with editorial comment....532; see also E.... 270
- Tariff, Danish
Government plans to remove restrictions; EP..... 600
- Tariff, French
Complaints against rates and quota arrangements growing; EP..... 20
- Tariff, United States
Bipartisan humbug. O. G. Villard; S.. 418
Hawley-Smoot tariff, effect of; EP.... 384
Mills, protectionist, quotes Sumner, free trader. A. McCurdy; C..... 333 Reduction needed for business recovery; EP..... 579

- Roosevelt nonsense; E...270; see also C. 532
 Sugar. H. Schwedersky; S..... 426
 See also "Buy American" movement;
 Trade, foreign
- Tariff, world
 Ottawa agreements raise tariffs; EP.... 384
- Taxation
 Effort to reduce expenditures; EP..... 114
 New. S. P. Harman; S..... 14
 Sales tax, prospects. P. Y. Anderson;
 S..... 557
- Teachers
 New York city unemployed; C..... 284
- Teall, Dorothy
 Seeks biographical material on R. Bourne;
 C..... 592
- "Technocracy"
 Definition. W. H. Smyth; C..... 646
 Report on modern technology; E..... 205
- Telephones
 Decision, two, of importance; EP..... 66
- Templar, Anne
 I teach socialism; C..... 82
- Texas
 Ferguson, "Ma," wins again. H. Preece;
 S..... 255
- Thayer, Judge Webster. See Sacco-Vanzetti
- Theater, the Show business. I. Crisis in the theater.
 J. W. Krutch; S..... 211
 II. How it works. J. W. Krutch; S..... 227
 III. What it costs. J. W. Krutch; S..... 252
 IV. Can anything be done? J. W.
 Krutch; S..... 277
- "Third degree." See Police
- Thomas, Norman
 On Lehman and Waldman as gubernatorial candidates; C..... 213
 On socialist party's future; reply to G. Heatter; S..... 584
 Open letter to O. G. Villard, and replies.....52; see also C..... 105
 Receives degree of doctor of letters from Princeton university; EP..... 47
 See also Presidential campaign of 1932
- Thomas, Norman, and P. Blanshard
 Jimmy Walker; S..... 300
- Thompson, B. F.
 Prohibition ballyhoo; C..... 284
- Three letters; E..... 224
- Tippett, Tom
 West Virginia coal miners; C..... 57
- Towne, Orwell Bradley
 On dismissal of R. S. Allen; C.....354; see also EP..... 223
- Trade, foreign
 "Dumping," hearings on; EP..... 441
- Travel; Dt..... 212
- Trone, S.
 Youth in Russia; C..... 505
- Trouble in Paradise. A. Bakshy; MP..... 576
- U
- Unemployed teachers' association
 On situation in New York city; C..... 284
- Unemployment
 And beer; Ct..... 25
 Appeals for aid; three letters; E..... 224
 Babson's views; Dt..... 145
 Billions for relief. M. A. Hallgren;
 S.....521; see also E..... 518
 Boys, homeless and workless; EP..... 544
 British. See Great Britain
 Cartoon..... 97
 Condition; progressives only people awake; EP..... 341
 Deaths from starvation; Wlosinski case;
 EP..... 579
 Detroit; danger in. M. A. Hallgren; S. 99
 Domestic workers reject work at low wages, in Connecticut; EP..... 545
 Figures by United States bureau of labor statistics and National industrial conference board; EP..... 181
 Fun to be hungry? J. R. McAllister; S. 530
 "Good-for-nothing," case of; C..... 430
 Hoover holds up federal relief; EP..... 1
 Hunger march on Washington. E. Dahlberg; S..... 642
 Hunger marchers, treatment. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 610
 Hunger riots and malnutrition; EP..... 544
 "Jungle," in the. H. M. Ware and L. Harris; S..... 55
 Lay-offs and profits; E..... 388
 Letter to President Hoover. S. Anderson; S..... 191
 Murder, Mr. Hoover? E.....96; see also C..... 171
 Relief and politics; E..... 49
 Roosevelt, F. D., on federal aid; EP... 467
 Roosevelt speech; EP..... 383
 Saint Louis; crisis; EP..... 65
 Starvation threatens; E.....518; see also..... 521
 Styles for the unemployed. F. G. Richard; C..... 560
- Too many "armies"; EP..... 154
- United States need greater than last year; EP..... 488
 See also Business depression
- Union of soviet socialist republics. See Russia
- Unions, labor. See Labor unions
- Utilities, public. See Public utilities
- United mine workers of America. See Coal miners, American
- United States
 Finances; "balancing" the budget; EP.....241; EP..... 411
 Finances; budget, balancing. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 280
 Finances; budget message; taxes or economies? E..... 602
 Finances; economy bill as signed by Hoover; EP..... 19
 Japan, relations with; United States fleet in Pacific irritates Japanese; EP. 580
 Mussolini wanted. P. Y. Anderson; S... 9
 United States supreme court. See Supreme court
- Universities. See Colleges and universities
- Utilities, public. See Public utilities
- V
- Vacations
 Ideals; E..... 137
- Vance, Ray
 On prosperity, true and false; reply to U. Sinclair; C..... 234
- Van Cleef, Eugene
 Geography, modern teaching; C..... 355
- Van Doren, Mark
 Description of poet discussed. H. F. Reves; C..... 58
- Vanities. J. W. Krutch; D..... 375
- Van Leeuwenhoek, Anthony. See Leeuwenhoek, A. van
- Van Loon, Hendrik Willem
 On geography; E.....205; see also C.... 355
- Vera Cruz, Mexico
 Social hygiene, system; EP..... 629
- Veterans
 Bonus; American legion demands payment; EP..... 201
 Bonus; and hunger marchers. F. Morros; C..... 619
 Bonus; Willard Straight post suspended for opposition; EP..... 67
 Bonus expeditionary force:
 Baby's death from gassing. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 189
 Bloodshed in Washington; E..... 116
 Eviction. P. Y. Anderson; S. 138; S. 280
 Eviction defended by F. T. Davison. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 230
 "Excuses" for eviction action; EP... 241
 Goes home; EP..... 134
 Glassford reply to Mitchell attack on bonus army; E..... 269
 In Washington; impending danger. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 102
 Investigation needed. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 189
 Not a "communist uprising" in Washington. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 189
 Not treated properly; EP..... 20
 Scares Hoover. M. A. Hallgren; S... 71
 Writers call on Hoover to protest; he is "too busy" to see them; EP..... 154
 Curtis, vice-president, reply to heckler on feeding veterans; EP..... 115
 Effort to reduce expenditures; EP..... 114
- Villard, Henry Hilgard
 Manchukuo; S..... 421
- Villard, Oswald Garrison
 Asks help, with others, for Brookwood labor college; C..... 592
 Democratic trough at Chicago; S..... 26
 Open letter to, by N. Thomas, and replies; S...52; see also C..... 105
- Pot and the kettle:
 Bipartisan hypocrisy; S..... 247
 Bipartisan tariff humbug; S..... 418
 Calling names; S..... 446
 Jew and gentile in New York; S..... 345
 On throwing away your vote; S..... 299
 Our invisible government and "wasted" votes; S..... 229
 Roosevelt and Hoover militarists both; S..... 390
 Roosevelt turns to God; S..... 324
 Testimony of a great expert; S..... 274
 Presidential campaign of 1932; Prophecies, straw votes, and campaign chests; S..... 206
- Virginia congress of parents and teachers.
 Ousts president for allegiance to Thomas. J. R. Meade; C..... 457
- W
- Wade, Robert E., junior
 California, presidential campaign in; S. 350
- Wages. See Railroads
- Wagner, Senator Robert Ferdinand
 Record; EP..... 412
- Walcott, Dr. Henry P.; death; EP..... 545
- Walk a little faster. J. W. Krutch; D.... 654
- Walker, James John
 Jimmy Walker. N. Thomas and P. Blanshard; S..... 300
 See also New York city
- Wallas, Graham
 Death; EP..... 155
 Death. S. K. Ratcliffe; S..... 232
- Walsh, Pitman
 On Sacco-Vanzetti; C..... 146
- War
 Aerial; "civilized"; EP..... 114
 Aftermath in pensions and bonuses; E.....298; see also C, with editorial comment..... 480
 European writers' anti-war congress. R. Baldwin; C..... 126
 Next. L. Adamic; C..... 310
 Peoples and Wars. R. Rolland; S..... 251
 See also Pacifism; Peace; Stimson doctrine
- War claims
 Black Tom explosion case decided in favor of Germany; EP..... 629
- War debts and reparations
 British note; what Great Britain could have said. H. Scherman; S..... 637
 Debts and United States taxpayers; E... 582
 German political situation dependent on settlement; EP..... 2
 Great Britain and France ask postponement of their December war-debt payment; E..... 491
 Hoover plan for reduction in exchange for markets; EP..... 516
 Hoover-Roosevelt fencing match. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 557
 Hoover special message; EP..... 627
 Hoover "warns" Europe; E..... 68
 How Germany may pay. S. P. Harman; S..... 38
 Know-nothingism wins; E..... 546
 Lausanne conference; EP..... 19
 Lausanne conference reaches agreement; settlement terms; E..... 48
 Misconceptions. M. S. Stewart; S.... 524
 New conference favored by Senator Borah; EP..... 93
 Refusal of United States officials to consider reduction or cancellation; E..... 517
 United States and its debtors; E..... 630
- War, European. See European war
- Ward, Harry F.
 Soviet Russia—land of youth; S..... 103
- Ware, Harold M., and L. Harris
 In the "jungle"; S..... 55
- Washington, District of Columbia
 Marches on capital; plans to meet; EP. 441
- Washington correspondents. See Newspapers
- Washington Evening Star
 Desire to stand in with "ins." P. Y. Anderson; S..... 557
- Washington merry-go-round. A. Bakshy; MP..... 466
- Watson, Blanche
 Crises, cause and cure; C..... 83
- Weevil, boll. See Cotton
- Welsh, Orville
 Democratic revolution, the; S..... 523
- West Virginia. See Coal miners, American
- WEVD. See Radio
- What I believe
 Aiken, C; S..... 79
 Catlin, G. E. C.; S..... 398
- What price Hollywood? A. Bakshy; MP.. 111
- Wheat
 Farm board's new policy; EP..... 241
 Panic in; E..... 471
- When ladies meet. J. W. Krutch; D.... 408
- White, E. Michael
 On Nation's support of H. H. Lehman; C..... 213
- White Plains, New York
 Unwarranted arrests; EP..... 183
- "Who" and "whom," use of. M. M. Moreland; C..... 234
- "Who's Who in America"; E..... 323
- Wilkerson, Judge James H.
 Promotion prevented. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 102
- Willard Straight post. See American legion
- Williams, John Sharp
 Death; EP..... 321
- Williams, Thomas E.
 Pennsylvania election prospects; S..... 451
- Wilson, Woodrow
 For war in March, 1916. C. H. Grat-tan; S.....76; see also..... 588
- Wisconsin
 Cichon eviction case; violence used; EP. 600
 Election. W. T. Eyjue; S..... 425
 Kohler denies blaming Hoover for defeat in 1930; C..... 619; see also... 331
 Progressives' defeat. P. Y. Anderson; S.....331; see also C..... 619
 Result of Republican primary election a blow to liberalism; EP..... 293
 Still progressive; EP..... 516

- Wisconsin telephone company
Decision orders rate reduction; EP.... 66
With Williamson beneath the sea. A. Bakshy; MP..... 624
Wittpenn, Caroline Stevens
Death; EP..... 601
Wlosinski, Ignatz; death from starvation; EP..... 579
Wohlforth, Robert
Reserve officers' training corps as a peace society; S.....10; see also C.... 172
Women
Soviet. L. Nadejina; S..... 498
Woolworth's; Dt..... 332
Works, public. See Public works
World congress against war
Need for funds. H. Neumann; C.... 533
World economic conference
Expenses causing trouble. E. D. H.; S. 531
World Jewish congress. See Jews
World war. See European war

Y

- Y., W. H.
Cost of national conventions; C..... 147
Young, Owen D.
Insult system, testimony; EP..... 627
On "preferred list" of the Insults. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 392
Young progressive league
Formed. I. Ellentuck; C..... 284
Yugoslavia. See Jugoslavia

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.
The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

- B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

- Æ
Song and its fountains; AN..... 219
Ackerley, J. R.
Hindoo holiday; AN..... 151
Adams, James Truslow
March of democracy, the; B..... 622
Adams, James Truslow; R..... 482
Adams, John Quincy, biography. B. C. Clark; B..... 435
Afternoons in Utopia. S. Leacock; AN.... 538
Aldington, Richard
Soft answers; AN..... 62
Alexander the great, two books on; B..... 404
Alexander the great. U. Wilcken. Translated by G. C. Richards; B..... 404
Allen, Devere; R..... 109
American foreign policy in Mexican relations. J. M. Callahan; AN..... 265
American jitters, the. E. Wilson; B..... 17
American literature and culture. G. C. Knight; AN..... 150
American poets, 1630-1930. Edited by M. Van Doren; AN..... 464
Anderson, Florence Bennett
Through the hawse-hole. The true story of a Nantucket whaling captain; B..... 289
Anderson, Sherwood
Beyond desire; B..... 432
Anonymous
Babylon on Hudson; AN..... 62
Before the curtain falls; AN..... 575
Washington merry-go-round; B..... 537
Applegate, Frank G.
Native tales of New Mexico; AN..... 290
Art and artist. O. Rank. Translated by C. F. Atkinson; B..... 569
Art forms in nature. K. Blossfeldt; E.... 520
Arvin, Newton; B..... 648
As I see it. N. Thomas; B..... 109
As it looks to young China. Edited by W. Hung; AN..... 239
As we are. E. F. Benson; AN..... 595
August, Garry
God's gentleman; AN..... 17
Austin, Mary
Earth horizon. An autobiography; B.. 567
Azuela, Mariano
Marcella. A. Brenner, translator; AN. 538

B

- Babbitt, Irving
On being creative; B..... 148
Babylon on Hudson. Anonymous; AN.... 62
Bailey, Cyril
Phases in the religion of ancient Rome and other classical lectures; AN..... 317
Baker, George
Ebenezer walks with God; AN..... 264

- Baker, Newton D., G. S. Counts, L. Villari and M. C. Rorty
Bolshevism, fascism, and capitalism; B. 237
Baker, Ray Stannard
Woodrow Wilson: Life and letters. Vol. III, IV.; AN..... 131
Bancroft, Frederic
Slave-trading in the old south; B..... 150
Baring, Maurice
Lost lectures, or the fruits of experience; AN..... 374
Barnes, Harry Elmer
Can man be civilized? B..... 463
Prohibition versus civilization; B..... 42
Barringer, Marie
Martin the goose boy; AN..... 596
Bates, Ernest Sutherland; R..... 534
Beals, Carleton
Porfirio Diaz: Dictator of Mexico; AN. 651
Beebe, William
Nonsuch: Land of water; AN..... 110
Before the curtain falls. Anonymous; AN. 575
Benét, William Rose
Rip tide. A nove in verse; B..... 434
Bennett, Arnold
Journal, 1896-1910; B..... 85
Journal, 1911-1920; AN..... 595
Benson, E. F.
As we are; AN..... 595
Charlotte Brontë; B..... 286
Benson, Stella
Faraway bride, the; AN..... 90
Bentley, Phyllis Inheritance; B..... 313
Between white and red. E. Dwinger. Translated by M. Saunders; B..... 197
Beveridge and the progressive era. C. G. Bowers; B..... 261
Beyond desire. S. Anderson; B..... 432
Black mischief. E. Waugh; B..... 335
Blessed Spinoza. L. Browne; AN..... 575
Block, Marguerite
New church in the new world, the: A study of Swedenborgianism in America; B..... 236
Blodgett, Ruth
Home is the sailor; AN..... 198
Blood of the lamb. M. Mark; AN..... 623
Bloody years. F. Yeats-Brown; AN..... 596
Blossfeldt, Karl
Art forms in nature; E..... 520
Boleslavski, Richard
Way of the lancer, the. Written in collaboration with H. Woodward; AN. 18
Bolshevism, fascism, and capitalism. G. S. Counts, L. Villari, M. C. Rorty and N. D. Baker; B..... 237
Bolshevism: Theory and practice. W. Gurian. Translated by E. I. Watkin; B. 237
Bonn, M. J.
Crisis of capitalism in America, the; B. 128
Book of living verse, the. Edited by L. Untermeyer; AN..... 130
Bowers, Claude G.
Beveridge and the progressive era; B.. 261
Boyhood and youth. H. Carossa. Translated by A. N. Scott; AN..... 238
Boyle, Kay
Year before last; B..... 60
Breakdown. R. Briffault; C.....36; C 170
Brehm, Bruno
They call it patriotism. M. Goldsmith, translator; AN..... 151
Brenner, Anita
Your Mexican holiday. A modern guide; AN..... 90
Briffault, Robert
Breakdown; C.....36; C 170
Briggs, Martin S.
Homes of the pilgrim fathers in England and America (1620-1685), the; AN... 652
Brinsler, H. A.; R..... 130
Broch, Hermann
Sleepwalkers, the. W. and E. Muir, translators; B..... 574
Brody, Catharine
Nobody starves; AN..... 539
Broken house. A. Smith; B..... 461
Bromfield, Louis
Modern hero, a; B..... 40
Brontë, Charlotte. E. F. Benson; B..... 286
Brooks, Van Wyck
Sketches in criticism; B..... 556
Brown, John, biography. L. Ehrlich; B.... 621
Brown, Ray C. B.; R..... 483
Brown, Sterling
Southern road; AN..... 43
Browne, Lewis
Blessed Spinoza; AN..... 575
Bruun, Geoffrey
Saint Just; AN..... 624
Buchan, John
Julius Caesar; AN..... 484
Sir Walter Scott; B..... 403
Buck, Pearl S.
Sons; B..... 481
Young revolutionist, the; B..... 108
Burke, Kenneth; R..... 536

- Burnett, W. R.
Giant swing, the; AN..... 464
Burning bush, the. S. Undset. Translated by A. G. Chater; B..... 263
Business and politics in the far east. E. E. Ware; B..... 174
Butler, Samuel, biography. C. G. Stillman; B. 462

C

- Caldwell, Erskine
Tobacco road; B..... 16
Callahan, James Morton
American foreign policy in Mexican relations; AN..... 265
Calverton, V. F.
Liberation of American literature, the; B. 571
Calverton, V. F.; R....42; see also C..194, 258
Can man be civilized? H. E. Barnes; B.. 463
Cantwell, Robert; R..60, 128, 149, 263, 335, 372
Capital question of China, the. L. Curtis; AN..... 437
Captive shrew, the. J. Huxley; AN..... 264
Carlisle, Helen Grace
We begin; AN..... 180
Carson the advocate. E. Marjoribanks; AN. 538
Carossa, Hans
Boyhood and youth. A. N. Scott, translator; AN..... 238
Carswell, Catherine
Savage pilgrimage, the. A narrative of D. H. Lawrence; AN..... 538
Cary, Max
Legacy of Alexander, the: A history of the Greek world from 323 B. C. to 146 B. C.; B..... 404
Case is altered, the. W. Plomer; AN..... 336
Caste and race in India. G. S. Ghurye; AN. 624
Cather, Willa
Obscure destinies; B..... 107
Catholic faith, the. P. E. More; B..... 176
Causes of war, the. Sir A. Salter and others; B..... 287
Chadourne, Marc
China. H. Block, translator; AN..... 17
Chamberlain, John
Farewell to reform; B..... 650
Chamberlain, John; R..... 571
Chamberlin, W. H., W. Duranty, H. R. Knickerbocker, and others
Red economics; B..... 507
Chaos is come again. C. Houghton; AN... 180
Charlotte Brontë. E. F. Benson; B..... 286
Chase, Stuart; R..... 128
Chaucer. G. K. Chesterton; B..... 315
Chesterton, G. K.
Chaucer; B..... 315
Chih Meng
China speaks on the conflict between China and Japan; B..... 108
China; three books on; B..... 174
China. M. Chadourne. Translated by H. Block; AN..... 18
China and Japan; seven books on; B..... 108
China speaks on the conflict between China and Japan. Chih Meng; B..... 108 Chinaberry tree, the. J. Fauset; B..... 88
Clark, Bennett Champ
John Quincy Adams, "Old man eloquent"; B..... 435
Clemens, Samuel Langhorne. See De Voto, B.
Cochran, M. H.
Germany not guilty in 1914; B..... 316
Cocteau, Jean
Opium. E. Boyd, translator; B..... 370
Codman, Florence R..... 622
Cohen, Morris S.; R..... 368
Cohen-Portheim, Paul
Time stood still; B..... 89
Colette
Ripening, the. I. Zeitlin, translator; AN. 218
Collected papers of Charles S. Peirce. Edited by C. Hartshorne and P. Weiss. Volume I. Principles of philosophy. Volume II. Elements of logic; B.... 368
Colum, Padraic
Poems; AN..... 317
Conflict of the individual and the mass in the modern world, the. E. D. Martin; B. 15
Cooper, Duff
Talleyrand; AN..... 624
Counts, George S., L. Villari, M. C. Rorty and N. D. Baker
Bolshevism, fascism, and capitalism; B. 237
Coup d'état: The technique of revolution. C. Malaparte. Translated by S. Saunders; B..... 86
Cournos, John
Devil is an English gentleman, the; B.. 129
Cournos, John; R.....197, 574
Coyle, Kathleen
There is a door; AN..... 264
Criminals and politicians. D. T. Lynch; AN. 596
Crisis of capitalism in America, the. M. J. Bonn; B..... 128
Curtis, Lionel
Capital question of China, the; AN.... 437

- D
- Dabney, Virginius
Liberalism in the south; B..... 534
- Dahlberg, Edward
From Flushing to Calvary; B..... 483
- Dark land, the. Poems by K. T. Young; AN 150
- Davenport, Marcia
Mozart; B..... 483
- Dawn in Russia. W. Frank; B..... 237
- Dawson, Christopher Making of Europe, the; AN..... 575
- Death in the afternoon. E. Hemingway; B 461
- Decline of the I. W. W., the. J. S. Gamps; B 173
- De Kruif, Paul
Men against death; B..... 651
- Dell, Floyd
Diana Star; AN..... 509
- Dennis, Lawrence
Is capitalism doomed? B..... 88
- Deutsch, Babette; R..... 373
- Devil is an English gentleman, the. J. Cournos; B..... 129
- De Voto, Bernard
Mark Twain's America; B..... 370
- Diana Stair. F. Dell; AN..... 509
- Diary of an ex-president, the. J. P. Wintergreen; edited by M. Ryskind; B..... 148
- Diaz, Porfirio, biography. C. Beals; AN.. 651
- Dictator. G. Slocombe; AN..... 18
- Dimnet, Ernest
What men live by; AN..... 538
- Doom of youth, the. W. Lewis; letter by N. Arvin..... 126
- Drama of life after death, the. G. Lawton; AN..... 464
- Duranty, Walter. W. H. Chamberlin, H. R. Knickerbocker, and others
Red economics; B..... 507
- Dutton, Charles J.
Samaritans of Molokai, the; AN..... 198
- Duun, Olav
Odin in fairyland. A. G. Chater, translator; AN..... 264
- Dwinger, Erich
Between white and red. M. Saunders, translator; B..... 197
- E
- Earth horizon. An autobiography by M. Austin; B..... 567
- East of Eden. I. Glenn; AN..... 652
- Ebenezer walks with God. G. Baker; AN.. 264
- Eckstein, Gustav
Lives; AN..... 131
- Economic stabilization in an unbalanced world. A. H. Hansen; B..... 262
- Edel, Leon
Prefaces of Henry James, the; B..... 149
- Education and the modern world. B. Russell; B..... 534
- Ehrlich, Leonard
God's angry man; B..... 621
- Eighteen-sixties, the. Edited by J. Drinkwater; B..... 288
- Eliat, Helene
Sheba visits Solomon. D. Zabłodowsky, translator; AN..... 109
- Eliot, George. life of, the. E. and G. Romieu. Translated by B. W. Downs; B..... 236
- Eliot, T. S.
Selected essays: 1917-1932; B..... 312
- Emerson, Ralph Waldo
Uncollected lectures. Edited by C. Gohedes; AN..... 539
- English in India, the. A problem of politics. Sir John A. R. Marriott; AN..... 316
- English painting from the seventh century to the present day. C. Johnson; AN.. 510
- Era of the muckrakers, the. C. C. Regier; B 650
- Ernst, James
Roger Williams: New England firebrand; B..... 482
- Ernst, Morris L., and A. Lindey
Hold your tongue! B..... 649
- Etherton, Colonel P. T. and H. Hessel Tiltman.
Manchuria; The cockpit of Asia; B.... 108
- Ethical relativity. E. Westermarck; B..... 86
- Ethics. Volume I. Moral Phenomena. N. Hartmann. Translated by S. Coit; B.. 218
- Evans, Ernestine; R..... 509
- Everyman's encyclopedia; B..... 173
- Evolution of the French people, the. C. Seignobos. Translated by C. A. Phillips; B..... 406
- Experience and art. J. W. Krutch; B..... 536

- F
- Fadiman, Clifton; R..... 40, 60, 107, 215, 432
- Fall list..... 376
- Family circle, the. A. Maurois. Translated by H. Miles; B..... 286
- Faraway. J. B. Priestley; B..... 196
- Faraway bride, the. S. Benson; AN..... 90
- Farewell to reform. J. Chamberlain; B.... 650

- Farrell, James T.
Young Lonigan; B..... 61
- Fathers of their people. H. W. Freeman; AN 130
- Faulkner, William
Light in August; B..... 402
- Fauset, Jessie
Chinaberry tree, the; B..... 88
- Faust: Parts one and two. J. W. von Goethe. Translated by G. M. Priest; B 87
- Feuchtwanger, Lion
Josephus. W. and E. Muir, translators; B 570
- Filibusters in Barbary. W. Lewis; B..... 623
- Financial aftermath of war, the. Sir J. Stamp; B..... 262
- Finer, Herman
Theory and practice of modern government, the; AN..... 290
- Fired. K. A. Schenzinger; translated by S. G. Endore; B..... 406
- Fischer, Louis; R..... 195; see also C 311
- Fisher, Frederick B.
That strange little brown man Gandhi; B 433
- Five fold screen, the. W. Plomer; B..... 373
- Fleming, Berry
Square root of Valentine, the; AN.... 198
- Flint, Timothy
Recollections of the past ten years. Edited by C. H. Grattan; AN..... 239
- Flying colors. J. W. Krutch; D..... 317
- Flynn, John T.
God's gold. The story of John D. Rockefeller and his times; B..... 566
- Fortress, the. H. Walpole; AN..... 539
- Fortune, R. F.
Sorcerers of Doby; B..... 288
- Foster, William Z.
Toward soviet America; B..... 17
- Fountain, the. C. Morgan; B..... 60
- France, Anatole, biography. H. M. Chevalier; B..... 436
- Frank Harris. H. Kingsmill; B..... 432
- Frank Norris. F. Walker; B..... 535
- Frank, Waldo
Dawn in Russia; B..... 237
- Freeman, Joseph
Soviet worker, the; B..... 237
- French revolution, the. P. Gaxotte. Translated and with an introduction by W. A. Phillips; AN..... 596
- Freuchen, Peter
Sea tyrant, the. E. Bjorkman, translator; AN..... 238
- From Flushing to Calvary. E. Dahlberg; B. 483

- G
- Gambs, John S.
Decline of the I. W. W., the; B..... 173
- Gamio, Manuel
Mexican immigrant, the—his life-story; AN..... 131
- Gannett, Lewis S.; R..... 174
- Garland, Hamlin
My friendly contemporaries. A literary log; AN..... 623
- Garrod, H. W.; R..... 175
- Gauvreau, Emile
Scandal monger, the; AN..... 336
- Gaxotte, Pierre
French revolution, the. W. A. Phillips, translator, and author of introduction; AN..... 596
- Genetic principles in medicine and social science. L. Hogben; B..... 434
- George Gershwin's song book; AN..... 507
- German crisis, the. H. R. Knickerbocker; B. 39
- Germans, the. G. N. Shuster; B..... 39
- Germany not guilty in 1914. M. H. Cochran; B..... 316
- Germany; three books on; B..... 39
- George Moore. H. Wolfe; AN..... 18
- Gershwin, George, song book; AN..... 510
- Getting of wisdom, the. H. H. Richardson; AN..... 131
- Ghurye, G. S.
Caste and race in India; AN..... 624
- Giant swing, the. W. R. Burnett; AN.... 464
- Gilbert, W. S.
Plays and poems; AN..... 652
- Gingertown. C. McKay; AN..... 130
- Ginzburg, Benjamin; R..... 218, 236, 289
- Glasgow, Ellen
Sheltered life, the; B..... 261
- Glenn, Isa
East of Eden; AN..... 652
- God's angry man. L. Ehrlich; B..... 621
- God's gentlemen. G. August; AN..... 17
- God's gold. The story of John D. Rockefeller and his times. J. T. Flynn; B..... 566
- Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von
Faust: Parts one and two, G. M. Priest, translator; B..... 87
- Golden mountain, the. Retold by M. Levin; AN..... 90
- Gould, Gerald
Isabel; AN..... 198
- Grattan, C. Hartley
Three Jameses, the; B..... 460
- Grattan, C. Hartley; R.. 148, 287, 316, 335, 535

- Great American land bubble, the. A. M. Sakolski; B..... 573
- Greene, Ward
Weep no more; AN..... 239
- Gregory, Horace; R... 41, 61, 174, 236, 403, 568
- Gruening, Ernest; R..... 570
- Gurian, Waldemar
Bolshevism: Theory and practice. E. I. Watkin, translator; B..... 237
- Gwynn, Stephen
Life of Horace Walpole, the; AN..... 151

H

- Hacker, Louis M.; R..... 650
- Haight, Elizabeth Hazelton
Romance in the Latin elegiac poets; AN. 407
- Hale, William Harlan; R..... 87, 651
- Hallgren, Mauritz, A.; R..... 177; see also C..... 355, 537
- Hamilton, Edith
Roman way, the; AN..... 651
- Hands as bands. C. T. Revere; B..... 595
- Hansen, Alvin Harvey
Economic stabilization in an unbalanced world; B..... 262
- Hardman, J. B. S.; R..... 507
- Harris, Frank. H. Kingsmill; B..... 432
- Harris, Reed
King football: The vulgarization of the American college; B..... 651
- Hartmann, Nicolai
Ethics. Volume I. Moral phenomena. S. Coit, translator; B..... 218
- Haunted mirror, the. E. M. Roberts; AN... 623
- Hayes, Carlton J. H.
Historical evolution of modern nationalism, the; B..... 43
- Hays, Arthur Garfield; R..... 595
- Hazlitt, Henry; R... 15, 59, 173, 214, 235, 312, 460, 481, 534, 566, 620
- Heart of Scott's poetry, the. J. H. Holmes; AN..... 290
- Hellman, Geoffrey; R..... 461
- Helm, William P.
Washington swindle sheet; B..... 537
- Hemingway, Ernest
Death in the afternoon; B..... 461
- Here are my children. M. G. Williams; AN. 595
- Herman, Arthur
Metternich; B..... 463
- Herrmann, John
Summer is ended; B..... 367
- Herskovits, Melville J.; R..... 288
- Heuser, Kurt
Journey inward, the. W. and E. Muir, translators; AN..... 179
- Heyward, DuBose
Peter Ashley; AN..... 484
- Hibben, Sheila
National cookbook, the; Dt..... 591
- Hicks, Granville; R..... 367, 406, 461
- High low Washington. 30 32; B..... 537
- Hillyer, Robert
Riverhead; B..... 594
- Hindoo holiday. J. R. Ackerley. AN..... 151
- Historical evolution of modern nationalism, the. C. J. H. Hayes; B..... 43
- History of Europe from 1378 to 1494, a. W. T. Waugh; AN..... 652
- History of Shakespearian criticism, a. A. Ralli; B..... 215
- Hogben, Lancelot
Genetic principles in medicine and social science; B..... 434
- Hoke, Travis; R..... 651
- Hold your tongue! M. L. Ernst and A. Lindey; B..... 649
- Holmes, John Haynes
Heart of Scott's poetry, the; AN..... 290
- Home is the sailor. R. Blodgett; AN..... 198
- Homes of the pilgrim fathers in England and America (1620-1685), the. M. S. Briggs; AN..... 652
- Hook, Sidney; R..... 237
- Hot water. P. G. Wodehouse; B..... 315
- Houghton, Claude
Chaos is come again; AN..... 180
- House of vanished splendor. W. McNally; B 174
- Hume, David
Letters, edited by J. Y. T. Greig; B... 59
- Hunt, Violet
Wife of Rossetti, the; B..... 568
- Huxley, Julian
Captive shrew, the; AN..... 264

I

- I cover the waterfront. M. Miller; AN.... 18
- Ilf, Ilya, and E. Petrov
Little golden calf, the; B..... 509
- Iltis, Hugo
Life of Mendel. E. and C. Paul, translators; AN..... 510
- In great waters. Memoirs of a master mariner. S. G. S. McNeil; B..... 289
- Indian peasant uprooted, the. A study of the human machine. M. Read; AN... 90

- Indifferent ones, the. A. Moravia. Translated by A. Mastrangelo; AN..... 218
- Infinite longing, the. M. V. Schmitz. Translated by G. J. Renier; AN..... 374
- Inheritance. P. Bentley; B..... 313
- Intimate notebooks of George Jean Nathan, the; B..... 404
- Invasion, the. J. Lewis; B..... 537
- Ironic temper, the. Anatole France and his time. H. M. Chevalier; B..... 436
- Is capitalism doomed? L. Dennis; B..... 88
- Isabel. G. Gould; AN..... 198
- Israel. A. Lods. Translated by S. H. Hooke; AN..... 239
- J
- James family, biography. C. H. Grattan; B. 460
- James, Henry, the prefaces of. L. Edel; B. 149
- Theatre and friendship. Letters from H. James to E. Robbins; B..... 335
- Japan and America. H. W. Taft; B..... 108
- Japan and China, seven books on; B..... 108
- Japan speaks on the Sino-Japanese crisis. K. K. Kawakami; B..... 108
- Jenkins, Elizabeth
- Lady Caroline Lamb; B..... 287
- John Quincy Adams. "Old man eloquent." B. C. Clark; B..... 435
- John Wesley. C. E. Vulliamy; AN..... 179
- Johnson, Charles
- English painting from the seventh century to the present day; AN..... 510
- Josephus. L. Feuchtwanger. Translated by W. and E. Muir; B..... 571
- Journal of Arnold Bennett, the. 1896-1910; B..... 85
- Journal of Arnold Bennett, the. 1911-1920; AN..... 595
- Journey inward, the. K. Heuser. Translated by W. and E. Muir; AN..... 179
- Julius Caesar. J. Buchan; AN..... 484
- K
- Kamongo. H. W. Smith; AN..... 110
- Kang, Younghill; R..... 108
- Kawakami, K. K.
- Japan speaks on the Sino-Japanese crisis; B..... 108
- Kendrick, Benjamin B.; R..... 61
- King, Grace
- Memories of a southern woman of letters; AN..... 437
- King football: The vulgarization of the American college. R. Harris; B..... 651
- Kingsmill, Hugh
- Frank Harris; B..... 432
- Knickerbocker, H. R.
- German crisis, the; B..... 39
- Knickerbocker, H. R., W. Duranty, W. H. Chamberlin, and others
- Red economics; B..... 507
- Knight, Grant C.
- American literature and culture; AN..... 150
- Kohn, Max
- Nationalism and imperialism in the hither east. M. M. Green, translator; AN..... 265
- Kosmos. W. de Sitter; B..... 289
- Kühlmann, Richard von
- Thoughts on Germany; B..... 39
- Kunitz, Joshua; R..... 334
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
- Experience and art; B..... 536
- Krutch, Joseph Wood;
- R..... 86, 366, 432, 508, 569, 649
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; letter by N. Arvin... 126
- L
- Lady Caroline Lamb. E. Jenkins; B..... 287
- Lady Chatterley's lover. Authorized abridged edition. D. H. Lawrence; B..... 214
- Lady of the boat, the. Being the fifth part of the tale of Genji. Lady Murasaki. Translated by A. Waley; B..... 127
- Lafourcade, Georges
- Swinburne: A literary biography; B..... 594
- Laird of Abbotsford, the. Dame U. Pope-Hennessy; B..... 403
- Lamb, Harold
- Nur Mahal; AN..... 652
- Lamb, Lady Caroline. E. Jenkins; B..... 287
- Lassalle. A. Schirokauer. Translated by E. and C. Paul; B..... 177; see also C..... 355
- Lattimore, Owen
- Manchuria: Crade of conflict; B..... 108
- Laver, James
- Nymph errant; AN..... 336
- Lawes, Lewis E.
- Twenty thousand years in Sing Sing; B. 107
- Lawrence, D. H., biography. C. Carswell; AN..... 538
- Lady Chatterley's lover. Authorized abridged edition; B..... 214
- Letters: introduction by A. Huxley; B..... 371
- Lawrence of Arabia (T. E. Shaw)
- Odyssey of Homer, the; B..... 620
- Lawton, George
- Drama of life after death, the; AN..... 464
- Leacock, Stephen
- Afternoons in Utopia; AN..... 538
- Leech, Harper
- Paradox of plenty, the; AN..... 91
- Legacy of Alexander, the: A history of the Greek world from 323 B.C. to 146 B.C. M. Cary; B..... 404
- Lenin. J. Maxton; AN..... 316
- Leonard, Jonathan
- Trafton Helen; AN..... 178
- Letters from an unknown woman. S. Zweig. Translated by E. and C. Paul; AN..... 62
- Letters of D. H. Lawrence, the. Introduction by A. Huxley; B..... 371
- Letters of David Hume, the. Edited by J. Y. T. Greig; B..... 59
- Levin, Meyer
- Golden mountain, the; AN..... 90
- Lewis, H. H.
- Red renaissance; AN..... 265
- Thinking of Russia; AN..... 265
- Lewis, Janet
- Invasion, the; ■..... 537
- Lewis, Wyndham
- Doom of youth, the; letter by N. Arvin. 126
- Filibusters in Barbary; B..... 623
- Liberalism in the south. V. Dabney; B..... 534
- Liberation of American literature, the. V. F. Calverton; B..... 571
- Liepmann, Heinz
- Peace broke out. E. Burns, translator; AN..... 264
- Life of George Eliot, the. E. and G. Romieu. Translated by B. E. Downs; B..... 236
- Life of Horace Walpole, the. S. Gwynn; AN..... 151
- Life of Mendel. H. Iltis. Translated by E. and C. Paul; AN..... 510
- Light in August; B..... 402
- Lindley, Alexander, and M. L. Ernest
- Hold your tongue! B..... 649
- Little golden calf, the. I. Iff and E. Petrov; B..... 509
- Lives. G. Eckstein; AN..... 131
- Lods, Adolphe
- Israel. S. H. Hooke, translator; AN..... 239
- Lost lectures, or the fruits of experience. M. Baring; AN..... 374
- Love rimes of Petrarch. Translated by M. Bishop; AN..... 198
- Lowell, James Russell; new letters of. Edited by M. A. DeWolfe Howe; B..... 648
- Lumpkin, Grace
- To make my bread; B..... 372
- Lynch, Denis Tilden
- Criminals and politicians; AN..... 596
- M
- McCabe, Joseph
- Spain in revolt. 1814-1831; AN..... 110
- MacDonald, William; R..... 43, 261, 435, 622
- Machete. C. Merriam; AN..... 595
- McKay, Claude
- Gingertown; AN..... 130
- McNally, William
- House of vanished splendor; B..... 174
- McNeil, S. G. S.
- In great waters. Memoirs of ■ master mariner; B..... 289
- Making ■ president. H. L. Mencken; AN..... 374
- Making of Europe, the. C. Dawson; AN..... 575
- Malaparte, Curzio
- Coup d'état: The technique of revolution. S. Saunders, translator; B..... 86
- Manchuria; books on; B..... 108
- Manchuria: Cradle of conflict. O. Lattimore; B..... 108
- Manchuria: The cockpit of Asia. P. T. Etherton and H. H. Tiltman; B..... 108
- Marcella. M. Azuela. Translated by A. Brenner; AN..... 538
- March of democracy, the. J. T. Adams; B..... 622
- Marie, Grand duchess of Russia
- Princess in exile, a; B..... 314
- Marjoribanks, Edward
- Carson the advocate; AN..... 538
- Mark, Matthew
- Blood of the lamb; AN..... 623
- Mark Twain's America. B. De Voto; B..... 370
- Markey, Morris
- This country of yours; AN..... 437
- Marriott, Sir John A. R.
- English in India, the. A problem of politics; AN..... 316
- Marsh, Fred T.; R..... 462; 483
- Martin, Everett Dean
- Conflict of the individual and the mass in the modern world, the; B..... 15
- Martin the goose boy. M. Barringer; AN..... 596
- Masefield, John
- Minnie Maylow's story and other tales and scenes; AN..... 43
- Maugham, W. Somerset
- Narrow corner, the; AN..... 574
- Maurois, André
- Family circle, the. H. Miles, translator; B..... 286
- Voltaire. H. Miles, translator; B..... 235
- Maxton, James
- Lenin; AN..... 316
- Memories of a southern woman of letters. G. King; AN..... 437
- Men against death. P. de Kruif; B..... 651
- Men and memories, Volume II. Sir W. Rothenstein; B..... 41
- Mencken, H. L.
- Making a president; AN..... 374
- Mencken, H. L.; R..... 260
- Mendel, Gregor, biography. H. Iltis. Translated by E. and C. Paul; AN..... 510
- Merriam, Charles
- Machete; AN..... 595
- Metternich. A. Herman; B..... 463
- Mexican immigrant, the—his life-story. M. Gamio; AN..... 131
- Miller, Max
- I cover the waterfront; AN..... 18
- Milton, John
- Works; Volumes III-VI; B..... 175
- Minnie Maylow's story and other tales and scenes. J. Masefield; AN..... 43
- Mirsky, D. S.
- Russia: A social history; B..... 334
- Modern hero, a. L. Bromfield; B..... 40
- Money for tomorrow. W. E. Woodward; B..... 88
- Moore, George. H. Wolfe; AN..... 18
- Moravia, Alberto
- Indifferent ones, the. A. Mastrangelo, translator; AN..... 218
- More merry-go-round. Anonymous; B..... 537; see also EP..... 223; C..... 259; C..... 354
- More, Paul Elmore
- Catholic faith, the; B..... 176
- Morgan, Charles
- Fountain, the; B..... 60
- Morgan, Thomas Hunt; R..... 434
- Morrow, Felix; R..... 176
- Mozart. M. Davenport; B..... 483
- Mrs. Taylor. M. Worthington; AN..... 131
- Murasaki, Lady
- Lady of the boat, the. Being the fifth part of the tale of Genji. A. Waley, translator; B..... 127
- Mussey, Henry Raymond; R..... 262
- My friendly contemporaries. A literary log. H. Garland; AN..... 623
- N
- Narrow corner, the. W. S. Maugham; AN..... 574
- Nathan, George Jean
- Intimate notebooks; B..... 404
- National cookbook, the. S. Hibben; Dt..... 591
- Nationalism and imperialism in the hither east. H. Kohn. Translated by M. M. Green; AN..... 265
- Native tales of New Mexico. F. G. Applegate; AN..... 290
- New church in the new world, the: A study of Swedenborgianism in America. M. Block; B..... 236
- New letters of James Russell Lowell. Edited by M. A. DeWolfe Howe; B..... 648
- Nicodemus. E. A. Robinson; AN..... 407
- Night flight. A. de Saint-Exupéry. Translated by S. Gilbert; B..... 215
- Nobody starves. C. Brody; AN..... 539
- Nomad, Max
- Rebels and renegades; B..... 42; see also C..... 194; ..... C..... 258
- Nomad, Max; R..... 86
- Nonesuch: Land and water. W. Beebe; AN..... 110
- Norris, Frank, biography. F. Walker; B..... 535
- Nothing but Wodehouse. Edited by O. Nash; B..... 315
- Nuhn, Ferner; R..... 371
- Nur Mahal. H. Lamb; AN..... 652
- Nymph errant. J. Laver; AN..... 336
- O
- "Objectivists'" anthology, an. Edited by L. Zukofsky; B..... 569
- Obscure destinies. W. Cather; B..... 107
- Odin in fairyland. O. Duun. Translated by A. G. Chater; AN..... 264
- Odyssey of Homer, the. Translated by T. E. Shaw (Lawrence of Arabia); B..... 620
- On being creative. I. Babbitt; B..... 148
- One hundred million guinea pigs (earlier announced as Poison for profit). F. J. Schlink and A. Kallet; S..... 608
- Opium. J. Cocteau. Translated by E. Boyd; B..... 370
- Ortega y Gasset, J.
- Revolt of the masses, the; B..... 260
- Our neurotic age. A consultation. Edited by S. D. Schmalhausen; AN..... 624
- Our obsolete constitution. W. K. Wallace; AN..... 596
- Our times: The United States, 1900-1925. Volume IV: 1909-1914. M. Sullivan; B..... 649
- Owen, John
- Running footman, the, or the sentimental servant; AN..... 131
- Oxford book of American prose. Chosen and edited by M. Van Doren; B..... 481

P

- Palmer, Frederick
So a leader came; AN.....484
Paradox of plenty, the. H. Leech; AN.....91
Parsons, Alice Beal; R.....130, 196
Passing America, a. C. Weygandt; AN.....540
Pastures of heaven, the. J. Steinbeck; AN.....574
Peace broke out. H. Liepmann. Translated by E. Burns; AN.....264
Peirce, Charles S.
Collected papers. Volume I., Principles of philosophy. Volume II., Elements of logic. Edited by C. Hartshorne and P. Weiss; B.....368
Peter Ashley. D. Heyward; AN.....484
Petrarch
Love rimes of. Translated by M. Bishop; AN.....198
Sonnets of. Translated by J. Auslander; AN.....198
Petrov, Eugene, and I. If
Little golden calf, the; B.....509
Phases in the religion of ancient Rome, and other classical lectures. C. Bailey; AN.....317
Phoenix kind, the. P. Quennell; AN.....179
Pigeon Irish. F. Stuart; AN.....62
Plays and poems of W. S. Gilbert, the; AN.....652
Plomer, William
Case is altered, the; AN.....336
Five fold screen, the; B.....373
They never come back; AN.....151
Poems of Francis Thompson. Edited by Reverend T. L. Connolly; AN.....238
Poems. P. Colum; AN.....317
Pope-Hennessy, Dame Una
Laird of Abbotsford, the; B.....403
Porfirio Diaz: Dictator of Mexico. C. Beals; AN.....651
Power fight, the. S. Raushenbush; B.....216
Practical program for America. Edited by H. Hazlitt; AN.....464
Prefaces of Henry James, the. L. Edel; B.....149
Priestley, J. B.
Faraway; B.....196
Princess in exile, a. Marie, Grand duchess of Russia; B.....314
Problems of the Pacific, 1931. Edited by Bruno Lasker; B.....174 Prohibition versus civilization. H. E. Barnes; B.....42
Proust, Marcel
Remembrance of things past. Part VII. The past recaptured. F. A. Blossom, translator; B.....366

Q

- Quennell, Peter
Phoenix kind, the; AN.....179
Quick and the dead, the. C. Spencer; AN.....62

R

- Radziwill, Catherine; R.....314
Ralli, Augustus
History of Shakespearian criticism, a; B.....215
Rank, Otto
Art and artist. C. F. Atkinson, translator; B.....569
Raushenbush, Stephen
Power fight, the; B.....216
Read, Margaret
Indian peasant uprooted, the. A study of the human machine; AN.....90
Rebels and renegades. M. Nomad; B.....42; see also C.....195; C.....258
Recollections of the past ten years. T. Flint. Edited by C. H. Grattan; AN.....239
Recovery. The second effort. Sir A. Salter; B.....262
Red economics. W. Duranty, W. H. Chamberlin, H. E. Knickerbocker, and others; B.....507
Red renaissance. H. H. Lewis; AN.....265
Red Russia. T. Seibert. Translated by E. and C. Paul; B.....507
Regier, C. C.
Era of the muckrakers, the; B.....650
Remembrance of things past. Part seven: The past recaptured. M. Proust. Translated by F. A. Blossom; B.....366 Revere, C. T.
Hands as bands; B.....595
Revolt of the masses, the. J. Ortega y Gasset; B.....260
Richardson, Henry Handel
Getting of wisdom, the; AN.....131
Rilke, Rainer Maria
Stories of God. Translated by M. D. Herter Norton and N. Purtscher-Wydenbruck; B.....572
Tale of the life and death of cornet Christopher Rilke, the. Translated by M. D. Herter Norton; B.....572
Rip tide. A novel in verse. W. R. Benét; B.....434
Ripening, the. Colette. Translated by I. Zeitlin; AN.....218
Riverhead. R. Hillyer; B.....594

Robbins, Elizabeth

- Theatre and friendship. Letters from H. James to E. Robbins. Comment by E. Robbins; B.....335
Roberts, Cecil
Spears against us; AN.....179
Roberts, Elizabeth Madox
Haunted mirror, the; AN.....623
Robinson, Edwin Arlington
Nicodemus; AN.....407
Robinson, Gerold Tanquary
Rural Russia under the old regime; AN.....91
Robinson, James Harvey; R.....463
Rockefeller, John D., biography. J. T. Flynn; B.....566
Roger Williams: New England firebrand. J. Ernst; B.....482
Roman way, the. E. Hamilton; AN.....651
Romance in the Latin elegiac poets. E. H. Haight; AN.....407
Romieu, Emilie and Georges
Life of George Eliot, the: B. W. Downs, translator; B.....236
Rorty, Malcolm, G. S. Counts, L. Villari and N. D. Baker
Bolshevism, fascism, and capitalism; B.....237
Rossetti, Elizabeth Siddall, biography. V. Hunt; B.....568
Rothenstein, Sir William
Men and memories. Volume II; B.....41
Rueful mating, the. G. B. Stern; B.....130
Running footman, the, or the sentimental servant. J. Owen; AN.....131 Rural Russia under the old regime. G. T. Robinson; AN.....91
Russell, Bertrand
Education and the modern world; B.....534
Russia, four books on; B.....237
Russia, two books on; B.....507
Russia: A social history. D. S. Mirsky; B.....334
Ryskind, Morrie
Diary of an ex-president, the. By J. P. Wintergreen. Edited by M. Ryskind; B.....148

S

- Saint-Exupéry, Antoine
Night flight. S. Gilbert, translator; B.....215
Saint-Just. G. Bruun; AN.....624
Sakolski, A. M.
Great American land bubble, the; B.....573
Salter, Sir Arthur
Recovery. The second effort; B.....262
Salter, Sir Arthur, and others
Causes of war, the; B.....287
Salter, Sir Arthur, and five others
World's economic crisis and the way of escape, the; B.....262
Salutation, the. S. T. Warner; B.....462
Samaritans of Molokai, the. The lives of Father Damien and Brother Dutton among the lepers. C. J. Dutton; AN.....198
Samuel Butler: A mid-Victorian modern. C. G. Stillman; B.....462
Savage pilgrimage, the. A narrative of D. H. Lawrence. C. Carswell; AN.....538
Scandal monger, the. E. Gauvreau; AN.....336
Scheffer, Paul
Seven years in soviet Russia. A. Livingston, translator; B.....195; see also C.....311
Schenzinger, Karl Aloys
Fired. S. G. Endore, translator; B.....406
Schirokauer, Arno
Lassalle. E. and C. Paul, translators; B.....177; see also C.....355
Schmitz, Marie Verhoeven
Infinite longing, the. G. J. Renier, translator; AN.....374
Schneider, Isidor; R.....89, 404, 482, 623
Scott, Sir Walter; three books on; B.....403
Sea tyrant, the. P. Freuchen. Translated by E. Bjorkman; AN.....238
Seagle, William; R.....42, 107, 566
Seaver, Edwin; R.....406
Siebert, Theodor
Red Russia. E. and C. Paul, translators; B.....507
Seignobos, Charles
Evolution of the French people, the. C. A. Phillips, translator; B.....406
Selected essays: 1917-1932. T. S. Eliot; B.....312
Sencourt, Robert
Spanish crown, the. 1808-1931; AN.....316
Seven years in soviet Russia. P. Scheffer. Translated by A. Livingston; B.....195; see also C.....311
Sex in the arts. Edited by J. F. McDermott and K. B. Taft; E.....547
Shaw, T. E.
Odyssey of Homer, the; B.....620
Sheba visits Solomon. H. Eliot. Translated by D. Zablodowsky; AN.....109
Sheltered life, the. E. Glasgow; B.....261
Shuster, George N.
Germans, the; B.....39
Simkins, Francis Butler, and R. H. Woody
South Carolina during reconstruction; B.....61

Simonson, Lee

- Stage is set, the; B.....508
Sir Walter Scott. J. Buchan; B.....403
Sitter, Willem de
Kosmos; B.....288
Sitwell, Osbert
Winters of content; B.....622
Sketches in criticism. Van W. Brooks; B.....566
Slave-trading in the old south. F. Bancroft; B.....150
Sleepwalkers, the. H. Broch. Translated by W. and E. Muir; B.....574
Slocombe, George
Dictator; AN.....18
Slums, large scale housing and decentralization. Volume III. Published by the president's conference on home building and home ownership; B.....197
Smith, Alfred E.; R.....148
Smith, Ambrose
Broken house; B.....461
Smith, Homer W.
Kamongo; AN.....110
Snider, Charles Lee; R.....463
So a leader came. F. Palmer; AN.....484
Social life of monkeys and apes, the. S. Zuckerman; B.....178
Soft answers. R. Aldington; AN.....62
Sokolsky, George E.
Tinder box of Asia, the; B.....174
Song and its fountains. Æ; AN.....219
Sonnets of Petrarch, the. Translated by J. Auslander; AN.....198
Sons. P. S. Buck; B.....481
Sorcerers of Dobu. R. F. Fortune; B.....288
South Carolina during reconstruction. F. B. Simkins and R. H. Woody; B.....61
Southern road. S. Brown; AN.....43
Soviet worker, the. J. Freeman; B.....237
Spain in revolt, 1841-1931. J. McCabe; AN.....110
Spanish crown, the. 1808-1931. R. Sencourt; AN.....316
Spears against us. C. Roberts; AN.....179
Spencer, Claire
Quick and the dead, the; AN.....62
Spinoza, B., biography. L. Browne; AN.....575
Square root of Valentine, the. B. Fleming; AN.....198
Stage is set, the. L. Simonson; B.....508
Stamp, Sir Josiah
Financial aftermath of war, the; B.....262
Stein, Clarence S.; R.....197
Steinbeck, John
Pastures of heaven, the; AN.....574
Stern, G. B.
Rueful mating, the; B.....130
Stewart, Maxwell S.; R.....88
Stillman, Clara Gruening
Samuel Butler: A mid-Victorian modern; B.....462
Stillman, Clara Gruening; R.....287
Store, the. T. S. Stribling; B.....176
Stories of God. R. M. Rilke. Translated by M. D. Herter Norton and N. Purtscher-Wydenbruck; B.....572
Stribling, T. S.
Store, the; B.....176
Stuart, Francis
Pigeon Irish; AN.....62
Sullivan, Mark
Our times: The United States, 1900-1925. Volume V: 1909-1914; B.....649
Summer is ended. J. Herrmann; B.....367
Swinburne: A literary biography. G. Lafourcade; B.....594
Sykes, Gerald; R.....88, 286, 370

T

- Taft, Henry W.
Japan and America; B.....108
Tale of the love and death of cornet Christopher Rilke, the. R. M. Rilke. Translated by M. D. Herter Norton; B.....572
Talleyrand. D. Cooper; AN.....624
That strange little brown man Gandhi. F. B. Fisher; B.....433
Theatre and friendship. Letters from H. James to E. Robbins; B.....335
Theory and practice of modern government, the. H. Finer; AN.....290
There is a door. K. Coyle; AN.....264
They call it patriotism. B. Brehm. Translated by M. Goldsmith; AN.....151
They never come back. W. Plomer; AN.....151
Thinking of Russia. H. H. Lewis; AN.....265
This country of yours. M. Markey; AN.....437
Thomas, Norman
As I see it; B.....109
Thomas, Norman, R.....216
Thompson, Francis
Poems. Edited by Reverend T. L. Connolly; AN.....238
Three fevers. L. Walmsley; B.....128
Three Jameses, the. C. Hartley Grattan; B.....460
Thoughts on Germany. R. von Kühlmann; B.....39
Through the hawse-hole. The true story of a Nantucket whaling captain. F. B. Anderson; B.....289

- Tiltman, H. Hessel, and Colonel P. T. Etherton
Manchuria: The cockpit of Asia; B.... 108
Time stood still. P. Cohen-Portheim; B.... 89
Tinder box of Asia, the. G. E. Sokolsky; B 174
To make my bread; G. Lumpkin; B..... 372
Tobacco road. E. Caldwell; B..... 16
Tom of Bedlam's song; AN..... 90
Toward soviet America. W. Z. Foster; B... 17
Trafton Helen. J. Leonard; AN..... 178
Trilling, Lionel; R..... 288, 570, 594
Tropic seed. A. Waugh; AN..... 180
Troy, William; R..... 313, 593
Twain, Mark. See De Voto, B.
Twentieth-century novel, the. J. W. Beach;
B..... 593
Twenty thousand years in Sing Sing. L. E.
Lawes; B..... 107
Twenty years of the Chinese republic. H. A.
Van Dorn; B..... 108
- U
- Uncollected lectures. R. W. Emerson. Edited by C. Gohdes; AN..... 539
Undset, Sigrid
Burning bush, the. A. G. Chater, translator; B..... 263
- V
- Van Doren, Dorothy; R..85, 261, 286, 315, 567
Van Doren, Mark; R..... 127, 215, 370
Van Dorn, Harold Archer
Twenty years of the Chinese republic; B 108
Van Loon's geography. Written and illustrated by Hendrik Willem van Loon; B 570
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R..... 39, 150, 621
Villari, Luigi, G. S. Counts, M. C. Rorty and N. D. Baker
Bolshevism, fascism, and capitalism; B. 237
Voltaire. A. Maurois. Translated by H.
Miles; B..... 235
Vulliamy, C. E.
John Wesley; AN..... 179
- W
- Walker, Franklin
Frank Norris; B..... 535
Wallace, William Kay
Our obsolete constitution; AN..... 596
- Walmsley, Leo
Three fevers; B..... 128
Walpole, Horace, life of. S. Gwynn; AN.... 151
Walpole, Hugh
Fortress, the; AN..... 539
Waverley pageant, the; B..... 403
Walton, Eda Lou; R..... 434, 569
Ware, Edith E.
Business and politics in the far east; B. 174
Ware, Norman J.; R..... 173
Warner, Arthur; R..... 17, 649
Warner, Sylvia Townsend
Salutation, the; B..... 462
Washington, District of Columbia, three books on official life; B..... 537
Washington swindle sheet. W. P. Helm; B 537
Waugh, Alec
Tropic seed; AN..... 180
Waugh, Evelyn
Black mischief; B..... 335
Waugh, W. T.
History of Europe from 1378 to 1494; a;
AN..... 652
Waverley pageant, the. H. Walpole; B.... 403 Way of the lancer, the. R. Boleslavski, in collaboration with H. Woodward; AN 18
We begin. H. G. Carlisle; AN..... 180
Weep no more. W. Greene; AN..... 239
Werner, M. R.; R..... 573
Wesley, John. C. E. Vulliamy; AN..... 179
Westermarck, Edward
Ethical relativity; B..... 86
Weygandt, Cornelius
Passing America, a; AN..... 540
What men live by. E. Dimnet; AN..... 538
White, Kenneth; R..... 16, 176
Wife of Rossetti, the. V. Hunt; B..... 568
Wilcken, Ulrich
Alexander the great. G. C. Richards, translator; B..... 404
Williams, Mona Goodwyn
Here are my children; AN..... 595
Williams, Roger, biography. J. Ernst; B... 482
Wilson, Edmund
American jitters, the; B..... 17
Wilson, Woodrow: Life and letters. Vol. III,
IV. R. S. Baker; AN..... 131
- Wintergreen, John P. See Books—Ryskind,
M.
Winters of content. O. Sitwell; B..... 622
With Williamson beneath the sea; MP..... 624
Wodehouse, P. G.
Hot water; B..... 315
Nothing but Wodehouse. Edited by O. Nash;
B..... 315
Wolfe, Humbert
George Moore; AN..... 18
Woodrow Wilson: Life and letters. Vols.
III, IV. R. S. Baker; AN..... 131
Woodward, W. E.
Money for tomorrow; B..... 88
Woody, Robert Hilliard, and F. B. Simkins
South Carolina during reconstruction; B. 61
Works of John Milton, the. Volumes III-
VI; B..... 175
World's economic crisis and the way of escape, the. Sir A. Salter, and five others; B..... 262
Worthington, Marjorie
Mrs. Taylor; AN..... 131
Wright, Cuthbert; R..... 315, 436
- Y
- Year before last. K. Boyle; B..... 60
Yeats-Brown, Francis
Bloody years; AN..... 596
Young, Catherine; R..... 406
Young, Kathleen Tankersley
Dark land, the; poems; AN..... 150
Young Lonigan. J. T. Farrell; B..... 61
Young revolutionist, the. P. S. Buck; B... 108
Your Mexican holiday. A modern guide. A.
Brenner; AN..... 90
- Z
- Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R..... 537
Zimand, Savel; R..... 433
Zuckerman, S.
Social life of monkeys and apes; B.... 178
Zweig, Stefan
Letters from an unknown woman. E. and C. Paul, translators; AN..... 62

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 6, 1932

No. 3496

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	1
EDITORIALS:
Monkeys and Men.....	3
Butler, Borah, and Bunk.....	4
Hoover Politics at Geneva.....	5
WHAT IS SOVIET RUSSIA? By Louis Fischer.....	6
WANTED: A MUSSOLINI. By Paul Y. Anderson.....	9
THE R. O. T. C. AS A PEACE SOCIETY. By Robert Wohlforth.....	10
"WHAT IS LEFT OF GOETHE?".....	12
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	13
FINANCE: TAXES THAT HIT EVERYBODY. By S. Palmer Harman.....	14
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Prelude. By Conrad Aiken.....	15
The Meaning of Individualism. By Henry Hazlitt.....	15
American Humor. By Kenneth White.....	16
Voices in the Wilderness. By Arthur Warner.....	17
Shorter Notices.....	17
Films: Morals, Facts, and Fiction. By Alexander Bakshy.....	18

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

IN THE CONFUSION that besets the Democratic convention as we go to press one thing stands out clear and unchallengeable. That is the unashamed renunciation by Franklin D. Roosevelt of his last pretension to progressivism. He has joined the old guard of political sharpers. Indeed, the brazen tactics of his managers in Chicago, which the Governor himself has been directing by telephone from Albany, are such as to leave even the Tammany crowd gasping. His opponents should have been forewarned by his repudiation of his promise to support Jouett Shouse for the permanent chairmanship of the convention. But they were obviously not prepared for the next move in the Roosevelt program; they were taken by surprise when the Roosevelt managers announced, with the approval of the Governor, that they would seek to abolish the ancient rule of the party whereby a Presidential nominee is chosen by a two-thirds vote. Such a change in the convention rules requires only a majority vote. The Roosevelt announcement was simply a confession of fear that the New York Governor could not win by following the established rules of the game. Of course, except in form and audacity, there is nothing particularly new in this latest manifestation of American political ethics. Yet we had hoped for something better from Franklin Roosevelt. We had never deceived ourselves as to his weak and vacillating statesmanship, but we had believed him honest and sincere. Instead, he stands revealed as ready to lend his support to any trick or device that will advance his personal political fortunes. Even more discouraging was the failure of such supposedly Progressive Senators as Burton Wheeler and Clarence Dill to disown Roosevelt when he showed his true colors.

MR. HOOVER'S FEAR of pork-barrel legislation is holding up urgently needed federal relief for the unemployed. There may be "pork" in the Wagner and Garner bills, but Herbert Hoover did not see the matter in that light when he was sponsoring similar public-works construction programs only two years ago. The Nation no less than Herbert Hoover is opposed to raids upon the Treasury, to acts of Congress designed to confer special privileges or benefits upon favored communities or classes. There may be political favoritism hidden in the two bills now before Congress. But the unemployment situation cannot wait upon moral crusaders; the hungry millions cannot wait until the perfect bill is written. Help must be extended at once. Need it be said again that Chicago, Detroit, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, New York, and numerous other cities are now feeding their jobless on a hand-to-mouth basis, and that their relief programs may break down at any moment leaving hundreds of thousands of families without help of any kind? The Wagner and Garner bills are not so far apart that they cannot be reconciled by the conferees of the two houses. The sentiment in both branches of Congress is such that virtually any reasonable bill for unemployment relief can be passed almost unanimously. It rests with the conferees to expedite action. They should divest themselves of their childish fear of incurring Mr. Hoover's displeasure. They have enough votes to pass any honest relief measure over the President's veto.

STILL FURTHER PROOF of the repression to come is to be found in Speaker Garner's announcement of his candidacy for the Presidency. He came out against prohibition and the high tariff, for "proper relief measures" to keep the laboring classes at work, for the collection of war debts according to the capacity of our debtors to pay, and for the reduction of federal, State, and municipal expenditures by one-third—a stupid and silly plank which might defeat the possibility of putting the unemployed to work. Then he went on to say this: "The constantly increasing tendency toward socialism and communism is the gravest possible menace. The government should use every means within its power to prevent their further spread, and they should receive no encouragement from any American citizen, high or low." This from a man whose party is now definitely committed to protection, the mother of all socialism in America; which has voted for the socialistic Federal Farm Board, and has had no hesitation whatever in ladling out millions to indigent railroads and banks without understanding that if carried on far enough that means nothing more or less than state ownership. What a pity that someone cannot put Mr. Garner on a witness stand and examine him as to what constitutes true Americanism and what constitutes socialism and communism!

THE INDIANA DEMOCRATS have nominated ■ former National Commander of the American Legion, Paul V. McNutt, as their candidate for Governor, and the Republicans have countered by nominating ■ former State Commander of the Legion, Raymond S. Springer. The voters have thus no choice save to vote for a legionnaire unless they vote the Socialist ticket. History is thus repeating itself; for decades after the Civil War ex-officers were regularly chosen to catch the soldier vote. In Congress Northern brigadiers and Southern brigadiers vied with each other in "waving the bloody shirt" and in keeping sectional animosities alive for purely political reasons. We are in for something worse now, for the Civil War veterans were not militarists, if they were as thirsty for pensions and jobs as the World War veterans are for bonuses and special favors. They were satisfied to have no fleet and to keep the regular army down to 25,000 men as long as the nineteenth century lasted. The present veterans are all for big armaments afloat and ashore—despite our winning the war to end war—besides being utterly un-American in their readiness to limit free speech and other constitutional rights. The latest proof of this is the ousting from the Legion of the Willard Straight Post in New York, because it has frequently dared to disagree with Legion policies and recently exposed the shocking waste and extravagance in the Veterans' Bureau—a public service the Legion should have rejoiced in.

THE STREET FIGHTING in Germany will very likely have more influence on the negotiations now being undertaken at Lausanne than any other factor. Were it not for the uncertainties of the domestic situation in the largest of the Central Powers some new arrangement, some new plan, could probably be devised at the reparations conference. But no German delegation can afford to return to Berlin with anything short of undisguised cancelation. This Chancellor von Papen has already learned. His rather clumsy effort to be tactful and to appear conciliatory during the opening days of the Lausanne meeting has met with withering attacks from every political faction at home. Most direct and bitter have been the attacks upon him by his own supporters, the nationalists and militarists. A political upheaval in Germany today would be dangerous for the security and peace of the Continent. But it is difficult to see how such an upheaval can be prevented if Lausanne does not renounce the entire reparations system, the barren principles as well as the unmet payments. Premier Herriot has shown at Lausanne that France is willing to make what two years ago would have been considered extravagant concessions. But France is not yet ready to abandon the principle of reparations, for upon it, the French declare, rests the peace of Versailles, the status quo of Europe. Even the French may have to recognize in the end that the economic security of Germany is just as essential to the peace of Europe as is the political security of France.

PUBLICATION of the correspondence between the former Minister of Agriculture in the Brüning Cabinet and President von Hindenburg explains very clearly why it was that the President suddenly made an about-face and ousted Brüning without warning, and confirms in a remarkable way the statements made by John Elliott in his Berlin letter in our last week's issue. It is now definitely established through this correspondence that the break was solely due to the government's desire to take hold of the legally bankrupt estates of some of the great East Prussian landlords and to split them up in order to settle upon them some of the 6,000,000 jobless whose presence is such a menace to the economic and political safety of Germany. The Brüning Government had shown its willingness to help the land barons by declaring a moratorium on their debts, especially in order to save the eastern agricultural banks, which could not collect more than a small percentage of their loans. But in those cases where estates were hopelessly bankrupt the Cabinet proposed to take them over and break them up. The land barons appealed to President von Hindenburg, who was then staying at his own East Prussian estate, with the result that he wrote to the Minister of Agriculture that the proposed sale of bankrupt properties was "confiscation." The Minister resigned, but the President returned to Berlin, ousted the whole Cabinet, and turned the welfare of Germany, employed and unemployed, over to a group of these East Prussian landlords who have been the real dominators of Germany ever since the days of Bismarck.

VISCOUNT ISHII has warned us that if the United States "ever attempted to prevent Japan's natural expansion" on the Asiatic mainland, "then a grave situation would indeed be created, since Japan is an overcrowded nation which could not be shut up indefinitely in her small islands." This sounds like a threat of war. Yet viewed realistically it must be considered a courageous statement of fact. Ishii has done both countries a great service in pointing out that the conflicting policies of Japan and the United States in Asia, unless checked in time, will certainly lead to armed conflict. Only by such warnings, only by knowing precisely where our diplomacy is likely to lead us, can we so shape our policies as to prevent war with Japan. Economic pressure has pushed our frontier ever westward; today our western frontier is in Asia itself. We have marked out China as an American market of immense potentialities. Under the Open Door policy, of course, we assume that we are giving all countries, and particularly Japan, an equal opportunity to do business in that market. But so vast are our natural resources and so highly developed is our industrial system that the real advantages are all on our side. Thus Japan is in no position to compete with us on equal terms except by pauperizing its labor, and it is the poverty of its workers that is the compelling force behind "Japan's natural expansion." The Open Door, paradoxically enough, stands in the way of this expansion. Washington and Tokio must come to a new understanding on the Asiatic problem.

WHERE IS THAT VAUNTED UPTURN in Great Britain so glibly promised by the National Government and so often presented in this country as an accomplished fact? Notwithstanding the departure from the gold standard, the resort to protective tariffs, and the unholy alliance of Messrs. MacDonald, Chamberlain, Samuel, et al., reports issued by the Board of Trade show a drop in exports, chiefly of manufactured goods, from £33,895,429 in May, 1931, to £30,196,984 in May of this year. Unemployment rose 89,125 in May over the April figures, and was 111,335 more than in May of last year, while the number of persons on poor relief in England and Wales at the end of last April was 191,318 in excess of the number twelve months before. But the reactionary leaders go blandly on their way, running true to form even on such humanitarian matters as child labor; a proposal in Parliament to limit children's working hours to forty-eight a week has been killed by the government. Despite the expenditure of £108,000,000 annually on armaments, Britain has been seeking a cut in the $6,750,000 budget of the League of Nations, the British share of which reaches the "enormous" total of $708,750. Faced with discontent among the working classes, the authorities, according to the London New Leader, have been collecting information through the agency of engineering societies on such significant questions as these: "In an emergency, are you willing to volunteer to maintain the London electricity-supply service?" "Did you serve during the general strike of 1926; if so, at what station and in what capacity?"

ALL HONOR TO GOVERNOR ELY of Massachusetts, who has appointed Felix Frankfurter of the Harvard Law School to the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. It is not yet clear that the appointment will be confirmed; the heathen, headed by ex-Governor Fuller, are raging because Professor Frankfurter was one of the leaders in the fight to save the lives of Sacco and Vanzetti, whom thousands besides himself believed innocent, because his heart and his conscience and his admirable legal mind made it impossible for him to take any other course. The ex-Governor upon whose head rests the responsibility for the death of those men has gone out of his way to declare that this appointment means the encouragement of murder in Massachusetts. Nothing could be falsier, nothing more deliberately malign. We cannot think of anybody better fitted to adorn the Supreme Court bench in Massachusetts than Felix Frankfurter, and we cannot think of any bench that more needs liberalizing than this same Supreme Court. We earnestly hope for early confirmation of the appointment, but whether it comes or not we have here another interesting example of the way murder will not down. No Fullers and no courts can consign Sacco and Vanzetti to oblivion. Massachusetts may yet see a memorial to these men erected on its soil, as it erected statues to the memory of Garrison and Phillips three decades after they were mobbed in the streets of Boston.

SIAM, almost the last speck of absolute monarchy left on the map, has had a revolution. With great neatness and dispatch, and politeness all around, the People's Party has arrested the cabinet of princes whose extravagance and dishonesty led to the revolt. The king, with equal politeness and dispatch, has agreed to be a constitutional monarch. To be sure, there are certain contradictions to be recorded. The People's Party is composed of young and idealistic government officials and of middle-aged army and navy officers; the people, for whom the party is named, took no part in the revolution; finally, the leaders of the new ruling party have declared themselves, according to the fulsome report of the Herald Tribune correspondent, in favor of "frank criticism of all governmental matters, despite strict censorship." Nevertheless, everyone is reported pleased, and it is gratifying to note that there were only two casualties. One was a brave general who resisted and was shot but not killed. The other casualty turns out, fortunately, to have been exaggerated. A policeman previously reported shot was, it is now revealed, only frightened half to death.

Monkeys and Men

THE evolutionists," said G. K. Chesterton in a particularly malicious moment, "seem to know everything about the missing link except the fact that it is missing." And though the jibe may not be entirely fair, it is keen enough to make every believer in the Darwinian theory just a little bit uncomfortable. It would be nicer if the ascent of man could be demonstrated with a series of skeletons as complete as that which illustrates how the eohippus lost his toes in order to become a horse, and there is no doubt about the fact that the hypothetical creatures christened with such resounding names as Pithecanthropus erectus and Homo neanderthalensis would be somewhat more convincing if the fragments supposed to represent them were a little less fragmentary.

For that reason it is impossible not to suspend one's better judgment and take some interest in the wild story which concerns the discovery of some living specimens of an "ape man" in Sumatra. According to Professor Eliot Smith, Marco Polo told stories concerning the existence of such creatures 700 years ago, but though even more detailed rumors of its continued existence were circulated in 1924, nothing concrete emerged. Nevertheless, photographs are said to have arrived in Holland, and in a dispatch to the New York Times Professor Smith confesses that "there is nothing inherently improbable in the possibility that some type of ape with human likeness may have survived in the forests of Sumatra."

Being, however, even more interested in human nature than we are in anthropology, there is another aspect of the present incident which interests us more than the vague possibility that one of the more backward branches of our family is still climbing trees in the Dutch East Indies. This aspect is the one suggested by a paragraph in the dispatch which throws even more light on the present nature of man than the discovery itself is likely to throw upon his past. The account reads:

Some time ago the Governor of Sumatra offered a reward for a specimen, dead or alive, of the orang letjo, supposed to live in the Rokan Mountains. Hundreds of men searched the forests near the mountains and one discovered the orang letjo with a baby. The hunter wounded the mother and killed the baby. The mother escaped, running on her hind legs. The baby was taken to the Dutch authorities and the skin was carefully removed and prepared, while the skeleton was cleaned, packed, and sent to the Batavia Zoological Museum.

Evidently ape men are regarded in much the same way as other "natives" are regarded by the advance guard of white civilization, and the incident will perhaps go a long way toward explaining why the missing link is still missing. As soon as the first man discovered that he really was a man at last, he doubtless set about to exterminate as rapidly as possible all those creatures who had not yet risen to his heights. Indeed, we suspect that the emergence of this impulse may be taken as the criterion of true humanness, and that the first creature who discovered the delights of slaughter for its own sake is the one which ought to be taken as the first indisputable man.

Butler, Borah, and Bunk

"WOULD to God we could exchange a thousand politicians for even one statesman!" With this magnificent phrase Nicholas Murray Butler concluded his speech to the Advertising Federation of the United States on June 20, appealing once more for a rational, a sane, a generous policy toward Europe. It was an admirable address, admirable in its content, admirable in its expression and in its wisdom. It could not have been delivered to an audience that needed it more. We have noticed with regret Dr. Butler's departure for Europe. It would be of great usefulness, indeed, if some of the frequently wasted revenues of his own Carnegie Peace Foundation could be utilized to keep him speaking from one end of the country to the other. For since his renunciation of his own candidacy for the Presidency, he has been able to speak out as American public men ought always to speak out, and as many of them used to in bygone days. When he talks today he makes most of the office-holders of the type of Speaker Garner and the Honorable Patrick Hurley and the ineffable Secretary Wilbur, who recently dared to assure the social workers of the nation in Philadelphia that the starving children of this country would profit by the bad times, look like the cheap politicians that they are. This does not mean we believe Dr. Butler has undergone an entire sea change. We should expect him, should war come again, to lead the hue and cry once more, and again to drive out of his university men who had the character and the conscience to stick by the beliefs that they professed before hostilities commenced. He shines, however, because he is informed on many points, and because he hits straight from the shoulder. And what this country needs more than anything else today is informed speaking and able analytical criticism of the projects that are so lightly tossed off by the politicians.

Just this kind of criticism was furnished by Senator Borah in his remarkable speech of last week, when he announced that he would not support the Republican platform, or at least that plank which deals with prohibition. Senator Borah, too, is not always dependable—this utterance of his has been met by many sneers to the effect that, come election day, the Senator from Idaho will be back voting and speaking for the good old Republican Party. That may come to pass. None the less, we are profoundly grateful that in this address he rose to the finest that was in him, and not only showed his admirably equipped legal mind at its best, but phrased his thoughts in clear, able, and convincing language. No reasoning person could read that speech and not be affected by it. We do not see how any Republican politician can hereafter get up on any platform and have the effrontery to assure his audience that the prohibition plank in the Republican platform means something. The words of Senator Borah will be there to confront and confound him. The Senator took that barefaced swindle and dissected it like a skilful surgeon. He showed how completely it contradicted itself; how it was impossible to strip the United States of the constitutional right to control the liquor traffic by passing on the power to the States, and then to reserve to the United States the same power to prevent the return of the saloon. Never was a colossal humbug more completely and definitely exposed. Naturally there was consternation in the Republican camp, especially when the Senator declared that he would not support Mr. Hoover if the latter did not disavow this shameless effort to deceive both wets and dries into believing that the party is on both their sides.

But Senator Borah's service did not stop there. He proceeded, and has since continued, to unveil some of the hypocrites in the Cabinet who have pretended one thing while believing another. If there is a greater curse in our political life today than this, we do not know it. We are of the opinion that in some ways the political life of America has improved in the last forty years, but we doubt if there ever was a period in which there was such widespread insincerity as there is today. It is not due to prohibition. That merely gave another opportunity to those who were already in the habit of believing one thing and giving lip service to another. It is of course not considered good form in political circles to do what Senator Borah has done in exposing the real beliefs of two such men as Postmaster-General Brown and Secretary Mills by repeating the substance of conversations. But if ever there was a time when this was allowable it is today in the face of the colossal Republican effort to deceive the American people. Can anyone believe that Secretary Mills, with his record, favors prohibition in the slightest degree? Does anyone really believe that Senator Borah falsified when he declared that the Postmaster-General had assured him quite recently that he was in favor of the return of the saloon? When it comes to weighing the character of these two men in the balance, no court of record would have the slightest difficulty in deciding where the truth lay. We note that the Postmaster-General has not denied Mr. Borah's reiteration of his charge after Mr. Brown's first denial. These two speeches have cut through the bunk of the hour in a way to refresh weary souls.

They embolden us to hope that the hour is approaching when, because of the gravity of the crisis or as a final revulsion from the hypocrisy and humbug of the hour, other voices will be heard to command instant attention throughout the country, and what is more important to arouse an enlightened public opinion. The cowardly, crawling satellites around the White House talk glibly about their being controlled by public opinion, and about how they cannot utter a single brave word or take an advanced position because the public is not yet ready to have them do so. The way to lead is to lead. Mr. Hoover found that out when he recommended the moratorium just a year ago. Mr. Roosevelt has not yet discovered it because he has been playing the same old stupid politicians' game of waiting to see whether he could get the nomination by hiding his views, by pussyfooting, by talking those glittering generalities in which the American politician excels beyond all of his kind. As we have again and again pointed out, there has never been an hour when we needed greater frankness and truth-telling, with the determination to free our political life "from the black magic of dead words." In no other way will it be possible in this crisis to keep alive men's faith in their institutions.

Hoover Politics at Geneva

THE proposals placed before the Geneva Disarmament Conference on June 22 by President Hoover amount to little more than a political trick. To the headline reader Mr. Hoover has generously advocated a reduction in armies by one-third and a similar scaling down of navies. Studied in detail, however, the Hoover proposals amount to the brazen suggestion that the United States actually increase its army and navy, leaving reduction to other nations. The President declares that an army performs two functions: (1) that of maintaining internal order, (2) that of defense against foreign attack. He states that the German army was limited to 100,000 men by the Treaty of Versailles because the Paris Peace Conference deemed this figure the minimum needed to maintain German internal order. The President suggests that every government take the German unit as a basis for limiting its army for police purposes and then make a cut of one-third in all effectives maintained for "defense" purposes, above the number necessary for internal police. According to this formula, the United States, which with its dependencies has a population twice that of Germany, would actually increase its army from 140,000 to 200,000 men for "police" purposes; and in addition maintain an undefined number for "defense" against foreign attack. The President's proposal to abolish tanks is hardly more generous. Having only twenty-five tanks in our army we can afford to renounce ■ weapon upon which the French and British armies heavily rely. Similarly, the President proposes a reduction in the treaty tonnage of navies; but inasmuch as the United States, except in the case of battleships, has not built up to the level established by the Washington and London naval treaties, his suggestion would inevitably result in new cruiser and aircraft-carrier construction by the United States. The Hoover "disarmament" plan, therefore, would increase the military strength of the United States at the expense of other nations; it is a scheme for securing naval "parity" at a cheaper figure than that made necessary by the London treaty, and for nearly doubling the size of our army.

We are unable to see how any sensible man can assert that the United States should have an army of 200,000 men to maintain internal order. The creation of such an army to perform functions already discharged by local and State police would inevitably mean the terrorizing of the unemployed; it would be a step toward a fascist dictatorship. For that matter, the "defensive" needs of this country, "menaced" only by Canada and Mexico, do not even require the maintenance of our present extravagant establishment of 140,000 men—we never had more than 30,000 men prior to 1900. Likewise there is no reason except unadulterated vanity which justifies our demand for naval parity. When the United States, the one great Power which is in absolutely no danger of invasion, proposes in this hypocritical manner to enlarge its army and navy, it quickens the feeling of insecurity throughout the world.

There is only one means by which the United States can secure the reduction of armaments and that is by offering to make sacrifices equivalent to those which it asks of other governments. The key to the arms deadlock is the battleship. The one argument made by our big-navy champions for retaining the battleship is that the United States has only a few naval bases. Great Britain may dispense with the battleship because it has a large number of bases at which small cruisers may refuel. The United States, in the absence of such bases, must maintain battleships having a wide cruising radius. One does not need to be a naval "expert" to realize, however, that the battleship will not offset inferiority in naval bases. When the United States agreed in the Washington naval treaty not to establish any new bases in the Pacific, it was universally recognized that this renunciation could not possibly be offset by the construction of the battleships authorized in that treaty. In the absence of naval bases no American fleet, no matter how numerous our capital ships may be, can hope to carry on a decisive action in western Pacific waters. In what other part of the world may battleships offset our naval-base inferiority? Not in the Caribbean, which we completely dominate by bases at Panama and Guantanamo; nor in the Atlantic, where no Power possesses modern bases removed from its home territory. In the remaining parts of the world, such as the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean, it is inconceivable, from the political or strategic standpoint, that the United States would single-handed carry on a naval engagement, regardless of the number of our battleships.

The reason that our big-navy advocates insist upon retaining the battleship is because of an illegitimate and inept desire to dominate the seas. Actually, the supremacy of the battleship is already doomed by the airplane and the submarine. The ineffectiveness of this type of ship was indicated by the World War. Moreover, in accepting the London naval treaty of 1930 the United States has already dealt a death-blow to the battleship. In that treaty we agreed to postpone the replacement of our fifteen ships until 1936. One cannot believe that the American people will at that time authorize the expenditure of $600,000,000 to replace vessels which will then be over age. Even though we hold on to these clumsy sea-arsenals for a few more years, they are inevitably doomed. Meanwhile the maintenance of our fifteen battleships costs the American people the enormous sum of $30,000,000 annually.

Today the Geneva conference is in danger of collapse. Every effort at disarmament which fails enhances world insecurity and thereby increases the danger of war and obstructs world economic recovery. If failure is to be the result of the five years' tedious work of the League Preparatory Commission, and of five months' negotiation by the conference itself, then inevitably the world will be brought one step nearer the catastrophe which it is already approaching. Despite Mr. Hoover's blunder, we believe that the Geneva conference can yet be saved if the United States has the intelligence and courage to propose the abolition of the battleship. Such ■ proposal, indicating that we were prepared to make a genuine reduction, would make it possible to secure the international abolition of all aggressive weapons, on land, on sea, and in the air, and thus achieve the beginning of success.

What Is Soviet Russia?

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, June 14

I HAD no sooner said in The Nation that bolshevism was not a religion than Henry R. Mussey undertook to show that it was. The friends of Soviet Russia declared it could not be true that the Bolsheviks were ready to pay the Czar's debts, and the enemies of Russia wrote to protest against my assertion that there were liberties in the U. S. S. R. Socialists who had always been proud of Menshevik Georgia objected to my quotation marks around "independent" as applied to one of the few Social Democratic republics which the world has seen, and the same people insisted that the sameness of revolutions in all countries was one of the fundamental tenets of bolshevism. Apparently, the mere assertion that many of our popular conceptions about Russia are fallacious is not sufficient, and I have been called upon to prove them wrong. A few of the more difficult notions to refute were chosen for me.

1. That there is no freedom or liberty in Soviet Russia. This statement is heard frequently in America and England but seldom on the Continent; for intellectuals in Europe know that if and when the social revolution beckons, there will no longer be a choice between Communist dictatorship and bourgeois democracy. Experience has shown that long before bolshevism appears on the horizon, democracy is wiped out by a fascist dictatorship. In Hungary, Poland, Yugoslavia, Italy, and to a rapidly increasing extent in Germany, the alternatives are capitalist dictatorship and white terror on the one hand and Soviet dictatorship on the other. Each citizen's preference is then determined not by his love for a long-deceased freedom of speech or an extinguished parliamentarianism, but by his economic interests and class or group affiliations.

The Bolshevik regime is avowedly a class regime. The capitalist class is denied all civil rights. The bourgeois enjoys no liberty or rights until he quits his class—a process usually attended by some difficulty. The workers and peasants, however—and these constitute at least 95 per cent of the population of the Soviet Union—have numerous privileges and liberties never vouchsafed to them before the revolution. Yet even they surrender a considerable measure of freedom to the dictatorship. Bolshevism brought new, undreamt-of freedom to women, to national minorities, to children, to factory workers. The educational, cultural, and social progress achieved by the tens of millions included under these large divisions refutes any allegation that there is no liberty in Russia. The right to study, the opportunity to use one's own language and to follow one's own racial customs, and the relief from worry about unemployment or illness or old age or the higher education of one's children are at least as precious as the right to say and write what one wishes. Nevertheless, free speech is an invaluable asset to the individual and the state. It serves as a check on governmental error and unrestrained empiricism. But in Russia even the Bolshevik does not enjoy complete freedom of expression, and the non-Communist, even if a devoted friend of the Soviets, is condemned to silence on political matters.

The repressions in this field are more severe than the safety of the government requires.

2. That the New Economic Policy introduced by Lenin in 1921 meant the return of capitalism to Russia. When the New Economic Policy (NEP) was enunciated, many Communists and most outsiders believed that it would usher in capitalism. This prophecy, along with a host of others, has not been fulfilled. Lenin never intended to bury communism under a heavy gravestone marked NEP. For while the NEP permitted the peasants to sell grain privately, and thus paved the way to the rise of a bourgeois class of traders, Lenin nevertheless provided for the retention of the "proletarian heights"—the monopoly of foreign trade, state ownership of industry, transportation, and land, of the army, the Communist Party, and so on—with the aid of which another offensive against capitalism in Russia would some day be undertaken. Between 1921 and 1927 the great issue was "Who Whom?" as the Bolsheviks formulated it. Would private trade and individualistic farming creep up to and capture the "proletarian heights" and thereby wrest real power from the Communists, or would the "proletarian heights" reconquer the plains that had been abandoned during the NEP retreat? Now the reply is no longer in doubt; the "proletarian heights" are crushing the last items of strength in Russian capitalism. Private capitalism in the U. S. S. R. is being ground to death between a nether millstone called collectivization and an upper millstone called the Five-Year Plan. Sometimes the hand of the miller tires, and then private capitalistic tendencies win a breathing space which is called "neo-NEP." There will be many such respites. There have been many. But the length and frequency of these "rightward zigzags" diminish, and the death warrant of Russian capitalism is signed and sealed.

3. That the Bolsheviks have refused to pay Czarist debts. The Soviet Government annulled the foreign obligations of the Russian state on January 21, 1918. But since then it has on scores of occasions offered to pay those very obligations. In a letter to the Versailles Peace Conference dated February 4, 1919, Moscow volunteered to "recognize its financial obligations to its creditors in Entente countries" and to guarantee interest payments on them. Lenin gave William C. Bullitt a written proposal for transmission to President Wilson "to recognize their [the Soviets'] responsibility for the financial obligations of the former Russian Empire [date, March 14, 1919]." The Soviet Government officially informed Premier Lloyd George on July 7, 1920, of its willingness to meet Russia's indebtedness to Great Britain. At the Genoa and Hague conferences in 1922 the Russians made concrete suggestions for the payment of Russia's debts. All these acts are on record, and if people still believe that the Bolsheviks have always refused to pay the Czar's obligations, it is only because they do not read or have short memories. The last Bolshevik statement about readiness to negotiate on this subject was made by Stalin on December 1, 1930, to Walter Duranty of the New York Times.

The Soviet Government, however, has not confined itself to offers. On August 10, 1924, Ramsay MacDonald and Christian G. Rakovsky actually signed an Anglo-Soviet treaty which provided for a definite settlement of England's private and public claims on Russia. This treaty, for no fault of the Bolsheviks, failed of ratification by the House of Commons. Very concrete offers of immediate payments in gold were also made to France in 1926 and incorporated by Senator de Monzie into draft treaties which Poincaré, however, rejected.

The Soviet Government has settled the General Electric Company's claim for compensation for nationalized property. It has likewise negotiated with the National City Bank of New York for the payment of a Czarist war debt of $86,000,000. Those negotiations may be renewed. Moscow has even agreed to repay the moneys lent by the United States Treasury to Kerensky and used to buy munitions which shot down Red Army soldiers. All these and other pertinent facts are set forth in detail in my book, "The Soviets in World Affairs."

4. That the Bolsheviks believe revolutions in other countries must be exactly like their own. Lenin said that the revolution made by the Bolsheviks in November, 1917, was a bourgeois revolution. It was bourgeois while the workers helped the peasantry to achieve its petit-bourgeois, capitalist aims by ousting the landlords. Only later, when the class war provoked the enmity of the poor peasants against the rich, did bolshevism reach the villages. And only now, when collectivization dominates agriculture in Russia, is a real attempt being made to create a Socialist system of agriculture. But a Bolshevik revolution in a highly industrialized country where feudalism had long been destroyed would not be bourgeois even in its initial stages. It would be Socialist. This is not a mere academic distinction. Trotsky says that a Socialist revolution is impossible until the Communists have won over "a majority of the proletariat." That was not altogether necessary in Russia in 1917 because the peasants cooperated with the Bolsheviks in order to carry out their own democratic, bourgeois uprising. But most land-owning farmers in an industrialized nation will support the bourgeoisie against the revolutionists. The revolutionists must therefore first rally the larger half of the working class. This is a fundamental social distinction. It indicates that the preliminaries of a revolution in Germany or England would be very different from the preliminaries of the Soviet revolution.

On the other hand, the Bolsheviks submit that anti-capitalist revolutions abroad would correspond in important respects to their own. They insist, for instance, that the capitalists would resist the expropriation of their private wealth (although we all know that they have submitted to plenty of expropriation since 1929) and resort to force in an effort to suppress the expropriators. Hence the belief that every Communist upheaval must be accompanied by civil war. There would be other partial imitations of the Russian example. Yet these similarities must not be allowed to conceal the distinctions. The foreign political situation, for instance, would play a great role. A revolution in Germany where neighbors might intervene would not face the same set of circumstances as in Japan where intervention would be difficult if not impossible. In Italy in 1920 the first step toward a proletarian revolution was the seizure of the factories. The Russians, on the other hand, first captured the streets. A revolutionary party which set out to dislodge a fascist regime would have a task very different from that of the Bolsheviks in overthrowing the liberal Kerensky. Every revolution must have its own physiognomy depending on time and local conditions. Lenin recognized this fact and wrote:

In no sense do we regard the Marxist theory as something complete and unassailable. On the contrary, we are convinced that that theory is only the cornerstone of that science which Socialists must advance in all directions if they do not wish to fall behind life. We think that it is especially necessary for Russian Socialists to undertake an independent study of the Marxist theory, for that theory gives only general guiding ideas, which can be applied differently in England, for instance, than in France, differently in France than in Germany, differently in Germany than in Russia.

5. That Bolsheviks constitute 1 or 2 per cent of the population of the Soviet Union. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union numbers two million-odd members and candidates. In addition, there are about five million Young Communists in the Komsomol, who, ranging from eighteen to twenty-five years of age, share the responsibilities of government and participate actively in politics. Youth rules in Russia, and twenty is a ripe age. This makes 7,000,000 out of a population of 160,000,000, or roughly 4½ per cent.

But when it is said that the Communists are only 1 or 2 per cent of the population, there is always the implication that the Communists, therefore, are unpopular and impose their rule on a protesting majority. This, and not percentages, is the real issue. The best plebiscite that has been held in Soviet Russia was the civil war. At one time in 1918 the Bolsheviks controlled nothing more than Moscow and a few adjacent provinces. The whites, aided by many foreign Powers, had surrounded the Bolsheviks on all sides. Yet the Soviets won. The anti-Bolshevik generals were defeated not so much by the Red Army as by the opposition of the peasants, the workers, and the national minorities. Kolchak lost because the peasants fought against him. Denikin was destroyed by the hostility of the peasants and the national minorities. In almost all cases the countryside detested the whites. And the workers supported the reds whole-heartedly. Otherwise they would never have succeeded. The proletariat is now the mainstay of the Soviet regime. The peasants may grumble against unpopular Muscovite policies, but they realize that the only alternative to bolshevism is landlordism. The ethnic minorities understand that the collapse of the Soviets would again expose them to Great Russian chauvinism.

The Communist Party and the Komsomol could have twenty million members if they opened their doors wide. The Communist Party, however, is conceived as a closely knit, highly disciplined advance guard or shock troop whose strength is not in numbers but in devotion and training. If entrance into Communist ranks were easy, the party would become a band-wagon carrying too many careerists and opportunistic job-holders. This also explains why the salaries of Communists are limited to a low maximum. The relatively low ratio of Bolsheviks to Soviet population is the result of a definite membership policy and not of lack of popular support.

6. That an "independent" Georgia existed in 1918-20 which the Bolsheviks suppressed. There never was an independent Georgia. Menshevik Georgia sold itself to the imperialists in the first week of its existence. The only quality which entitled the Georgian Mensheviks to the name of Socialists was their anti-bolshevism. Indeed, Menshevik Tiflis openly proclaimed that it "preferred the imperialists of the West to the fanatics of the East." It preferred Lloyd George to Lenin.

Georgian Mensheviks operated before the World War. They were members of the Czarist Duma. But they never organized a movement for the separation of Georgia from the empire. Tcheidze and Tzeretelli were leading Mensheviks and influential members of Kerensky's Cabinet in 1917. They never demanded independence for Georgia. As a matter of fact, they supported Kerensky in rejecting Finland's plea for secession. Yet the moment the Bolsheviks came into power the Georgian Mensheviks discovered Georgia's wish to be free from Bolshevik Russia. The Mensheviks had no sooner established a government in Georgia than they invited the Kaiser's troops into their country. Thereafter Menshevik policy reflected the wishes of General Kress von Kressenstein. As soon as the German forces evacuated the country after the World War, the Mensheviks invited the British army into their territory. Menshevik Georgia then did the bidding of London. And when the British retired in 1920, Tiflis negotiated with Kemal Pasha for an alliance against the Bolsheviks.

The Mensheviks persecuted the national minorities in Georgia and burned their villages. They have admitted the imprisonment of hundreds of Communists. They made war on Azerbaijan and Armenia. The Mensheviks aided the whites in their wars against the Bolsheviks. Trotzky wrote: "One can say without exaggeration, Menshevik Georgia created the Wrangel army." He claims that on this ground alone the Bolsheviks would have been justified in overthrowing the Mensheviks. When the Red Army entered Georgia to aid a local Communist insurrection it expelled a government which had never stood on its own legs and which had served as a base for counter-revolutionary and imperialist attacks on Soviet Russia. Ludendorff was Menshevik Georgia's first patron. Then it became Winston Churchill's special pet. And in 1924 Sir Henri Deterding encouraged the Mensheviks to launch an abortive uprising against the Soviets in Georgia.

7. That bolshevism is a religion. John Maynard Keynes; Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, the father of an unborn Pan-Europa; and Professor Henry R. Mussey, writing in The Nation of May 4, 1932, have, together with many others, defended the thesis that bolshevism is a religion. If you do not discover the hidden sources of a great movement, just explain that no one can discover them, that they lie in the realm of the metaphysical. Yet the difference between bolshevism and religion is very, very simple. Bolshevism is a science and religion is not. Bolshevism is a set of economic, political, and social principles which inspire faith. Religion is a faith, a belief in things the most fundamental of which are not susceptible of proof. Professor Mussey, following Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, has enumerated similarities between bolshevism and religion. Yet when you examine these closely you see that they are not similarities between the essential characteristics of bolshevism and of religion, but between the psychological reactions which, according to some people, both bolshevism and religion provoke. What are these alleged similarities? Faith, a body of doctrine, saints, prophets, martyrs, demons or devils (the enemies of bolshevism), a body of priests (Communists who guard the purity of the dogma), reverence for the Scriptures (Karl Marx's "Capital"), the exaltation of Lenin, and, finally, the promise of reward in the Communist hereafter but not, Lenin forbid, in the present.

Now assuming that these parallels exist, it must be remarked that corresponding effects do not necessarily indicate an identity of cause. You can get "sea-sick" on a steamer and on an aeroplane. Yet that does not mean that the Bremen and a Fokker monoplane are the same. I could, however, disprove most of the assumed similarities between bolshevism and religion if space permitted. A Young Communist, for instance, told Professor Mussey that "Russia is no place for anybody who wants things today." From this statement Mr. Mussey concludes that the Bolsheviks postpone reward until the advent of a future Socialist millennium. But the Young Communist was making himself ridiculous. The Bolsheviks urge people to want things today and to go after them. What convinced Komsomol would deny that the reward is already here in the form of social services, new proletarian rights, freedom for those who used to be persecuted, and the like? Then the legend that Lenin is being "deified." If that were so, the same could now be said of Stalin, whose picture can be seen at least as often as Lenin's. It could also be said of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, of George Washington, of Hindenburg, and of kings and princes of former days. Adoration and respect for the mental legacy of a rare genius need not be confused with anthropomorphism.

Woman suffrage evoked tremendous enthusiasm, great faith, violence, and bitterness on the part of its supporters against its opponents. The zeal of the suffragists, of many pacifists, of prohibitionists, of Fascists, and of innumerable nationalists may be reminiscent of religious ardor; yet these movements are obviously not religious. The cynic who may have forgotten a youth enthusiastic in support of some ideal stands baffled in the face of the almost romantic ecstasy, devotion, and readiness to sacrifice manifested by many Bolsheviks. But when one views the subject more naturally one understands why the Bolsheviks condemn those who differ with them. Most men and women who feel deeply about any principle act the same way.

8. That the Bolsheviks are "dumping" goods abroad in order to destroy capitalism. Wrong for two reasons. First, because the Bolsheviks are not dumping goods abroad. So many people have written on this subject and proved that they are not, by a comparison of prices, of wheat crops, and of national participation in world trade, as well as by reference to Russia's low costs when expressed in gold, that I shall not deal with this phase of the question. Secondly, because the Bolsheviks are not foolish enough to suppose that their exports alone can destroy capitalism. The fact that a number of countries have sought to protect themselves against "Soviet dumping" with higher tariff walls and embargoes shows that capitalist nations have sufficient means to shut out Russian exports and thus guard themselves against "destruction." Obviously, the Bolsheviks would not set out to undermine capitalism with a weapon which could so easily be defeated.

Wanted: a Mussolini

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, June 25

AS against the sickening torrent of bilge and banality which radio pours into American ears eighteen hours out of every twenty-four, it must be credited with one large if inadvertent achievement: it has been the means finally and completely of debunking the national conventions. No one whose cerebral development exceeds that of a soft-shell crab could possibly listen to the proceedings for ten minutes without being impressed with their trashy and degrading character. The microphone is a sensitive and impartial instrument, and the muttered curses and whispered conspirings of the presiding officers come over the air quite as distinctly as the speeches, if not more so. For example, the day I returned from the Republican convention the caddy master at the golf club made haste to inquire what the chairman meant when he asked the secretary: "Who the hell wrote this goddamned thing?" It is plain that the politicians who manage and manipulate these sordid affairs were guilty of a horrible blunder when they set the precedent of permitting them to be broadcast, and they will doubtless answer for it on that last dreadful day when the troops battle vainly to defend some convention hall against hordes of infuriated Americans armed with axes, pitchforks, and legs wrenched violently from their radio cabinets. To be sure, all Republican conventions are dull, and the recent one set a new record for dreariness, owing in part to the absence of nearly all the Republican Senators. Divested of the gaudy bureaucratic trappings with which they invest themselves in Washington, the Cabinetees, with the exception of Ogden Mills, were revealed as untalented political hacks engaged in the mean scheming of ward politicians. Among such fourth-rate men a Senatorial mediocrity like Hiram Bingham stood out as an intellectual and moral colossus, acclaimed by the galleries and supplicated by beautiful women for his autograph. The delegates were the sort of crowd one would expect to find at a wrestling match, except for being infinitely more bored. On prohibition and the nomination for Vice-President—the only matters in controversy—the will of the majority was ruthlessly overridden by the Administration, and the whole dismal affair ended on the sourest note struck since the Democrats clawed one another to ribbons for three weeks at Madison Square Garden in 1924.*

* * * * *

WHETHER the Democrats are to repeat the history of that event should be apparent by the time this is printed. On occasions during the last two years they have exhibited a semblance of political acumen, and most of their best men will be on the ground. It is hardly conceivable that they can duplicate Republican cowardice and muddling on the prohibition issue, and the personnel of the Resolutions Committee is a guaranty that the economic planks will contain something more substantial than the half-hearted boasts and empty vaporings of the Hoover platform. As for the nomination itself, there is no profit in speculating on an event so near. The outcome probably will be determined by the depth and bitterness of the opposition to Roosevelt. At this writing the advantage remains distinctly his. If he is stopped, there are immediate indications that the opposition will turn to Newtie Baker, the beatific soothsayer and spiritual legatee of Woodrow Wilson. In such an event I shudder to contemplate the mental anguish of the power trust, torn between loyalty to its faithful friend in the White House and devotion to its brilliant advocate who is now engaged—for a fee—in trying to destroy the Federal Water Power Act. If Roosevelt is nominated on a platform which gives decent consideration to the economic plague from which the country is perishing and which proposes something more realistic than faith healing and Hoover magic as a cure for unemployment, Norris and other Progressives doubtless will support him. Borah is hotter than if someone had set fire to his shirt-tail, and contrary to popular impression his provocation was less the straddle of the Republicans on prohibition than their pusillanimous evasion of the issues presented by depression. It is always hard to picture him taking the stump against the party nominee, but conditions and his present mood are such that it might occur. A third ticket headed by someone like Norris or Hiram Johnson could count on his immediate and complete support, but that exigency is remote.

* * * * *

MEANTIME, behind the tinsel and show of the political circuses, certain activities have been in progress which aim at a revolutionary change in the whole national situation. The word "revolutionary" is used advisedly. Recently in this place I mentioned that certain powerful interests were toying with the idea of establishing some kind of economic and political dictatorship. As a matter of fact, two meetings have been held recently to discuss the possibilities. The first occurred in New York at the instigation of Owen D. Young, and was attended by a number of powerful bankers and industrialists. The second, which was a sequel to the first, was staged in Chicago at the elegant Chicago Club, and its sponsors took the surprising precaution of inviting certain representatives of labor and farm organizations for the purpose of sounding them out. Just what the bankers and industrialists think they could do if their furtive control of the government was transformed into open control is difficult to imagine. Nevertheless, they discussed a variety of schemes, the most popular of which seemed to be a "coalition Cabinet" composed of persons like themselves—possibly, although not probably, on the theory that having reduced the country to its present extremity it was their duty to rescue it. In reply they listened to some extremely plain talk by a certain governor who warned them that they were venturing on very dangerous ground. It is typical of such men to ignore good advice, however, and I shall be deeply surprised if we do not hear more of this business. Consider the problem that faces Mr. Hoover. If the Democrats avoid political suicide at Chicago, and if the campaign proceeds along conventional lines, the President must reasonably expect to be defeated. The obvious strategy in that case will be to see that it is not conducted along conventional lines. Nothing could be more characteristic of the Hoover mind than a proclamation to the general effect that a state of national emergency exists, that partisan politics should be adjourned, that he stands ready in the event of his reelection—or perhaps immediately—to choose a Cabinet consisting of the greatest minds of both parties, and that patriotism demands the immediate abandonment of all campaign activities! It is true that such a step would require more audacity than we should normally expect from the trembling man in the White House, but he may be subjected to powerful pressure from sources which he is not accustomed to resist. Whatever its abuses, the fundamental structure of this government is democratic; hence I always have believed that the first formidable attempt to change it would come from the top of society rather than from the bottom.

* By an inadvertence in his last letter to The Nation, printed in the issue of June 22, Mr. Anderson spoke of Dr. Harry Garfield when he intended to refer to Dr. Garfield's brother, James R. Garfield, as the platform writer of the Republicans.—EDITOR THE NATION.

• * * * *

IN any plan which contemplates the suppression or curtailment of democratic processes, the first step inevitably must be to get rid of Congress. Accordingly, every conceivable influence has been exerted in recent weeks to have Congress adjourn immediately. Through the newspapers, over the radio, from banks, chambers of commerce, and the White House, the idea has been persistently propagandized that the presence of Congress is delaying the "revival of business." Of course it has only been a few months since the same agencies were busily sowing the idea that a "revival of business" depended on prompt action by Congress, and it will hardly be argued that business has revived sufficiently for Congress to suspend action. Nevertheless, the public has a short memory, and the pressure of organized propaganda for adjournment seems about to succeed. There is even a prospect that having passed the Wagner relief bill it will adjourn without waiting to see whether President Hoover will veto it! Such a course would be utterly inexcusable. It may be argued with some force that in view of all the abuse and misrepresentation to which it has been exposed Congress is justified in throwing up its hands and leaving Hoover and his big-business advisers to stew in their own juice. Unfortunately, however, the rest of the country will be in the soup with them. All Senators and Representatives of demonstrable honesty and good sense admit privately that they should remain here indefinitely and do what they can to ameliorate present conditions and forestall worse ones. But with unemployment increasing, business shrinking, misery spreading, and resentment daily becoming more audible and overt, the so-called leaders of the so-called parties can think of nothing save the approaching election, and the fat leeches in Wall and La Salle streets will think of nothing save holding on to what they have grabbed. Heretofore each major crisis in American history has produced leaders of sufficient intelligence to understand it and ample courage to cope with it. The modern American tragedy is that times which call for men seem to produce only vermin.

The R.O.T.C. as a Peace Society

By ROBERT WOHLFORTH

HAVE you a stake in some phase of our educational system? Would you like the United States Commissioner of Education to sponsor a "careful survey" to prove the utility and importance of your position? Apparently you will be gladly accommodated if you possess an organization with a dignified name and some money and can convince the commissioner that your stake is a "much-discussed question."

That is what the Research Organization on Military Education did, and Pamphlet No. 28, United States Office of Education, Department of the Interior, Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary, is the result. The title of the pamphlet is "A Study of the Educational Value of Military Instruction in Universities and Colleges." It is based on 16,000 questionnaires mailed to the R. O. T. C. graduates of fifty-four universities and colleges asking them for their opinions on the educational value of military training, whether or not it makes them foes of world peace, and whether they favor compulsory military drill.

The 10,000 replies received were overwhelmingly in favor of compulsory military training, attested its value, and proclaimed that it made friends, not foes, of world peace. Immediately the public was informed by almost all sections of the press that the "survey" was the last word in reply to critics of military education and militarism. A carefully worded news release from the Research Organization on Military Education prompted this journalistic interpretation. But there is a hidden catch in the "careful survey" that destroys any of its claims of value and impartiality. The survey, upon close examination, reveals itself to be nothing more than a reserve officer asking other reserve officers whether or not military training makes them militarists and haters of peace.

In the first place, the author of Pamphlet No. 28, Ralph Chesney Bishop, is no disinterested and impartial student of military instruction in our educational system. He is a Major in the Reserve Corps, United States Army; an active member of the Reserve Officers' Association, a leading military body for propaganda and lobbying; chairman of its R. O. T. C. committee; and supervisor of the Research Organization on Military Education. It would be inhuman to expect Major Bishop, with these responsibilities, to find other than a favorable report for the military. Surely the Commissioner of Education, Dr. William John Cooper, could hardly have expected anything else.

If Dr. Cooper had made further inquiries he would have learned that Major Bishop and his Research Organization were being financed and directed with a definite partisan end in view. According to the Army and Navy Register of February 6, 1932, there is an advisory committee behind the Research Organization which directs its expenditures. The advisory committee receives its money from the Mer-shon Fund, disbursed under the supervision of the New York Community Trust for "improving the quality of our citizenship mentally, morally, and physically through the means of universal military training."

This advisory committee of the Research Organization is no more disinterested and impartial on the subject of military training than the author of the government survey. The committee comprises Lieutenant Colonel George C. Marshall, Jr., assistant commandant of the Infantry School at Fort Benning, Georgia; Brigadier General L. R. Gignil-liat, superintendent of Culver Military Academy; and Col-onel B. Robbins, former Assistant Secretary of War. This high-ranking line-up behind the Research Organization and its raison d'être should have convinced Dr. Cooper of its questionable ability to conduct an unbiased survey. Yet Dr. Cooper in his letter of transmittal to Secretary Wilbur states that the purpose of the Research Organization and its backers was to "study the status of military training in the colleges."

It is not surprising that under these partisan auspices the governmental survey was of a biased nature throughout. Dr. Cooper permitted the 16,000 questionnaires to be mailed to R. O. T. C. graduates in various classes from 1920 to 1930 in fifty-four colleges and universities in thirty-nine States. This killed the value of the survey from the start. In the first place, to become an R. O. T. C. graduate a college student must elect to take the military course for four years. The first two years are generally compulsory; the last two are always optional. Obviously, a student who liked the military drill well enough to take four years of it when only two years are required would be biased in its favor.

In the second place, the men receiving the questionnaires graduated from college in the past decade after completing their military study. Since that time many of them have been reserve officers—active military men, attending summer camps every few years, keeping up their military efficiency by means of correspondence-school courses, acting as instructors in the Citizens' Military Training Camps. They have received literature and bulletins on military training from the War Department, the Reserve Officers' Association, the R. O. T. C. Association, the Scabbard and Blade National Military Fraternity, their branch organizations, and other military groups. This group of 16,000 self-elected reserve officers and R. O. T. C. graduates were asked eight questions, and 10,000 of them gave answers that varied only slightly from the military norm. The first question, "Has the R. O. T. C. military course of study a definite educational value of its own?" was already answered by the recipients years ago in college when they elected to take the R. O. T. C. courses. Moreover, there was no opportunity in the questionnaire to compare the military course with any other course; the question permitted only a flat answer. Few reserve officers would admit being duped and state that they spent four long years in study with no result. Furthermore, the question permitted no differentiation between the various parts of the R. O. T. C. courses. No one can say that the R. O. T. C. has no educational value in any of its parts. Yet this question could only be answered yes or no and naturally it got a 97.1 per cent affirmative rating.

The second question, "Did the R. O. T. C. contribute anything important or unique to your education?" is equally obvious. A course so unlike other college courses is certainly unique in respect to other courses. Are not all the military reviews, the parades, the sham battles, the co-ed honorary colonels and "sponsors" of the R. O. T. C. unique? Moreover, the graduates questioned should have received commissions as second lieutenants in the Reserve Corps upon graduation. If that did not make the course important to them, it surely must have made it unique. The answers were 94.9 per cent affirmative.

The third question was, "How did the quality of the R. O. T. C. courses compare with other courses at your institution?" Here is the first real basis for comparison in the questionnaire and here is also the first deviation in the answers, with a much lower estimate of the R. O. T. C. training. The basic two-year course gets a general rating below average.

Question four, "From your own experience was the time spent on the training justified by the results obtained?" is another answered question. The result of the course is to produce a reserve commission. If the reserve officer answers no to this question he damns his profession; he surely would not admit that he took the R. O. T. C. course for the pay, the uniform, the summer camps, or to stand in well with a pretty co-ed honorary colonel.

Question seven is the heart of the "careful survey." "Does the R. O. T. C. course of instruction tend to produce a militaristic attitude inimical to world peace?" The San Francisco News said of this question: "Mr. Bishop might as well have polled army officers to find out whether they are for or against disarmament, or members of the college fraternities to find out whether they are for or against fraternities." But the 93.6 per cent of the R. O. T. C. graduates who answered question seven negatively were the basis for the main conclusion of the "careful survey"—that the R. O. T. C. does not make militarists. The press, aided by the news release from the Research Organization, paid more attention to this question than to any other, the New York Times heralding the study in these headlines: "Say Military Study Is No Foe to Peace. Replies in R. O. T. C. Survey Show 93.6 Per Cent Were Not Affected."

This is the manner in which the survey has been accepted by the public and by practically all of the press. Few have bothered to reflect that no officer, no R. O. T. C. graduate would admit that his training made him a foe of peace. If there is one thing an army man likes to profess, it is his affection for peace and his distaste of war.

If the Major should poll all graduates, not merely those who elected to try for reserve commissions through the R. O. T. C., with the question whether or not to abolish military training, he would not get the answers shown in his "careful survey." Only recently, for instance, the Inter-collegiate Disarmament Council, the Convention of the Student Volunteer Movement, and the National Student Federation—in all comprising about 70,000 students polled—voted down compulsory drill. Last year over 10,000 college students petitioned Congress to discontinue financial support of compulsory drill courses—the R. O. T. C.—in their institutions. Within the past few months 327 leading educators have requested Congress to take military training out of our colleges and universities.

"What Is Left of Goethe?"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A varied fate has pursued Goethe in Anglo-Saxon criticism. One hundred years ago Carlyle hailed Goethe as a heroic personality whose study inspired self-confidence and courage. Emerson, reacting against a cramped Calvinism, was attracted to Goethe's catholic interests and acceptance of experience ("he was not afraid to live"), yet retained enough of his own Puritan background to condemn Goethe as worldly and realistic. Eighty years later George Santayana, steeped in Greek naturalism, pronounced Goethe wilful and romantic, although in a sense "the wisest of mankind." This year saw the publication of H. W. Nevins's book, wherein Goethe appears acceptable by being pictured as an affable, urbane, and smooth gentleman.

In his article What Is Left of Goethe? (The Nation, June 15, 1932), Clifton Fadiman approaches the problem primarily from a sociological angle and finds that Goethe's wisdom is not relevant to our social dilemmas. Ours is a revolutionary epoch and Goethe thought statically, conservatively, and at times as a reactionary. He points to the fact that Goethe spent the greater part of his life as an official in a feudal regime, that he was not sympathetic to the French Revolution, that his chief objective was to create the possibility of self-culture.

A critical survey of Goethe's social life does lend some support to this account. Yet the point can be overstated. We know now—as a result, alas, of academic research—that Goethe was not at all satisfied with the suppressive practices in the duchy and more than once made earnest attempts to restrain the duke from his wild extravagances; that he made a number of efforts to introduce reforms at the risk of disfavor with the court and estrangement from the duke. It is well known that his precipitate flight to Italy was partly induced by the oppressiveness of the social atmosphere in a feudal regime and that he only returned upon the duke's promise that he should be relieved of his major official duties. Goethe frequently expressed concern for the sufferings of the lower classes. From Apolda, where he found misery among the weavers, he wrote: "I can't compose anything here. My Thoas must speak as though no weaver were hungry." On another occasion: "Misery is becoming to me as commonplace as my hearthstone. But I never quit hold of my ideas and I struggle with the unknown angel, though my thigh shrink from it." Nor is "Hermann und Dorothea" a flat rejection of the French Revolution; the fifth song clearly enunciates the value and necessity of change, and the poem as a whole indicates the polar interdependence of stability and revolution.

But a larger and more fundamental question is involved in a thoroughgoing condemnation of Goethe on the ground of his social unprogressiveness. Is it fair to judge Goethe exclusively or primarily by his political theories? Goethe was a poet and dramatist, perhaps a natural scientist and philosopher—he certainly was not a political economist. To apply a standard which falls altogether outside of our subject matter is to disregard that which constitutes its unique character. Is it just to dismiss a man on the basis of what is but peripheral in his contribution?

The reply may be offered that Goethe's general classic temper makes for conservatism which, translated into political theory, is unacceptable to us today. It is admittedly true that classicism is anti-revolutionary, has tended toward harmonization usually in metaphysical, religious, and aesthetic terms. But is Goethe a classicist in this sense? Some popular treatises have spread the conception of the "Olympian" Goethe. Is it borne out by the facts? There is the storm-and-stress period. It is true that Götz and Werther are not revolutionaries in the modern sense, that the freedom they seek is not economic freedom for the masses but liberty for the exceptional individual. Yet the spirit of these works is the spirit of revolutionary rebellion against a cramping status quo. This storm-and-stress emphasis on rebellion never left Goethe even in the halcyon days of his classicism.

The misconception of the nature of Goethe's classicism carries with it the corollary of Goethe as the serene optimist. Mr. Fadiman believes that Goethe's optimism is akin to "the muscular inspirationalism of Edgar Guest, Bruce Barton, and other professional barbarians." To speak of Goethe in terms of calm contentment reveals a questionable acquaintance with his life and work. Goethe did not only renounce "one young woman after another"; he renounced his storm-and-stress titanism; he suffered deep disappointments in Weimar (later embodied in "Tasso"); he renounced the dear illusion of his ability as a painter. Every one of his major works from "Tasso" and "Iphigenie" to "Wilhelm Meister" and "Faust" preaches the lesson of renunciation. It is, to be sure, not the renunciation of the Middle Ages, but the classic renunciation of what lies beyond our nature. Yet in Goethe's temper it was necessarily accompanied by sadness and bitterness. Add to these the crying grief of the "Elegy" ((Marienbad), the statement of the elder Goethe that in all of his life he had not had more than four weeks of happiness, and we have a picture of a man that is hard to reconcile with the portrait of the complacent, untragic type.

The current sociological approach in literary criticism can only be acclaimed as a healthy reaction to the traditional empty appreciations in terms of aesthetic "forms" or general "deep insights." But there is a danger if the social criterion is used exclusively. In terms of it alone, what is "left" of Plato and Aristotle, who sanctioned slavery, of St. Thomas and Spinoza, who taught "acceptance," of Lucretius and Shakespeare, of Kant and Schopenhauer? What is "left" of the scientists, men of letters, and artists who were either politically conservative or not political-minded? Moreover, the social problem, vital as it is, does not constitute even today the sole problem. Throughout all social changes there exist issues which are largely independent of social conditions, issues suggested by such phenomena as chance, individual frustration, and death. To be sure, today these eternal problems ought to recede before the temporal exigencies, and we are quite justified in condemning our contemporary classicists. Historic personalities, however, cannot be judged in the same terms. Their social situation was different. Their significance must be gauged symbolically and from the manner in which they treated the problems which appeared most crucial in their particular intellectual milieu. Even Karl Marx's teachings have been receiving this historic and symbolic interpretation. There is otherwise the danger that the here and now be identified with what obtains universally and eternally. The higher task of even a contemporary critic, when he approaches historic phenomena, would seem to consist in doing justice to both categories.

It is still to Goethe's credit that at a time when literary aestheticism held sway and political reaction was in the saddle, he steered clear of romantic escapes and urged the wholesome maxim: "What is your duty? The demands of the day!" It was an attitude far in advance for the literati of Goethe's Germany; it has become the motto in our own day of men like Thomas Mann in their struggle against the aesthetic individualism and flight of many of our contemporary poets and thinkers.

Brooklyn College, June 22

HARRY SLOCHOWER

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In contradiction to Clifton Fadiman, it seems to me that very much is left of Goethe—so much that it cannot possibly be dealt with in a few lines. Goethe was not a revolutionist but an aristocrat with very conservative views on fixed classes. This doubtless is correct, but it need not mean that Goethe cannot have anything to say to a revolutionary modern age. If we read Goethe today, we do so not in order to find good recipes for building up a new social and economic order, but for the sake of the purely human and artistic values that his writings contain. Those human values stand for good in a communistic society in just the same way as in a monarchistic class state, and you find them everywhere in Goethe, in "Faust" as well as in any little lyric poem.

That famous saying, "Redemption is for those who strive" ("Wer immer strebend sich bemüht, den können wir erlösen"), gives no specified program as to what to strive for. But this does not make it meaningless; it merely lifts it above the differences of country and period. Anybody who is striving for perfection, anybody who earnestly endeavors to approach the goal he has set for himself, can be redeemed.

"Der Zweck des Lebens ist das Leben selbst," so thoroughly misunderstood by Mr. Fadiman, would make a perfect slogan for a socialistic society. What does the new social order want to achieve by trying to abolish economic miseries if not to give all men the possibility of building up a happy and rich and full life? And who was a better Lebenskünstler than Goethe?

Today's uprooted generation needs strong, firm, and wise personalities. That is why Goethe can mean so much to us.

Bayside, N. Y., June 15

MARGARET PLAUT

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I quote Mr. Fadiman from The Nation for June 8: "Perhaps within a few years Mr. Hale himself will see that the author of 'Faust,' while eminently successful at providing mental food for four generations of schoolmasters, offers contemporary men little more than a diet of wind."

Now, few schoolmasters are able to perpetuate art; in fact most of them kill it on the spot. But I have heard them speak lovingly of the "socio-economic" theories which are the fashionable essentials of today. The contemplative faculties are falling into discredit, while the microscope, the chart, and the social formula are in the ascendancy. An apostle of culture such as Goethe is naturally suspect.

Veneration for the great is not characteristic of our time, a journalistic era, reveling in biography to glean from heroes' lives the facts common to all—not the spirit cultivated by few. Masterpieces are studied for their frailties. A race of critics develops—clever men, but impotent. Yes, the critics seem to be the final purpose of art.

San Francisco, June 7

ERNST BACON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We should like to know on what heroic food Mr. Fadiman has grown so great that Goethe's wisdom is as a "diet of wind" to him? Mr. Fadiman takes Goethe to task because he is not a social reformer, because he is not primarily interested in external and social phenomena, because, as a true artist, he is mainly concerned with his inner life—"developing himself incessantly and unsparingly."

Mr. Fadiman is irritated by Goethe's serenity and moderation, though he confesses in a previous paragraph, perhaps with unwilling truth, that Goethe's "personality is superficially irritating." May we suggest that Goethe's Olympian aloofness and serenity are irritating because in their unattainableness they are a reproach to our revolt and confusion?

L. G. MACFARLAND AND FRIENDS

Crystal Beach, Ontario, June 15

In the Driftway

IN a world nourished on symbols no symbol has more faithfully preserved its force through the centuries than has gold. Other metals have been more precious, judged by their money value; other materials have been more rare, more hardly got, far more useful to mankind. But among civilized nations and some not so civilized, none but gold has been so persistently cherished, none has retained so firmly its irresistibly romantic associations. Thus when we read that the sailors on the Italian salvage ship Artiglio, engaged in rescuing from the deep the gold ingots sunk ten years ago in the steamship Egypt, were moved to hysterical tears and laughter when the first gold bars were landed on the Artiglio's deck, we can easily understand their emotion. This was buried treasure indeed, buried 400 feet under water in layers of slime. Years and much money have been spent in the work of rescue. The Indian rupee notes that made up part of the Egypt's millions are a sodden mass of mud; the gold remains tangible and secure, yellow after half a score of years.

* * * * *

SOMETHING of this worshipful attitude toward gold was evidenced a year ago when the newspapers carried streamer headlines that England was about to go off the gold standard. Something of it can be distinguished now in the horror that is felt when it is suggested that the United States might conceivably be forced to follow suit. The idea of the gold standard in international currency is far more potent, among the masses who understand nothing of world finance, than if gold were a mere monetary unit and nothing more. Gold is the ultimate symbol of wealth, of comfort, even of peace. Gold pieces, not the sound paper money of a great Power, are what the miser lovingly runs through his fingers; gold is what men bury in stout oak chests, for other men to search for through deserts, in deep forests, and under the sea. The kings in the ancient sagas sat on golden thrones; the streets of heaven are paved with gold and pearl; King Arthur's sword, of finest steel, had a handle of a more precious metal; and the princess in the fairy tale could not exist without golden hair.

* * * * *

WHEN the Drifter reads of the stern practicalities of the new Communist states, he wonders what will become of the power of gold. For obviously gold has no utilitarian value that is not bettered by other metals. And it would be hard coldly and dispassionately to defend its unique beauty to a people that saw other beauty in soaring steel and massive concrete. Gold is too soft to be used in machinery, it will not burn, it does not float; you cannot eat gold, you need not wear gold, you would be uncomfortable sitting or sleeping on gold, and gold dishes to eat from are considerably less than practical. If one of his ardent Communist friends should ask the Drifter what gold was good for, he could only point to legend, to the history of mankind. Nevertheless, it would be interesting to see what would happen if gold should suddenly be discovered in the neighborhood of Omsk or Nijni-Novgorod. Would there be a rush to stake a claim, as there was in California nearly a century ago? Or have the new wonders of the machine age in Soviet Russia displaced permanently the golden dreams by which men for so many centuries have been consoled?

THE DRIFTER

BOOKS

REGARDLESS OF HARD TIMES

Children do grow up and need to understand about . . .

The 14th Edition of The Sex Side Of Life

An explanation for young people by Mary Ware Dennett is just out.

Order from the author, 81 Singer St., Astoria, L. I., New York City 3 copies, $1.00; single copies, 35 cents. Lower wholesale rates for book-shops, camps, schools, etc.

A Primer of Capitalism and Socialism

The Road Ahead

By HARRY W. LAIDLER

A book which points out in terse, simple language the flaws in our present economic system—and the way out. With 33 illustrations by Mabel Pugh.

$1.00

from CROWELL'S List of Good Books

Thomas Y. Crowell Company, 393 Fourth Ave., New York

13 issues of The Nation for $1 SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY PRICE

YOUNG writers who take liberties with English take pains to remind you, now and again, that you are living in a cockeyed world. Twirling its million facets before you, one moment life makes your eyes shine, the next it gets in your hair.

We have cut and polished and recut the stone until it dazzles—but in all this recutting we have lost track of the geometric simplicity and correctness of the original. In other words, we have complicated life to a point where it stupefies the average mortal and defies the comprehension of the wise man.

This is why we hear such universal complaint that people bent on reform seek to destroy, but seldom in construct. Social science today does consist largely of analysis—a tearing-down process in the effort to ascertain what the human being is, what makes him go, and what makes him usually go wrong. When these things are understood, then we may hope for a golden age of synthesis and social progress.

Those who call The Nation a destructive journal fail to look deep enough to recognize its purpose or the logic of its method. Read it and for yourself. A 13-week acquaintance subscription costs only $1.

The Nation 20 Vesey St. New York

For the enclosed $1 enter my 13-week subscription at once.

Name _____

Address _____

7-6-32

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Finance

Taxes That Hit Everybody

THE new taxes on commodities and services, most of which went into effect on June 21, fall into two general classes, one including those levies which will certainly be borne by the consumer, the other those of which the incidence is in doubt. In the first class are the taxes on theater admissions, telephone and telegraph messages, stock and bond transfers, electricity, and bank checks. Inelastic price structures in this group prevent an advance in the price, in which the tax could be disguised; instead, the levy will be openly added to the price as a constant reminder to the consumer that he is paying the bill, but equally as a guaranty that he is paying no more than the actual amount levied. In its original form the tax on electricity was to be borne by the generating companies, but in a last-minute change of heart the Senate shifted the load to the commercial and domestic consumer. The industrial user was exempted, apparently on the theory that a factory employing power in manufacturing goods is more truly a "producer" than the corner grocery store lit by electricity. If we are already suffering from overproduction and underconsumption, as most people seem to believe, a good deal could be said for discouraging the further making of goods and for clearing the retail channels of distribution; but this phase of the matter did not appeal to the lawmakers.

Already some of these taxes are causing concern to the companies which, nominally, do not pay them. The motion-picture industry, terribly reduced from its glamorous condition of a few years ago and threatened with a number of receiverships, is wondering how many of its patrons who formerly managed to pay 50 cents for a ticket will consent to pay 55 cents. Dealings on the Stock Exchange, which now carry a tax load of $8 or $9 a hundred shares, have fallen to a low ebb, and short sales, already rendered difficult by numerous rules and restrictions, are further handicapped by the fact that the federal tax must be paid twice, originally by the short seller and again every time the lender of stocks recalls his loan, even if this occurs every day. The United States Post Office has already issued a warning that private mail-carrying organizations, formed to avoid the new three-cent letter rate, are illegal.

The other class of taxes referred to above, applying to the manufacturer of commodities, will fall wherever the exigencies of the market dictate. Gasoline prices have been advanced in a number of localities to offset the tax, but with rising supplies of crude oil and prospective reduction in the use of gasoline, which the Standard Oil Company of New York estimates will amount to from 6 to 15 per cent during the remainder of the year, there obviously is no firm basis for shifting the tax to the owners of cars and trucks.

So with automobiles and tires. Manufacturers of tires made strenuous efforts to get rid of their stocks in time to avoid the tax, and in doing so loaded their dealers with supplies which are likely to last for months. Only, apparently, when these goods are finally in the hands of users will the question of who pays the tax become acute. The tire companies, notoriously at odds among themselves and dominated as to price by the powerful mail-order houses, are in no position to be high-handed when that time arrives; but sheer necessity may force an advance in prices or lowering of quality. This whole tax episode, coming at a time when corporate profits and general purchasing power are at the lowest levels in years, can hardly fail to result in a further curtailment of both.

S. PALMER HARMAN

Books and Films

Prelude

By CONRAD AIKEN

True inwardness—what! is there such a phrase?—
is the truth inward, and not outward—is the oak tree false in the bark, false in the leaf or mast, true only in the root? and you, poor biped, who rise in the morning to walk and talk—are the shoes that await you by the bedroom chair less true than dreams from which you wake, the hat that hangs in the hall less true than memory which remembers it, reaches a hand to it—the door less true than the hand that shuts it?

Move outward, and you only move, poor biped, an atom's atom from here to here, never from here to there—again your "self" you meet, it is yourself that waits outside the door, salutes you on the waking side of dream—hands you your coat, your collar, the new necktie, directs your appetite, chooses an egg, says, as you read the morning paper, act or do not act, reflect, do not reflect, love viciously, love wisely, love not at all—this is "you," this headline in the news, the news is "you," is old already, undiscovered is "you" too, long discovered. Greet your face—dispersed in some such terms, phrased, rephrased; speak to the uttermost star, which is yourself.

Are these less "you" than the decayed molar?
the lost appendix? the leaky heart? the mind too much absorbed in daily bread of sex?
Learn the true outwardness of inner truth!
time will at last bring both at once to end.

For at one stroke—no matter whence it come—lightning or ice or blood—inward and outward will singularly cease, and be the same.

Then history will give to both a name;
And so at last those things so bravely done will be at peace with what was merely known.

The Meaning of Individualism

By HENRY HAZLITT

FROM the author of "The Meaning of a Liberal Education" and "Liberty" this book* is disappointing. The problem which the title suggests is perhaps the crucial social problem of our time, but Mr. Martin throws little fresh light upon it. There is at present an astonishingly widespread confusion of thought which has led an increasing number of writers to denounce "individualism" in general without giving us any clear idea of what they mean by the term, and without having any themselves; and Mr. Martin had an excellent opportunity to point to some of the absurdities in this position and to bring clarity to the subject. He has, indeed, pointed to some of the absurdities, and he has said some things very well, but unfortunately he has overstated his case. Most of the present volume is an able but old-fashioned plea for "the individual" against "the mass"; often it gives us oratory where it should give us analysis, and at moments it seems suspiciously like a mere apology for class exploitation.

"Individualism" is usually represented, both by its champions and by its enemies, as a very simple doctrine, when in reality it is a word covering several distinct and often complex doctrines. We may distinguish at least three main meanings:

1. Most frequently in America today both defenders and opponents mean by it a certain economic theory and practice, but even here it may have several meanings. It may sometimes mean the profit system or capitalism as opposed to socialism or communism; it may sometimes mean the prevalence of "the little fellow," the small entrepreneur, as opposed to the chain stores or the great corporations; it may sometimes mean the right to unrestricted profits, or the open shop, or opposition to unemployment insurance. In general it means economic laissez faire, but laissez faire in the interests of the capitalist class, not of the working class. Therefore the word has become a catchword in the mouths of reactionaries and an epithet in the mouths of liberals, Socialists, and Communists. It has, in short, ceased to be a word of very precise reference and has become a sort of emotive signal.

2. "Individualism" is also the belief that the interests of "the individual" are opposed to those of "society," and that all conflicts must, where possible, be resolved in favor of the individual. Allied with this is the belief that the genius or the great man is "born," not "made," and that he would have emerged as the same kind of genius or great man in practically any society. Both of these notions are profoundly mistaken. "The individual" and "society" are not different things, but merely two ways of regarding the same thing; and the individual is not an isolated monad, but a social product. His ideals and interests, his very language and logic, everything, in fact, that enables him to think at all, is socially given him. Individuality itself is a social product; it is not found in primitive societies and does not emerge until a late stage historically. One might even date it, indeed, from the pharaoh Ikhnaton.

3. Individualism may mean, finally, an emphasis on the social value of individuality, on the fostering of the greatest possible variety among human beings, on the recognition of superiority, on the need for encouraging independence of thought, and freedom from the passions, credulities, and superstitions of the mob.

It is for individualism in this third sense that the case is strongest. It is for individualism in this third sense that Mr. Martin mainly pleads, and in its defense he has many vigorous and admirable things to say. He tries to show how this achievement of individuality comes in conflict, first, with the industrial organization of the modern world and its standardized mass appeals; second, with the accidents of American history; and, third, with the psychology of the crowd itself. His historical analysis of American traditions is very illuminating, his indictment of our public-school education as a mere instrument for perpetuating crowd-mindedness is impressive, and I cannot resist quoting his eloquent passage on advertising:

* "The Conflict of the Individual and the Mass in the Modern World." By Everett Dean Martin. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

Propaganda is not education; it strives for the closed mind rather than for the open mind. It is not concerned with the development of mature individuals. Its aim is immediate action. . . . Advertising and propaganda at best tell only one side of the story; they are hostile to a spirit of disinterested investigation; they substitute slogans for critical ideas. They discourage the suspension of judgment, and make for intolerance and insincerity. It is impossible to understand the mind of the American public without taking into account the tremendous psychological effect of bringing up a generation of people in a daily environment of advertising.

It is doubly unfortunate, therefore, that Mr. Martin has weakened the effect of his book by failing adequately to define his aim. There are too many dubious identifications. Mr. Martin attacks "democracy," but it is not always clear whether he means by it the theory and practice of egalitarianism or a certain form of political organization—and if he means the latter, he does not tell us precisely what form of political organization he would prefer instead. He does, indeed, say at one point: "We deplore the basis in slavery of this [pre-Civil War American Southern] culture, but then there is undoubtedly something to be said for the resulting leadership of the educated over the mass. One such result is civilized decency." Does Mr. Martin mean that economic and physical exploitation of the mass is necessary for recognition of intellectual superiority and leadership? And if so, does he recommend our paying that price? He tends also to identify democracy with communism—"The philosophy of communism is in many respects the logical and consistent goal of democracy"—and there is apparently a further identification of egalitarianism, communism, and materialism—"We forget that what the proletariat wants primarily is to get rich." In his attacks on economic reform he even falls back upon sheer mysticism: "What if the lot of man in the earth is harder, inevitably more 'unjust,' wickeder, than we moderns have ever dared to admit? What if there is an inevitable 'curse,' call it what you please from the modern point of view, that lurks in the very heart of human existence, and must show its results in this or any civilization?" He remarks later that "it is very probable that there is a definite limitation to such an increase in average wealth and that we may even now have reached that limit"; but he gives us no reasons for this belief any fresher or more convincing than those put forward by Malthus.

His illustrations also are unfortunate. He attempts to prove that great men were alive in the world in the Victorian Age, but hardly today. "Among English writers," he asks, "how does H. G. Wells stand in the shoes of Thackeray?" But might he not more fairly have substituted either Bernard Shaw or Joyce for Wells? (Or is he scoring a technical point by omitting Irishmen?) "It is hardly likely," he goes so far as to say at one point, "that we shall have another Roosevelt or Wilson; the public is weary of such personalities in politics." Apparently his only ground for this conclusion is that we are now in the days of the Coolidges and Hoovers. Wouldn't he have felt the same way if he had lived in the days of Hayes, Garfield, and Arthur? Or in those of Fillmore, Pierce, and Buchanan?

Such needless generalizations are deplorable because they weaken the force of the genuinely important things that Mr. Martin has to say. Had he been more careful to distinguish, for the reader and in his own mind, the various doctrines that come under the name of individualism, he could have rendered an important service in helping to rescue individualism—in the sense of independence of mind, rich and deep individuality—from the disrepute it has fallen into through confusion with individualism in its various other meanings. Critics who have recently been converted to sympathy with communism, for example, have written in effect that the great bane of American literature has been "individualism," and have cited as its victims Emerson, Thoreau, Hawthorne, Melville, Poe, and Whitman! What they mean by individualism appears sometimes to be insufficient recognition of the value of traditional culture, sometimes the doctrine of self-reliance, sometimes the desire for solitude and the mere lack of personal affability and warmth, and sometimes the failure to be a Communist. What they appear to recommend is a sort of mystic self-identification of the writer—even if he happens to be middle class, as most of our writers are—with "the proletariat." To estimate the probable effects of such pseudo-proletarianism would carry us too far afield. Let us at least keep in mind, however, that whatever an individual writer has to say in common with everybody else will be interesting only to the sociologist or the professional literary historian, and then only for its typicality. It is all very well to say in our time, as we so often do, that a writer like Dante, for example, is important to us because he "epitomizes the Middle Ages," or Voltaire because he "represents" the eighteenth century. The belief that great writers are "typical" of their times is largely the illusion of later ages—an illusion which arises partly because our conception of that age is formed from those very writers. Even the greatest writer, of course, is certain in some way to reflect his age; that is not an achievement, it is rather something that he cannot escape; but to his contemporaries he is important because he gives to certain ideas or ideals, whether they are prevalent or rare in their own day, a richer, more profound, or more original expression than anyone else has given them. The great writer survives, in brief, only because he is great as an individual.

American Humor

Tobacco Road. By Erskine Caldwell. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

ALL the events in "Tobacco Road," Erskine Caldwell's first novel since "The Bastard," pass in a monotone through Georgia seasons, through hunger and shiftlessness, through death and marriage. No one event receives more emphasis than another: Bessie, the woman preacher, is "ganged" in a cheap hotel, the grandmother is run over, the Ford is bashed in, a Negro is killed, but the sentences have no bumps to show that the story has been jolted out of its slow pace. Caldwell's method is completely identified with the casual happenings to his characters, who seem thereby to acquire some of the comic properties intrinsic in chickens. The notion has gone about that the deliquescent characters, their squalor, their utter placidity, make Caldwell's writing "primitive"; his sentence structure has made possible the belief that his work is naive; and because the setting is rural and the humors supposedly exaggerated, he is said to resemble Mark Twain and Bret Harte. These false notions have completely obscured what is an original, mature approach to the incongruities existing in a people who ignore the civilization that contains them as completely as the civilization ignores them.

By the simple construction of his sentences, by the fact that he deals usually with isolated rural people who come into contact with other ways of American life only at its more amusing points, and by giving only an external account of events,

Caldwell is able to build a series of comic meanings about events—hunger, death, property—which have a totally different significance for the reader. The comic meanings are never explicit in his work; the author leaves it to the reader to call them up for himself; and his stories and novels take on an immediate kind of humor and, occasionally, a kind of pathos which is far from sentimentality. On the surface the method is like Hemingway's; but Hemingway makes it known that one thing matters more than another, if nowhere else than in the dialogues which indicate that there is more than can be said in words. Caldwell makes no such concession; everything is told baldly; the event is all. The reader gets the effect he pleases, but he will be pleased to get a bracing kind of humor. It is probable that Caldwell could not obtain any high emotional response to his characters by this method, which, fortunately, and unlike Hemingway, he does not force on to every and any kind of material he is interested in. When, however, in the last paragraph of the book he tries to be ironic, to suggest just how the reader should take the last stretch, he falls into cheap sentimentality notably absent from his characters' pronouncements anywhere else in the novel. There is nothing sentimental, for example, about Jeeter's lyrical speeches of complaint, for everything is complained about. The error of the last words of the book is the error of dropping the comic method to point a moral.

KENNETH WHITE

Voices in the Wilderness

The American Jitters. By Edmund Wilson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

Toward Soviet America. By William Z. Foster. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

MR. WILSON'S book, as he himself says, is made up chiefly of "straight reporting" of various events and conditions in this country between the autumns of 1930 and 1931. It is good reporting, pictorial and free from smart cynicism though not movingly dramatic. It would hardly be worth reproducing between covers except for the final chapters on The Best People and The Case of the Author. Here Mr. Wilson analyzes and editorializes devastatingly on what has gone before. In general he sees the predictions of Karl Marx coming true in the United States. "Capitalism has run its course, and we shall have to look for other ideals than the ones that capitalism has encouraged." Then he confesses, "I don't know where they are coming from."

Mr. Foster thinks he can tell him. The best of "Toward Soviet America" as of "The American Jitters" is at the end. The early chapters are the orthodox Marxian gospel, in the application of which to recent economic history in America Mr. Foster is not always quite fair or strictly accurate. Nor would he probably resent having this said. Communists have a habit of fixing their eyes on the target, regarding with indifference, not to say contempt, the ammunition used. But the concluding chapters on The Revolutionary Way Out of the Crisis and The United Soviet States of America give a brief, frank, and understandable exposition of the program of the Communist Party in America which has long been needed.

To those who maintain that the socialization of Russia was practicable because of the primitive character of industry there, but that our highly developed system would present vast difficulties, Mr. Foster replies that on the contrary the transformation would be quicker and easier here than in a country where it has been necessary to build up plant and organization. He is less convincing when he writes: "The real measure of a revolutionary situation in any given country is the strength of the Communist Party" (in the United States 15,000). Many Communists hold that what counts is not the size of the party but the number of persons who in a crisis would be sufficiently in sympathy with communism to support it. Certainly that is the heart of the situation, and at the same time its most elusive aspect.

Mr. Wilson is not optimistic. Mr. Foster, of course, is. The Communists have this great advantage, that they are the only group in America today with perfect assurance in their economic theories and unbounded enthusiasm to put them into effect. Mr. Wilson looks at the "best people"—and gives them up. But he thinks perhaps a new generation of radicals is rising in the ranks of labor upon whom some reliance can be placed. There is a deal of significance in his statement that we have not merely lost our way in the economic jungle but have lost "our conviction of the value of what we were doing." Emphatically man cannot live by bread alone. (Try and get even that now, some reader interjects scornfully.) Especially is this true of practical, idealistic Americans. They must have their beliefs and their enthusiasms. The old-time religion of money-making is played out. Some substitute is inevitable.

Mr. Wilson's book is to be commended to two classes: to those timid souls who concede that modern industrialism has broken down but think that, while preserving the profits system, a little tinkering will set the machine going again, and to the cheer-up school of talkers who proclaim that the cure for a cock-eyed world is a pair of rose-colored glasses. Mr. Foster's book should be required reading for every person invited to make a chamber-of-commerce speech or nominated for any public office above that of dog-catcher. Also it is to be commended to all those who know in advance that it is not so, even if they finish it without a belief changed—as probably they will. For it must be said that the volume is a better exposition of the program of the Communist Party of America than it is a persuasive argument that economic change will or should come by grace of that group. Mr. Foster says that just as capitalist industry developed in the world a hundred years ago along the lines established in England, so communism will come elsewhere as it came in Russia. But even if the premise of the proposition were truer than it is, the conclusion would not be inevitable.

We like to say that history teaches this and that, but does it teach anything of value in a crisis, unless it is that great changes come unexpectedly and accomplish what all the best minds know to be impossible? Nobody can more than vaguely guess what is in the hearts of the American people today—much less what may be there tomorrow if conditions continue to go from bad to worse. But if there is a halfway safe prediction, it is that an upheaval in this country will not arise under the direction of any existing political group, nor be controllable by it.

ARTHUR WARNER

Shorter Notices

God's Gentleman. By Garry August. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The author of this story of a young rabbi in a Midwestern community is himself of the rabbinate, so it may be presumed he knows whereof he writes. Indeed, one cannot doubt that a young man of normal decency like his Daniel Sharwell, officiating in a smug community in the fat years before the slump, would have a hard-enough time carrying to his congregation a message of spiritual dignity and integrity. Nor can one doubt that such a congregation must have been quite as dreadful as the author says. One may, however, question the supposed idealism of the young rabbi, with his swelling bank account and his bonds and his glad rags and his canned culture. Perhaps this is even the intention the author wished to convey, although he never says so explicitly. Young Rabbi Sharwell did not have to succumb to Babbittry; he had merely to give in to himself. Mr. August's style on the whole is merely competent, and at times considerably less than that.

I Cover the Waterfront. By Max Miller. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Publishers often advertise books as "different." Generally they are not. As a rule a book falls—and the publisher wants it to fall—in one of several fixed classes. Mr. Miller's does not. Out of his work for the San Diego (California) Sun he has written a volume of brief sketches, partly narrative, partly philosophical, of a sort well known in Europe but little done in this country in recent years. Without artifice or pretentiousness, Mr. Miller's book shows fresh observation and an original turn of thought that make it worthy to have and to hold.

Dictator. By George Slocombe. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

Mr. Slocombe, who is a veteran foreign correspondent for an English newspaper, has written a very agreeable romance about the life of an imaginary contemporary dictator. Hannibal, a son of the people, a despiser of liberalism and democracy, returns from exile to his native Thalia as the man of destiny. He is obeyed, feared, and hated by both the aristocrats and the liberals, and is overthrown by a cabal of his enemies when, in a moment of weakness, he falls in love with the king's daughter. It is only after years of exile and after immersing himself in the class struggle on the side of the proletariat that he gets his chance to come back, this time, presumably, to wipe the slate clean of all remnants of the established order.

China. By Marc Chadourne. Translated from the French by Harry Block. Illustrated by Covarrubias. Covici-Friede. $3.

Covarrubias was the perfect illustrator for this book. In all his drawings he reduces his human beings to animal, sometimes to skeletal, terms. Similarly, M. Chadourne gives us the Chinese as animals, pictured with irony and repugnance. His French orderliness shudders at the vast disorder of China, and makes no effort to understand it except by way of glittering paradoxes, which, indeed, complete their circles but contain nothing. The writing is witty and vivacious; it is almost always good entertainment; but the illumination it offers is about as valuable as that of a handful of firecrackers on a dark night.

The Way of the Lancer. By Richard Boleslavski. In Collaboration with Helen Woodward. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

This is not one of the Literary Guild's good choices. Mr. Boleslavski, once an officer in a regiment of Polish lancers serving with the Russian army, and now a stage director in America, has had amazing and terrible adventures. He has many good stories to tell; but whether by his fault or his collaborator's, they are told melodramatically. The book is full of bad "fine" writing. It is readable, but one leaves it with the feeling that good material has gone to waste.

George Moore. By Humbert Wolfe. Oxford University Press. $1.50.

The first twenty-odd pages of this little book contain some of the most irritating, dandified, epigonous prose I have run across in a long time. Mr. Wolfe, however, drops the manner as soon as he gets into his matter, and turns out a sound, well-finished, and sensitive study of Moore as seen in his life and in his books. Often Mr. Wolfe's style falls into the cadences and methods of George Moore, which is an advantage, for Moore's style, even in Mr. Wolfe's imitation, is superior to his own.

Films

Morals, Facts, and Fiction

A CHINESE mandarin may be an extremely cultured person. He will compose poems of superb refinement and keen delicacy of perception describing the beauty of a rose or a sunset, dilating on the pangs of love, or philosophizing on the vanity of life. He will show a connoisseur's appreciation of fine painting and will surround himself with exquisite furniture and porcelain. But he will not think twice before ordering the head chopped off of some poor beggar who has been found guilty of breaking the law. The pleasure-loving Romans who wrote poetry, copied Greek sculpture, and studied Greek philosophy were equally free from the Christian scruples about the taking of human life, and enjoyed nothing better than the spectacle of gladiators fighting one another to the death. Today we call this sort of thing barbarism and cruelty, but is it? Perhaps the difference lies only in the greater concern that our civilization shows for the individual, a concern which past civilizations did not share, and which future civilizations may not share either.

All these profound meditations, however, are merely a preamble to the statement that death fights between wild animals, of which fights there are a goodly number in "Bring 'em Back Alive" (Mayfair), are a fascinating sight, our enjoyment of which remains completely untainted by any feeling of sadistic lust. The day may or may not come when we shall set as much store by the life of an animal as we do by the life of a human being. But for the present, so far as animals are concerned, we still share the general attitude of the Chinese and the ancient Romans: their life simply does not count. And once we have dismissed moral considerations, we can freely admit that there is majesty and beauty in the combat of such opponents as a tiger and a python. There are other exciting fights in "Bring 'em Back Alive," but the tiger-python contest, which fortunately for both combatants results in a draw, is far and away the most interesting thing that has been shown on the screen for a long time.

It may be proper to inquire whether the fact that this film is essentially a record of actual life has not also contributed something to its appeal. Unhesitatingly we say that it has. Facts as such are not necessarily interesting. But unfamiliar facts are. And after the reels of stereotyped fiction that make up most of the films, it is a decided relief to see something that springs straight from life and has preserved its natural form and color. Wild life in a jungle is not the only natural subject to have found its way to the screen this week. We have had some magnificent views of the Tyrolean Alps, with an exciting ski run through the mountains, in "The Doomed Battalion" (Rivoli)—a picture which in its fictional material and its treatment does not rise much above the mediocre, although, having been made in Germany, it is slightly less conventional than the war pictures of Hollywood.

We have also had a more intelligent picture than ordinarily comes out of Hollywood, "The Dark Horse" (Winter Garden), whose claim to distinction is its good-natured but merciless lampooning of the cant and ballyhoo of American politics. Here again one is impressed not so much by the story, which is a little far-fetched and scarcely reveals an honest grappling with real facts, as by the general picture of the dishonesty and racketeering which rule election campaigns in this country. The film is further marked by amusing and pointed dialogue, and on the whole is very competently acted.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 13, 1932

No. 3497

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	19
EDITORIALS:
Roosevelt Wins! .....	22
The Two Platforms .....	23
"Take Away the Army" .....	24
A Forgotten Poet .....	24
CARTOON: "HAVE ONE ON ME." By Edmund Duffy .....	25
THE DEMOCRATIC TROUGH AT CHICAGO. By Oswald Garrison Villard .....	26
THE MILWAUKEE MIRACLE. By Mauritz A. Hallgren .....	28
CHARITY AND THE STATE. By Robert Briffault .....	30
GETTING OUT OF CENTRAL AMERICA. By Raymond Leslie Buell .....	32
THE ARTIST IN SOVIET RUSSIA. By Louis Lozowick .....	35
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .....	36
CORRESPONDENCE .....	36
FINANCE: HOW GERMANY MAY PAY. By S. Palmer Harman .....	38
BOOKS AND ARCHITECTURE:
Last Hour. By Leslie Nelson Jennings .....	39
Germany. By Oswald Garrison Villard .....	39
A Modern Novelist. By Clifton Fadiman .....	40
A Victorian Sundial. By Horace Gregory .....	41
Have-nots and Know-nots. By V. F. Calverton .....	42
The Essential Issue. By William Seagle .....	42
The Nationalist Spirit. By William MacDonald .....	43
Shorter Notices .....	43
Architecture: Dishes to Break. By Douglas Haskell .....	44
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE .....	44

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MARK VAN DOREN

LEWIS S. GANNETT

H. L. MENCKEN

CARL VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON

NORMAN THOMAS

ARTHUR WARNER

MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

AT LAUSANNE the European Powers appear to be engaged in a sort of kindergarten game. Each delegation seems to be trying to see how close it can come to the central problem without actually touching it. Excepting Italy not one of the delegations, not even the German, has yet dared to demand that the financial slate be wiped clean. The Italians courageously enough, though surely with an eye to the fact that they owe much more than they are owed, have urged that "cancelation be applied equally to all European Powers, creditors and debtors, of reparations and war debts." The Italian attitude stands out in marked contrast to that of the other delegations, who have talked in whispers when mentioning the debt to the United States. The creditor nations, those, that is, which have been receiving reparations but which at the same time owe money to us, want to make the final Lausanne settlement contingent upon our attitude. If we agree to cancel the war debt, they will be more lenient with Germany; if not, Germany will be asked to pay, after an extended moratorium period, the sum of approximately $1,000,000,000 disguised as "a contribution to European reconstruction." The Germans are wise in rejecting this proposal, for its adoption would keep alive that uncertainty which is now doing so much to impede a return to normal economic and financial relationships. And in the meantime the United States, by its official silence and by such devices as the anti-cancelation plank in the Democratic platform, continues to make the situation still worse.

IT IS DIFFICULT to see just what the Progressives of the Senate find so attractive in the Presidential candidacy of Franklin D. Roosevelt. The attitude of the Democratic Progressives is at least understandable; they are supporting the candidate of their party. But what of the Republicans, Senators Norris, Johnson, Frazier, and the others who have either openly come out for Roosevelt or are flirting with the idea? Can it be that the magic name of Roosevelt still has such an appeal that otherwise level-headed Senators are being misled by the name into believing that the current Roosevelt is another aggressive "friend of the common people"? Or are these Senators so disgusted with Herbert Hoover that they feel anyone else in the White House would be better than the present Chief Executive? This tendency of the Washington Progressives to bolt their party ticket is another manifestation of their political weakness. If they were a compact, well-disciplined group they could exercise considerable influence over the policies of that party. Such were the tactics followed by the elder La Follette. It is noteworthy that his son appears to be following the same course. If they feel that the Republican Party is not the place for them they ought in all honesty to get out of it, and either join the Democratic Party or form a progressive or liberal party of their own. As it is, they are merely shooting blindly into the wind. Their shifting and wavering will be of little help to the Roosevelt candidacy.

FEW MEASURES could have been more disheartening and essentially farcical than the economy bill finally signed by the President. It was adopted after endless bickering and recriminations, not only between individual Congressmen, but between Congress and the President and between the Senate and the House. What has finally emerged is a measure under which it is hopefully estimated that about $150,000,000 a year will be saved. The essential insignificance of this amount becomes clear when it is compared with the deficit of $3,788,000,000 reported by Mr. Mills for the fiscal year. Mr. Hoover in signing the bill professed only "limited satisfaction" with it, but he himself had refused the repeated requests of Senator Robinson to say specifically where the larger economies he originally demanded should be made. The President refused to consider every proposal of a salary cut, even though the cuts proposed exempted the smaller salaries and were considerably less than the reduction in the cost of living in recent years. He insisted instead on his "furlough" plan, under which federal employees are obliged to take the equivalent of a month's vacation without pay. This does reduce the government's pay roll, but it is an illogical method of doing it in view of the type of problem that the government faces. The economies are called for not because the government's "volume of business" has fallen off, but because tax receipts to pay salaries have shrunk with the shrinkage of the income of the taxpayers. This shrinkage is partly the result of a stagnation in general business, which may be assumed to be temporary, and partly the result of a world collapse in price levels, which may be assumed to be of a comparatively permanent nature. Yet the furlough plan is an essentially temporary device to meet this permanent change.

AFTER ALL the ballyhoo of the President's anti-hoarding campaign, in which repeated efforts were made to bully confidence into returning, Washington is obliged to confess that all the gains made in the anti-hoarding drive which was started early in February have now been wiped out. In the week ending June 29 the volume of currency in circulation had to be increased $144,000,000, chiefly to meet the demands caused by the panicky run on Chicago banks. The President is entirely right in his assumption that the chief need at present is the restoration of confidence; he is entirely wrong in the methods by which he hopes to restore it. Loss of confidence, as it is necessary to insist as long as the President continues not to recognize the fact, is the symptom, not the disease. Confidence is a thermometer which responds to the conditions in which it finds itself. It is futile to attempt to deal with it directly. It will not be restored until the statesmen of the world, including our own in particular, show the intelligence and the courage at least to reverse the tragically stupid international economic policies which have done more than anything else to undermine it.

MR. HOOVER'S amazing disarmament proposal, which we discussed at some length last week, has encountered the anticipated opposition abroad. In keeping with the new Mussolini-Grandi peace policy Italy has, of course, unqualifiedly indorsed the Hoover plan, and England likewise has signified its approval, although Sir John Simon, the Foreign Secretary, has been rather reluctant to discuss frankly the English position. France has been hesitating, as was expected. The civilian element in the Herriot Government is disposed to use the Hoover proposal as a basis for negotiations, but the French General Staff will have none of the plan. However, the most serious and most significant opposition comes from Japan. In its present warlike mood Tokio is quite unlikely to consider any suggestion looking toward reduction of its own armaments. And because of the various insincere provisions of the Hoover plan, which would cut armies and navies in other countries while leaving our own with plenty of room in which to expand, the Japanese find themselves in an excellent position to combat that plan. The Japanese contend that the proposed one-third reduction in the size of the various navies would upset the 5-5-3 ratio between America, England, and Japan agreed upon at the Washington conference. If the plan is pressed, Tokio will no doubt insist upon having the entire naval-ratio question reopened. In that case, instead of proving a forward step, we shall find that the Hoover gesture has actually dragged us back to 1922.

A GAIN WE ARE READING headlines declaring that "Disease Stalks Hungry Bonus Army." The responsibility for this lies not with the war veterans, but with the authorities in Washington. These former soldiers are in the national capital to exercise a constitutional right, the right of petition, which can be denied them neither by Congress nor by the police of Washington, the servants of Congress. Only in the event that the bonus marchers violate a police ordinance or other law can the authorities proceed against them, but such procedure must be in accordance with law. The Washington authorities know this. Hence they have adopted other methods in trying to discourage the men. They have virtually compelled them to set up their principal camp on the low-lying and unhealthy Anacostia flats, although more sanitary grounds are available in the immediate vicinity. There can be little wonder that disease has broken out among the veterans, and we see the police attempting to use this as a lever to get rid of them. We are as much opposed to the bonus as ever. We see in the presence of the veterans in the national capital a possible cause of serious disturbances. Nevertheless, we believe that they are in Washington on no unlawful mission. They must be supported in their constitutional rights. And the authorities of Washington are bound by every moral principle to see that these men, not as petitioners, but as victims of our mal-adjusted economic system, are provided with food and decent shelter. This the state owes every one of its destitute.

PLANS OF THE NEW GOVERNMENT of Manchukuo to seize the customs receipts collected at Dairen have brought strong protests from England, France and the United States. These protests, at least so far as this country is concerned, were inevitable. The whole of China is under a single customs administration. This fact in a very definite sense symbolizes the political integrity of that country. If Washington were to recognize the asserted right of the new government to collect the customs, it would in fact be recognizing the separation of Manchuria from China proper. But the United States has long contended that Manchuria was an integral part of China. Moreover, in his note of January 7 Secretary of State Stimson flatly declared that this country could not recognize any action taken by Japan in Manchuria which violated the Nine-Power Treaty or the Kellogg Pact, and since then the United States has steadfastly refused to acknowledge the existence of an independent state in Manchuria. It is interesting to note that the customs protests were addressed to Tokio, for this is in line with Mr. Stimson's plan to hold Japan accountable for its aggression against China in Manchuria. Even more interesting is the fact that Great Britain and France delivered similar protests. This indicates that they will hereafter support the new Stimson policy as suggested in the American note of January 7.

EVEN A SMALL VOICE of dissent against the tariff war is worth noting. In Europe in the last few years little if any protest against the ever-growing trade barriers has been heard. France has been foremost among the European countries in smothering international trade by one means or another, primarily through the constant juggling of its irrational and irritating quota system. And at this distance France has appeared virtually unanimous in supporting the government's program. Now, however, an increasing number of complaints against the French tariff and quota arrangement are being lodged with the government by the interests which are always the first to feel the inevitable consequences of a trade war. The exporting firms of that country, according to dispatches from Paris, declare that French industry "is in deadly peril" as a result of the drastic decline in foreign trade. They report that "the remarkable activity which brought prosperity to French ports and shipping, and made of Paris the universal city of art and luxury, is extinguished." This is but the natural result of a policy designed to "protect" home industries by uneconomic methods. Somehow or other, modern governments do not seem to understand that in their stupid endeavors to "protect" domestic industries they are simply choking to death the trade upon which the real protection of these industries depends. Let us hope that the French exporting houses will succeed at least in bringing their own government to its senses.

NINE DEAD and a dozen wounded make up the latest casualties in the private war which has been raging in Kentucky. Three of the killings occurred in Harlan County, when James Jones and the notorious gunman-deputy, Bill Randolph, were fired on by men in ambush, Jones being killed and Randolph wounded. Randolph thereupon summoned a group of his fellow-deputies to aid him, and while he was telling them his story, was shot dead by Clarence Middleton, described as a "storekeeper for a coal company." This was the signal for a general free-for-all, in which shots from ambush answered shots from deputies. Meanwhile in neighboring counties fights occurred in which indiscriminate deaths and gun-shot wounds were the results. Whether or not these were motivated by animosity between miners and deputies is not clear. Perhaps they were merely the time-honored Kentucky way of settling an argument. Randolph was a typical bad man with six notches on his gun. But his death, with that of the others, cannot fail to have an unfortunate effect on the trial of thirty Harlan County miners which is now going on. The fourth trial, that of F. M. Bratcher, owing to the sudden interest of one of the defense attorneys in the accused, resulted in a hung jury, eleven to one being in favor of acquittal. The prosecution was reported to be noticeably disconcerted thereby, but it has probably been very handsomely reinforced by the murder of one of the upholders of law and order.

AFTER EIGHT YEARS of service as assistant editor of the New Leader, the Socialist weekly published in New York, Edward Levinson has been summarily dismissed. Although the high-handed action of the New Leader management came after a period of increasing tension over Mr. Levinson's frank allegiance to the Norman Thomas and "militant" group within the party, the immediate occasion of it appears to have been an article written by Mr. Levinson on the Milwaukee convention, published in The Nation of June 8. This article reveals a lack of agreement between its author and the party Old Guard, and it frankly treats the lamentable issue of anti-Semitism that was dragged into the convention as having no basis in fact. That this has been hard on the patience of the veterans who mobilized behind the candidacy of Morris Hillquit for the chairmanship of the national executive committee cannot be doubted. The article was nevertheless an excellent piece of reporting and it has won commendation from numerous eyewitnesses of the convention proceedings. If the dismissal of Mr. Levinson had any shadow of justification, the subsequent behavior of the New Leader has not been calculated to win it many friends. It did not make public its act until pressure was brought; the fact that two such faithful writers as McAlister Coleman and Louis Stanley immediately resigned was not explained to its readers; and letters of protest from Coleman, Thomas, and others have not been printed, the paper disposing of the incident by declaring that the protests are based on "one-sided and inaccurate" information.

"PRISONS are supposed to reform men. Collins for nineteen years has been an exemplary citizen. What could be gained by returning him to finish his sentence?" The speaker is Governor Rolph of California; the Collins referred to is William Collins, an escaped convict, with twenty-three years of a twenty-five-year sentence for robbery to serve. Collins since his escape has found a good job, has married, and is the father of two children. Governor Rolph, in wishing to pardon him, made a very understandable humane gesture. But Collins is not only a fugitive from justice, he is a second offender, and the pardon will have to be granted by the Supreme Court of California, which, it is confidently hoped, will not refuse to allow it. It is hardly necessary to point out that this is the same Governor Rolph who categorically denied a pardon to another prisoner who has served fifteen years of a life sentence; and that it is the same Supreme Court which would not grant a pardon to another second offender who also has spent his decade and a half behind prison bars. In the Collins case there was no doubt of guilt; in the other two cases thousands of persons believe the prisoners innocent of the crime for which they are now in prison. What could be more convincing proof that Tom Mooney and Warren Billings are still incarcerated because they are regarded as dangerous characters, and not because they are believed to have committed a certain crime. If they had broken jail in 1920 and had shown themselves to be good little Republicans ever since, they might be free men today.

FOR THE FIRST TIME in eight years the windows in the British House of Lords have been thrown open, and fresh air has seeped into the domain of wig and wool-sack. It was doubtless a tonic experience, yet for many on the outside as well as for the few who attend its sessions when there is nothing better to do, it must have come as something of a shock. The immediate excuse for this minor revolution was a heat wave which has recently been engulfing the region of the lower Thames, or so, at least, runs the official apology. We incline, however, to the view that there is something sinister about the episode which has not been fully revealed. Did we not read that almost simultaneously a member of the House of Commons, defying all tradition, strode brazenly into the sacred chamber wearing a straw hat on his head? Hitherto, the Briton has always been a little sentimental about the enemies of the state who penetrated the Houses of Parliament with their nefarious plots. The revered room behind St. Stephen's chapel where Guy Fawkes planted his vengeful gunpowder is still viewed with pride; the iron gratings to which ardent suffragettes chained themselves while shrieking for the ballot have been saved. But things can go too far. That worthy guardian of the past who still, upon the approach of a courier from the Lords, slides open a speakeasy-like window in the door to the Commons and cries with Cromwellian gusto, "I spy the King's messenger!" must redouble his vigilance. The final onslaught against parliamentary institutions may very well take on a perilous momentum if such significant beginnings of revolt as these go unrebuked.

Roosevelt Wins!

ONCE more the Democratic Convention has proved how difficult it is to beat somebody with nobody.

As was the case with Mr. Hoover at Kansas City four years ago, those who wished to "stop Roosevelt" failed because they could not unite upon a single candidate for whom they were willing to sink their differences for the sake of victory. So the Democratic Party puts forth not its best foot, but a very weak one. Even Governor Ritchie, we are sure, would have proved a stronger candidate than the Governor of New York, who has won the distinction of leading his party in this campaign by silence, evasion, and by playing cheap politics. After vainly trying to change the two-thirds rule and relinquishing the effort only when it became apparent that the Roosevelt forces were not strong enough; after a grueling all-night session pushed, at first, by the Governor's champions in hopes of reaching a decision through pure fatigue; after, in short, the usual political tricks, the usual political deal was effected whereby the Garner votes were switched in return for a promise of the Vice-Presidency, and the thing was done. As in the case of President Harding, it is an unearned honor that has gone to Franklin Roosevelt. Certainly no one would dare to assert that he achieved it by courage, by outspokenness, by leadership, by a passionate defense of the right of the American citizen to life and liberty. As for the Garner nomination, it is about as bad as could be. It is not only the result of a deliberate sale of the office; it is the selection of a man thoroughly unfit for the position.

We admit that the choice was not wide. We have already stated that had we been asked to name the man to lead the Democracy we should have been stumped—to such an extent has our political life been robbed by the boss system, the corruption of public life, the false emphasis placed upon financial success in our American life. But the fact is that both the chief contenders for the Presidency are weak men; neither deserves the honor which is bound to fall to one or the other of them. The Scripps-Howard newspapers told the truth when they refused to advocate Governor Roosevelt's nomination on the ground that "he is another Hoover"—beyond question a merited rebuke. So we are launched upon a campaign which gives to the American people no real choice. They probably cannot free themselves from the old bonds of party fealty, or rise above the fear of "throwing away their vote." It has been Tweedledum and Tweedledee before, but surely never so clearly and obviously as is the case today. We defy any dissenter to point out where the line of demarcation runs, what there is that separates these corrupt and cowardly parties from each other. Their berating each other is nothing but the pot calling the kettle black. There has not been a single vote since Congress convened last December upon which all the men of one faith were on one side, and all the men of the other faith were on the other. So we submit that so far as the future and the fortunes of the United States are concerned, they will go on in just the same old way whether Mr. Roosevelt wins or Mr. Hoover.

How incredible it seems! Whether we like it or not our fortunes are tied up with the fate of the rest of the world. We cannot cut the bonds today which Mr. Wilson placed upon us in that fatal hour when he called upon the country to enter the war. Yet neither party faces with frankness and honor the existing situation. Neither will admit that our much-vaunted prosperity and our boasted American system have gone down like a pack of cards. Neither party offers a program for reconstruction—for genuine reconstruction. We do not mean the bringing back of prosperity, we mean the reorganization of our governmental, our social, and our economic life, so that the control of their institutions shall be returned to the hands of the American people where it belongs, so that we shall have an end to the rule of big business, especially now that big business has revealed itself to be utterly incompetent as it has been mercenary and gluttonous. Once more the choice is offered, not of measures, but of men; not of programs and policies, for these are not to be found on either side. Both parties are seeking to lure the voters into their camps, but not by promising radical reforms, the need of which cries to high heaven. We appeal to our readers not to be misled, not to play the politicians' game and thus aid them once more to impose their cowardice, their leaderlessness upon the American people. There is an alternative. It is to vote for an honorable, high-minded American, Norman Thomas, and not to let themselves be frightened from doing so by the parrot cry that they are wasting their votes, or that in voting for the Socialist Party they are voting for something sinister and foreign, aimed really at the destruction of the Republic. It is not those who declare that the joint heritage of the American people shall belong to the American people who are the enemies of the Republic!

As for Governor Roosevelt, we can only say of him once more what we have said of him so many times. He is honest, he is clean, he has occasionally shown leanings toward liberalism, though there is not a single case on record where he has exploded with just anger at the denial all over the country of the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution. He was willing to play the imperialist game under Woodrow Wilson in Haiti and elsewhere as Assistant Secretary of the Navy. He believes in a great navy and a powerful army. He has been farsighted in his water-power policies within the State of New York, but he has yet to declare that he will carry on that policy in the wider field that will be his if he is elected. He has spoken of the "forgotten man," but nowhere is there a real, passionate, ringing exposition of just what it is that the forgotten man has been deprived of or what should be done for him. Governor Roosevelt has had during the past few months one of the most glorious opportunities that has ever come to a public man in America, and yet he has sat tongue-tied lest he say a few words that might alienate one section of the community. We respect him in his integrity, in the moral heroism that he has shown in the face of what would have been for most men a final physical disaster. But we can see in him no leader, and no evidence anywhere that he can rise to the needs of this extraordinary hour.

The Two Platforms

IN an address before the Young Democratic clubs of Chicago President Robert M. Hutchins of the University of Chicago proposed a platform for the Democratic Party of five hundred words embodying what he called "the minimum program demanded by the present emergency." He urged that the platform should declare for leadership of the United States in disarmament "with or without the co-operation of other nations"; for a moratorium on war debts of not less than twenty years "with or without an international conference"; for the recognition of Russia; for downward revision of the tariff "with or without international conferences"; for assistance to the destitute and compulsory unemployment insurance and old-age pensions. Judged by this standard the platform actually adopted by the Democratic Party is far from admirable. Judged by the standard of the Republican platform, however, there is a great deal to be said for it.

We may begin with the prohibition plank, if only because that plank was, in the eyes of the delegates to both conventions, overwhelmingly the most important. Here the advantage is entirely with the Democrats. Their plank is clear, unequivocal, and outspoken almost to the point of rashness:

We favor the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment.

To effect such repeal, we demand that the Congress immediately propose a constitutional amendment to truly representative conventions in the States, called to act solely on that proposal.

No one could ask for greater explicitness. Compare it with the Republican plank. When we have unwrapped layer after layer of woolly words, we find that the Republican platform does not even favor a forthright submission of the issue to the voters, as even the Democratic minority plank proposed. The Republican plank declares: "We do not favor a submission limited to the issue of retention or repeal." This means that the voters are not to be given even an honest chance to express their preferences. The Republican platform proposes, instead, that an amendment be submitted "which, while retaining in the federal government power to preserve the gains already made in dealing with the evils inherent in the liquor traffic, shall allow States to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine." Nobody can possibly know what this means. It is a clear self-contradiction. If the federal government really allows the States to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine, then surely it must relinquish the power "to preserve the gains already made"; if it retains that power, it cannot allow the States to deal with the problem "as their citizens may determine." It is doubtful if a more cheaply dishonest plank was ever embodied even in the Republican platform before. It cannot fail to disgust anyone who has any honest convictions on the subject.

On the all-important economic issues before the country the Democratic platform is considerably vaguer, though it is in most respects better than the Republican. The sharpest division is on tariff policy. The Democrats condemn the "prohibitive rates" of the Hawley-Smoot tariff and urge a "competitive tariff for revenue," calling for "reciprocal tariff agreements with other nations" and "an international economic conference designed to restore international trade and facilitate exchange." One would prefer a flat promise to revise rates substantially downward "with or without international conferences," but the present plank is at least much better than the 1928 Democratic plank; it signifies a return of the Democrats at least to lip service to one of their earlier principles, and it is immensely preferable to the Republican plank. That plank not only promises to do nothing to alleviate the disastrous Smoot-Hawley tariff, but threatens to place still further tariffs on agricultural products to "protect" the farmer, and to raise rates on the products of countries with depreciated currencies.

On the question of war debts it might be argued that the Republican platform is better than the Democratic, for it at least says nothing about them, while the Democrats "oppose cancelation" and make no mention either of a moratorium or a reduction. On monetary questions the platforms are rather similar. The Democrats favor a "sound currency to be preserved at all hazards," without indicating what in their opinion constitutes a sound currency. Immediately thereafter they demand an international monetary conference to "consider the rehabilitation of silver." It is difficult to see how silver could be "rehabilitated" without bimetallism. The Republicans come out flatly for "the gold standard" and oppose "relief by currency inflation" as "unsound in principle and dishonest in results." Nevertheless, they too want an "international conference to consider matters relating to monetary questions, including the position of silver." One can only assume that neither party has any clear idea regarding what such a conference would achieve, and that these planks are intended rather as harmless sops to the silver States than as serious gestures.

On many questions the two platforms are hardly distinguishable. Both favor our entrance into the World Court; both give vague support to armament reduction; both wish the farmer well, and favor "cooperation." About all the Republicans have to offer the farmer in addition to this is more "tariff protection," while the Democrats vaguely urge "effective control of crop surpluses." Both parties, of course, favor government "economy," though the Democrats are slightly more specific here in calling for "a saving of not less than 25 per cent in the cost of the federal government," and in hinting that "generosity" to war veterans should be limited to those who have "suffered disability or disease caused by or resulting from actual service in time of war." The Democrats show concern for the regulation of holding companies, the federal control of utilities, and the correction of stock-market abuses, where the Republicans are practically silent. Finally, though both parties are cagey in indicating the amount of unemployment relief they would favor, the Democrats have placed themselves on record as favoring "unemployment and old-age insurance, under State laws." This is an admirable step forward which has attracted less attention than it deserves. The Democrats are to be congratulated on having said more in 1,400 words than the Republicans in 9,000.

"Take Away the Army"

CAMILLE ROMBAUT, a French war resister, has been sentenced to four months' imprisonment for refusal to perform military service. His trial at the ancient fortress of Lille was spectacular and received publicity throughout Europe, the hundreds of protests evidencing the recent growth in the war-resistance movement. M. Rombaut had a circle of influential friends; his defender was a well-known professor from the famous law college at Lyons; and Rombaut himself peculiarly symbolized the change that has taken place in many minds since the war. During the conflict, as a boy of fourteen, he bravely destroyed the telephone and telegraph lines which served the German headquarters in the very town from which, eighteen years later, he has been shipped off to jail.

That the revulsion against war and militarism is at last beginning to penetrate the French populace is apparent and is causing some concern to the militarists. Georges Soyeux and Fernand Plaquevent some months ago notified the authorities of their unwillingness to serve, and as yet neither has been arrested. M. Plaquevent wrote to the Minister of War: "I took part in the massacre of 1914-18. I never hated the Germans. The war deeply influenced my ideas. . . . Now I stand by the words of Victor Hugo, 'Take away the army . . . and you end war.' I have therefore decided to work for the abolition of war and the removal of its causes." Alfred Nahon, Paul Personne, and Charles Launay have followed with a similar forthright refusal to serve, despite all consequences. Interestingly enough, when Albert Einstein and Lord Ponsonby, the latter acting as chairman of the War Resisters' International, last May issued an appeal to men of military age to resist conscription, and several thousand new members joined the organization, France supplied more than any other country. Noting the trend, a French deputy, Georges Richard, is planning to introduce a bill recognizing the right of conscience. A similar measure failed of passage in the Belgian senate last year only by a vote of eighty-nine to sixty-one, and its adherents are rapidly multiplying in the present parliament.

In many regions of the world where the movement was formerly weak or non-existent, gains are being made. New groups have been established in several cities of Latin America. In Spain, where a strong pacific mood is discernible under the new republic, three groups have been organized in as many cities, while the Provincial Federation of Trade Unions in Almeria, the most southeasterly province, has unanimously adopted the complete pacifist program of the War Resisters' International. In Finland a new alternative service law has been put through as a sop to growing pacifist opinion. More than 7,000 young Swedes recently notified their government that they would never serve in the army. In reactionary Bulgaria the clergy of the Congregational and Methodist churches have come out for uncompromising war resistance. And the war resisters behind the bars in most countries of the Continent—twenty-four in Holland and seventeen in Belgium, for example—are serving as centers for a rising agitation that may in time reach those in high places who perpetually talk peace and unceasingly prepare for war.

A Forgotten Poet

THE NATION has already reviewed the new and authentic edition of the letters of Robert Burns which has just been edited by J. DeLancey Ferguson. While reading it we were suddenly struck by the amazing fact that though Burns is doubtless still widely read and widely loved he very rarely figures in any of the current discussions of poetry. A generation ago he would have come prominently to mind in any argument. Indeed, he would probably have stood for the pure poet—for essential poetry or, what would then have been the same thing, for sheer emotion expressing itself in the simplest terms and uncontaminated by metaphysics or learning. But today he is seldom either cited or imitated by poets or critics. John Donne and even Abraham Cowley are referred to ten times as often and exercise ten times as much influence on the actual writing of verse. Our fathers—to whom these last were hardly more than quaint figures out of an all-but-forgotten past—would not have believed that they, especially, could ever become the idols of the next generation, or that Burns could come to seem more remote than they from the interests and problems of the twentieth century. And yet it is an indubitable fact that he is remote. It seems absurd to speak of him as a "forgotten poet," but the phrase is almost justified.

Being curious, we instituted some inquiry among those of our friends who are most interested in poetry, and we discovered what we were inclined to suspect—namely, that Burns has been pushed aside less because his genius is unrecognized than because there seems to be nothing which one of our contemporaries can say about him. All agreed that his verse was unique and almost intolerably beautiful. All admitted that they could not read him without realizing that they were in the presence of a kind of miracle. But that miracle, they added, was one which today could not be even miraculously repeated. Donne's poetry is in the language of the moment. A dozen contemporary poets might conceivably begin a lyric in the manner of

Go and catch a falling star,
Get with child a mandrake root.

But there is not one who could commence

Oh my love's like a red, red rose
That's newly sprung in June.

Doubtless the language of criticism is almost as much responsible as is the language of poetry for the fact that Burns is seldom discussed. The only terms in which he has been written about are romantic terms, and there is no present-day critic of standing who would not be far more ready to acknowledge Burns's genius than he would be to talk about "Bobbie" Burns, the "rustic singer" and "the unspoiled child of nature." If he is ever talked about again, it will be because some new way of talking about him has been discovered. But this difficulty with the Burns legend, as distinguished from the corpus of his work, is not the only one. He is too simple, too fresh, too spontaneous, and for all his personal difficulties too untroubled in spirit for us. He is not as far away in time, but in other ways he is more remote than the poets of the seventeenth century.

"Have one on me."

The Democratic Trough at Chicago

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Chicago, July 1

LET no man say that the Democratic Party's Presidential convention, which has now adjourned, has been held in Chicago. I have just come from its last session; I have listened to all of the proceedings, the incredible speeches, including Mr. Roosevelt's address after his excellent publicity flight from Albany—a stunt worthy of his famous cousin, Theodore. Still I insist that this convention has not been held in Chicago. It has been held in some No Man's Land, in some utterly detached place, floating perhaps between heaven—or some other place—and earth. All Presidential conventions are always wonderlands in their amazing exhibition of childishness and political immaturity, their intriguing, their humbuggery. But this one almost baffles description in its total detachment from the realities of life. Hour after hour we sat there in the sweltering heat—in one case thirteen hours of all-night misery—watching the speakers go through their motions, deafened and racked by the loudest organ on earth, the blaring bands, and the yelling—all the horrors—and there was practically nothing whatever to give the listeners the faintest idea that this convention had any connection whatever with the United States of 1932. It could not have been much nearer than the moon to what is actually going on under the Stars and Stripes, and was certainly utterly remote from all the vital happenings of this workaday world.

Yes, I know that in its preamble the platform speaks of "this time of unprecedented economic and social distress" and declares that those in charge of our government "have ruined our foreign trade, destroyed the values of our commodities and products, crippled our banking system, robbed millions of our people of their life savings and thrown millions more out of work, produced widespread poverty, and brought the government to a state of financial distress unprecedented in time of peace," but even this carries no conviction that the convention was really concerned with or realized what is going on in the United States today. In this city in which it was supposedly held there are endless suffering and human misery, with hundreds of thousands of persons being supported by one dole or another. On the second day of the convention the county treasurer announced that he would go before a county judge on July 11 to apply for judgment and sale for taxes of some 500,000 parcels of real estate involving over $100,000,000 of delinquent 1930 taxes—100,000 more items than were delinquent in 1929. On the same day Senator Lewis of Illinois appealed to the United States government for an immediate loan of $30,000,000 to keep the city of Chicago from collapsing financially, and to enable it to prevent the actual starvation of hundreds of thousands of its citizens and to pay a few back salaries of teachers and other civic employees. One would think that in this setting a sane and intelligent convention, imbued with even average common sense, would have cut out the brass bands, the parading, and the senseless speeches, and would really have got down to business and seriously worked out an economic program, or at least discussed some far-reaching policies to lead the country out of its economic distress.

But no—the convention was interested only in the wet plank. As in the Republican convention the question of beer and booze outranked everything else. That was what the delegates wanted settled. They did not give a tinker's damn about anything else. So far as they were concerned, they, like their leaders, were perfectly willing to ignore the economic chaos. The delegates would not have cared if the platform had made no reference whatever to the impoverishment of millions of our people. As it is, the platform made a great hit; it is short, concise, and without the usual number of weasel words, though it has quite enough. But beyond that there is little to be said for it. True, it calls for unemployment and old-age insurance, but that is not to be done by the Democratic Party next year, if it takes hold of the government, but is to be left to the tender mercies of forty-eight State legislatures. It believes in the spread of employment by shorter hours of labor and a shorter week, with the government setting the example, and it wants, of course, to help the farmer. But when it comes to the relation of government to business, we have the same old swindle—the same old Republican swindle. Thus it desires "the removal of government from all fields of private enterprise, except where necessary to develop public work and natural resources in the common interest." And then in its next paragraph the platform pledges the government to regulate some more; it asks federal control of holding companies which sell securities in interstate commerce, and of the rates of utility companies operating across State lines. It wants the government to control and regulate "exchanges trading in securities and commodities"—as if it could tell us just where in the federal Constitution is to be found a power to regulate domestic concerns of this kind. For the rest, the platform would have been an admirable document in the campaign of 1908. To heighten the effect of this, the managers of the convention gave to ex-Senator James A. Reed of Missouri the opportunity to make what was undoubtedly his final appearance in public life and to ride again his favorite hobby that we must control the great corporations and trusts and prevent mergers and other unfair trade practices—nothing else is needed to restore America. It was a speech that would have read admirably in the days of the Northern Securities case. As a keynote to stir enthusiasm, to launch a Presidential campaign with high hopes and fervent loyalty, it had about as much effect upon the delegates and the spectators as has a pebble on Lake Michigan.

Nowhere in this much-acclaimed document is there a single realization of the vital part that Europe has played and is playing in our economic life and in producing our economic distress. Incredibly enough, in view of the conference at Lausanne, the platform calls for insistence upon payment of the debts owed the United States by foreign nations; it opposes their cancelation. It favors also a monetary conference "to consider the rehabilitation of silver and relative questions." As for the deadly tariff, it apparently denounced this in its preamble while carefully refraining from calling attention to the fact that the Democrats not only voted in large numbers for the Hawley-Smoot tariff but were responsible for the recent tariff increases in connection with the measures meant to produce additional revenue by other means. Then the platform went on to call for "a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding tariff commission free from executive interference," and another international economic conference "designed to restore international trade and facilitate exchange," with no explanation as to what constitutes a "competitive" tariff. Nothing here to bring hope to Europe; not a word about that sacred obligation of ours to enter the League of Nations, the child of that immortal Democratic President, the last Democratic President, Woodrow Wilson. Nothing whatever here to aid Lausanne or Geneva; nothing to give genuine hope to Europe of immediate, vital, and enlightened cooperation.

Yet I do not deny that the platform is an effective one from the purely political point of view. It is short enough to be read, it shines by contrast with the Republican, and its wet plank alone, in my judgment, will carry the party to success next fall, unless its candidates blunder incredibly in the months to come. There will, of course, be some Wall Street men to declare that it is dangerous. It is really nothing of the kind even from their point of view, and the candidates, heaven knows, should not keep a single banker awake o' nights from New York to San Francisco; they are as safe for capital and big business as Reed or Smoot.

Never have I seen a Presidential ticket named at a national convention with so little enthusiasm. Franklin Roosevelt won in spite of the incessant blunders and unlimited stupidity of his managers out here—managers you would not employ to run a $10,000-a-year corporation—because, as at Kansas City in 1928, you cannot beat a candidate with a commanding lead if you cannot agree in advance upon one man to fight against him. The demonstration when Roosevelt was first named would not have lasted twelve minutes but for the horrible organ and the band. When he was nominated, the galleries were silent and only the delegates whooped it up for a few minutes, with the States that had voted for Smith sitting grimly in their seats. I know that the galleries were packed by the local politicians—many of them Catholics; that accounts in part for the enthusiasm for Al Smith, but by no means for all of it; there certainly was no enthusiasm whatever for Franklin Roosevelt, much less for the man picked by Hearst, McAdoo, and Roosevelt for Vice-President. I talked with many delegates and I know they accepted Roosevelt only as the least of the evils presented to them. There was a time in the third balloting when it looked as if one or two delegations might break from him, and the Roosevelt high command was badly frightened. But there was no fight, no coherence, and no leadership in the opposition. Garner fell easily for the bait of the Vice-Presidency. The galleries, by the way, yelled derisively when William G. McAdoo announced that California would go for Roosevelt, one section asking him in unison: "What price California?" The rumor is that McAdoo's reward is to be the Secretaryship of State. For unblushing effrontery and hypocrisy that statement of McAdoo's that he felt the candidate who had such a comfortable majority should be nominated goes beyond anything I have ever heard in thirty-five years of dealing with politicians. For this is the same William G. McAdoo who boasts that he got the nomination away from Champ Clark in Baltimore in 1912 under precisely the same circumstances, Champ Clark having a clear majority in the convention.

Thus Franklin Roosevelt's pursuit of the Democratic nomination has been successful and he has the right to take seriously the references to him as our next President. So has triumphed his campaign of evading all the pending issues, of refusing to answer questions as to how he stands on the problems of the day. As a matter of fact, if he is wise he will continue his policy of silence; it will be safer and he will probably be elected anyway. Roosevelt's success is also the triumph of cowardice and muddle-headedness—of the inability to think any real problems through. His choice is proof positive that the convention was not thinking about our economic chaos and distress, that it was not bent on finding the best possible man to carry on the country in this hour of unparalleled economic difficulties. Two delegates got up and protested that their delegation had been committed to Roosevelt before any other candidates were in the field. Only two speakers from the platform had the courage to say that it was scandalous to be discussing booze when millions of Americans, utterly destitute, were begging for bread. The delegates may have heard this but it affected them no more than if somebody had said that the first trip to the moon would probably start in 1952. Of course if the nomination had been awarded on the grounds of great intellectual capacity, of proved boldness in grasping issues and problems, of courage and originality in finding solutions, the honor would never, never have gone to Franklin Roosevelt. I admit that it would have been hard to find anyone in the Democratic Party to measure up to the needs. On the other hand, I doubt if any other candidate ever carried off this prize in the face of such indifference and after such a blistering and brutally severe attack upon him as that by Heywood Brown on Roosevelt in the Scripps-Howard papers of June 29.

The newspaper observers of this spectacle, at least the thoughtful ones, were profoundly saddened by what they saw, despite all their cynicism. More than one came to me to say that this was beyond endurance. They agree with me that the Democrats could hardly have done much worse for the country unless they had put Garner up for first place. For myself I found myself more and more wondering what the next convention would be like, and whether there would be any convention at all. I am willing to bet that unless there is a marvelous improvement in our situation, the next quadrennial conventions, wherever they meet, will be neither so remote nor so detached from what is going on; that they will be facing the issues of the day because those issues will not let them do anything else—provided, of course, that by that time we have not a fascist dictator in the White House. A coalition Cabinet is on the boards now. Would these delegates care very much if the heart were cut out of our democratic institutions? I doubt it, provided that the act was carefully draped with the American flag, and it was explained to them that George Washington was a good deal of a dictator in his time—like Lincoln and Wilson in war time—and that, after all, this is a war to save the Union in which we are now engaged. Now engaged? For all that a foreign observer might really have learned of our estate from this convention, we are sailing upon the most peaceful, the quietest, and the least rippled of seas.

The Milwaukee Miracle

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Milwaukee, June 29

SOcialists should learn not to exaggerate. They ought to take care not to lay themselves open unnecessarily to attacks from the conservative parties and press. Especially ought they to be on their guard here in Milwaukee, for here, with the help of a coalition of Republicans and Democrats, they are really showing that they can turn out a workman-like job in giving a large American city a decent and efficient government. Of course, there is no socialism in the Milwaukee government, nor even a trace of that hybrid political form known as municipal socialism. What the Socialists and Non-Partisans have established here is a reform government on bourgeois lines. The municipal corporate structure is essentially like that of Chicago or New York. Indeed, Deputy Controller Wendt declared to me that his office had learned a great deal by studying the New York City government and had introduced into the administration of Milwaukee finances many of the methods used in New York. But there is a vast difference between the two cities. For one thing, Milwaukee has a minimum of graft and corruption; its police are honest; its courts function swiftly and effectively; the municipal corporation itself is in as strong a financial position as any city can be in this day of toppling banks and drastically reduced incomes.

It may be well to note that although the residents of Milwaukee have expressed their satisfaction with Socialist office-holders as municipal reformers by repeatedly reelecting them, they have at the same time voted to keep administration of the city's finances in the hands of a non-Socialist, Louis M. Kotecki. This man, who has just been elected to his fifth four-year term as city controller, is the leader of the Non-Partisans, the principal and indeed the only political opponents the Socialists have in Milwaukee. While Mayor Hoan, through his appointive power, keeps a finger on virtually every department in the government, Kotecki as controller supervises all city expenditures. He has the authority, which he does not hesitate to exercise, to call department heads, even Socialist appointees, to account for what he considers uneconomic practices. Moreover, Kotecki and his assistant, William F. Wendt, prepare the annual budget, which, of course, is subject to approval by the Common Council, at present dominated by a Non-Partisan majority.

Most of the free and unexpected publicity that came to Milwaukee last winter was based on the supposed existence of a "cash surplus" at the end of the last fiscal year. From this the inference was drawn that unlike Chicago, Detroit, and numerous other cities Milwaukee was miraculously paying its own way despite the economic crisis. The amount of this cash balance has been variously reported. Mayor Hoan has written of "a cash daily balance in the city treasury of $3,000,000." The enterprising reporter who started the publicity boom found a cash reserve of $4,000,000. The Citizens' Bureau of Milwaukee, an organization financed by business men who are primarily interested in combating the Socialists, said the balance amounted to $3,400,000 on December 31. Other Socialist writers put the figure at $2,324,778.81, basing this figure on an unexplained item labeled "surplus" which appears in the consolidated balance sheet dated December 31. The consolidated balance sheet for 1931 is as confusing as are most corporation reports. Under "assets, cash" a total of $3,974,469.95 is given, but it is not clear whether this represents the true cash balance. In any case the balance was probably somewhere in the neighborhood of this figure. Since December 31 the balance has been greatly reduced.

On the strength of these various figures the suggestion has been made that Milwaukee has been paying all its bills out of current revenues and has even had something left over. Before the economic crisis reached its peak Milwaukee no doubt was doing this, as its earlier financial statements readily show. But, then, so were many other American cities. The Milwaukee myth has been based on the supposition that this city has continued to do so notwithstanding the general economic situation. Under the economic program adopted some years ago by the Socialist-Non-Partisan regime, all the income of the municipality, from whatever source it may come, is dumped into a single pot. Besides tax money and other revenue, the proceeds from the sale of bond issues go into this general account. The municipality draws upon this pot for all its expenses. But buried somewhere in the general account is a fund which once totaled $4,925,000, the proceeds of two bond issues sold long ago. One issue was intended to finance a street-widening project, and the other to pay for the construction of a viaduct. Work on both projects has been held up by legal and political controversies. Obviously the bond proceeds are carefully earmarked on the municipal books for their original purpose. I do not suggest that there has been any illegal diversion of them. But just as obviously this money is being used to meet at least a part of the city's current operating expenses. In other words, Milwaukee not only has no unencumbered cash balance, but if it were not permitted to draw upon the bond funds it would have to borrow at the banks as other municipalities have been compelled to do.

Deputy Controller Wendt admitted this to me after lengthy questioning. He said that there was a bookkeeping balance between accounts receivable and accounts payable, that is, between anticipated revenues and contemplated expenditures, but added that inasmuch as a part of the accounts receivable is in the form of delinquent or deferred taxes, the city has been forced to borrow from its unused bond funds. Certainly no one can quarrel with this procedure. The city is already paying interest on the bond funds. There would be little sense in running to the bankers for new loans upon which further interest would have to be paid so long as the city has any part of this costly bond money lying idle in its treasury. But there is equally as little sense in referring to this idle money as a "cash surplus," or in suggesting, because of the existence of this general account balance, that Milwaukee is still paying its way.

There are other factors in Milwaukee's publicity boom which are not always clearly explained. For example, the city's boosters, while they do not assert that the property tax rate is phenomenally low, declare that despite the municipality's excellent financial record the tax rate is not above the average for cities of its population class. This in a sense is true. Milwaukee property-owners are paying a higher tax rate than are the property-owners of Cleveland, Baltimore, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Rochester, Syracuse, and Toledo, but when the rate is adjusted on a common assessment basis Milwaukee ranks fifth among these cities. One point is generally overlooked. Under the Wisconsin income-tax law, 50 per cent of the income taxes collected in the city of Milwaukee is returned to the municipal corporation for its own use. Of course, this tax does not figure in the property tax rate, but it must be conceded that this money actually comes from residents of Milwaukee, and that if the city did not have this extra income, the residents would have to make up the difference by paying a higher property tax.

The economic depression has not had the severely adverse effect upon municipal finances that it has had, for example, in Toledo, although it has increased tax delinquencies. For one thing, unemployment relief rests upon the county government, not the city. Approximately one-fifth of the families of Milwaukee are being cared for by the county, which so far has run up a deficit of almost $6,000,000 in financing this relief work. The county has already had to borrow $2,500,000 to provide for the jobless, and may soon be in the market for additional loans. The residents of Milwaukee, though they take pride in the economy of their municipal government, must eventually meet the bulk of this increasing obligation the county is carrying, for Milwaukee City comprises more than three-fourths of the area and population of Milwaukee County. The city has been helping the jobless in a small way. Last year it financed a made-work program costing $421,876, and this year it has appropriated $1,200,000 for made work and emergencies. Of the latter sum, $600,000 represents an advance by the State to the city from the 1933 gasoline tax. Thus the drain on the city's financial resources as a result of unemployment has not been particularly heavy.

The "pay-as-you-go" policy of the Hoan administration, which is the basis of much favorable publicity, and which is often pointed to as one of the major factors in keeping Milwaukee solvent, is by no means peculiar to this city. Many other municipalities, including Buffalo, Detroit, the larger cities of Ohio, and even the much-maligned Chicago, have paid a large part of the cost of their permanent improvements out of current revenues. Moreover, Milwaukee itself, though I do not mean to belittle its record, has done no better than to meet half the cost of its permanent improvements out of taxes and special assessments. In the last ten years only 40 per cent of the $17,500,000 spent for school construction and 41 per cent of the $10,000,000 which went into park and playground improvements have come from current revenues. In 1928-29 permanent improvements such as street paving and public building were financed 44.8 per cent from the sale of bonds, 22 per cent from general taxes, 22.3 per cent from special assessments, and 10.9 per cent from water revenues.

It has been asserted by persons not particularly friendly to the Socialists of Milwaukee that the statutory limitation on municipal indebtedness has made it impossible for the city to go on a spending spree, to borrow money for unnecessary purposes as some other cities have done. This may be true, but we must attribute to the Milwaukee officials a sincere desire to keep the city's indebtedness within reasonable limits. Nevertheless, the Socialist reply again leaves the door wide open to unnecessary attacks by the conservatives. Wisconsin municipalities are permitted to carry a bonded indebtedness totaling not more than 5 per cent of the current assessed valuation of taxable property. The Socialists declare that today the city's legal margin of bonded debt is much larger than it has been for several years past. They cite the following figures prepared by Deputy Controller Wendt as of May 31 of this year:

Year	Net Debt	Margin
1932.....	$47,420,000.....	$1,272,697
1931.....	50,338,450.....	473,462
1930.....	48,800,900.....	276,338
1929.....	46,996,050.....	211,832
1928.....	44,955,300.....	7,956
1927.....	43,167,100.....	80,758

These figures, for several reasons, are open to challenge. For example, although Milwaukee has borrowed on the average more than $4,000,000 annually for the last ten years, it has borrowed nothing so far this year, and the year had seven more months to run from May 31. Nevertheless, this record itself seems conclusively to prove the contention of the Citizens' Bureau and others that the city has been borrowing up to the very limit permitted by law. In the period covered by the above figures the net debt runs over 99 per cent of the amount legally allowed. Compare this with the period from 1913 to 1917, when the net indebtedness averaged little more than 50 per cent of the permissible total. Indeed, in 1916 Milwaukee had bond issues outstanding at the end of the year amounting to only $11,921,000, although it could lawfully have floated additional issues totaling $11,998,606.

In only one respect is the administration of Milwaukee's finances unique. About ten years ago an amortization fund was created. This fund is built up on all or part of the interest collected on city bank deposits, deferred tax payments, unpaid special assessments, and by other means. On January 1 the fund totaled $3,600,000 and was growing at a rate faster than had been anticipated. When the fund equals three-fourths of the outstanding debt, "three-fourths of the annual interest on said fund," according to the law, "shall be applied to pay the interest on any outstanding bonds and to assume new bond issues of such city, or as the public-debt commission may from time to time with the approval of the Common Council apply the same for any purpose for which municipal bonds may be legally issued." In brief, the amortization fund will ultimately be used to wipe out the bonded indebtedness of the city. It was hoped that this goal would be reached by 1963, but the municipal debt has been growing so fast that this now cannot be achieved until some time after 1973. Of course, the amortization arrangement has had nothing to do with Milwaukee's current financial problems, and it may very well be that unless other means are found wherewith to keep the fund increasing faster than the bonded debt, the ultimate goal may never be reached. Yet one must credit the authors of this arrangement—both the Non-Partisans and the Socialists claim authorship—for creating a municipal savings account or insurance fund such as no other American city possesses.

Charity and the State

By ROBERT BRIFFAULT

DESTITUTION, hunger, misery, disease—the outcome of the strife for private gain in economic warfare—are tempered by private charity. The distress of the victims is, in the last extremity, alleviated by the twice-blessed mercy of the victors out of the abundance of their spoils, in much the same manner as wounded prisoners of war are nursed and tended by those who have previously mutilated them. In the latter instance the act is one of pure humanity; prisoners of war were in more barbarous ages slaughtered. The relief bestowed by private charity on the sufferers from economic warfare is less unalloyed in its motives. Economic exploitation on the scale rendered possible by the triumphs of modern industry and efficient business methods results, like scientific warfare, in such a holocaust that the multitude of the victims is a grave menace to that smooth operation of the process spoken of as law and order. Charitable relief is, under those conditions, a virtue which not only commends itself as noble and creditable, but also on the score of its imperative necessity. Unless emotions of gratitude and abject humiliation be awakened in those who may have cause to be discontented with the system, these might become obsessed with a morbid desire to hang their would-be benefactors. The milk of human kindness is, hence, usually diluted under those conditions by a judicious admixture of tear gas and lead calculated to soothe the feelings of the sufferers, lest by some misunderstanding on their part good Samaritans should be robbed of the opportunity of practicing the ineffable virtue of Christian charity.

The exercise of that virtue is nevertheless in a large measure its own reward. The spiritual gratification afforded by the disposal of superfluous wealth through the channels of charitable enterprises and institutions has always occupied an important place among the refined forms of delectation which lend added charm to the occupations of privileged classes. In the stately homes of England the "Guide to British Charities" holds a prescriptive place beside the Badminton "Library of Sports and Pastimes" and De Brett's "Peerage." English charities rank with the most exclusive kennels of foxhounds and the most expensive racing studs as institutions specifically in accord with the English way of life. To contribute to charities used to be as much a privilege of the feudal aristocracy as to subscribe to the Ranelagh, the Carlton, or the Pelican. By an amazing provision in the scheme of social organization the whole of the essential services for the care of the sick and infirm is, in England, dependent upon eleemosynary support. Every hospital used to subsist on the bounties of half a dozen dukes. Today those feudal sources of support being, through the decay of feudalism, no longer available, institutions for the care of afflicted British subjects are bankrupt. But the magnificent tradition is kept up. By ceaseless and persistent public begging, flag days, flower days, street collections by medical students with faces blackened with cork and wearing their shirts outside their trousers, frantic appeals are made to the English public to save the magnificent system of social services entirely supported by voluntary subscriptions from falling to the opprobrious level of organized state institutions.

Devout American millionaires with a due concern for the salvation of their souls have continued the tradition on an even more lavish scale. Their generosity is, it is true, at times somewhat irrelevant so far as regards the misery resulting from the abstraction of their colossal fortunes from the public resources. The founding of picture galleries and public libraries affords to those who are deprived of food and shelter the same kind of solace that the presentation of a leather-bound copy of the poems of Longfellow might bring to a widow who had been reduced to destitution by the donor. But the public benefactor's self-approbation and the peace of mind which is the reward of a good deed are much the same even though his generosity be ineffectual and misdirected. To many mature spinsters of both sexes life would be robbed of half its value were they deprived of the delight of bestowing or of promoting charitable aid. The innumerable societies for the relief of decayed gentlewomen, senile clergymen, discharged criminals, distressed bankers, homeless cats, or unmarried mothers exist as much in order that they may afford to persons of means and leisure an opportunity for the practice of charity as for the admirable objects to which a portion of their funds and activities is dedicated. Rightly and wisely do the philanthropic and refined persons of limited intellectual resources who are the backbone of those humanitarian institutions, of the Stock Exchange, and of the nation view any proposal for wasteful state provisions calculated to foster idleness and improvidence with a disapproval as lively as is their unsparing devotion to the cause of social help.

Charity produces general edification. It stimulates agreeably those sentiments of diffuse good-will and that sense of human brotherhood one touch of which makes the whole world kin. The ancient Romans were wont to indulge in those pleasant emotions when, following a still more ancient custom, they set aside all class distinctions during the Saturnalia, and the masters waited upon their slaves. In times of particular stress, such as we are becoming accustomed to regard as normal, indulgence in the Saturnalian orgies of charity drives, street collections, house-to-house appeals, benefit balls, entertainments, social functions devoted to charity, and listening to Mr. Hoover over the radio add, like the spirit of Christmas, the delectable seasoning of good-will and the glow of benevolent emotions to the pleasant excitement of social pleasures and activities. To cultivate sentiments which do so much honor to human nature is in itself so precious a benefit that it, in some measure, offsets the deplorable facts which give occasion to it. As eloquent ministers of religion have pointed out, the holocaust of misery and suffering inflicted upon a stricken world by a profitable social system is in reality, like most evils, a blessing in disguise. It serves the inestimable purpose of supplying an occasion for indulgence in charitable emotions. We should be deprived of the voluptuous feelings produced by a self-approving conscience were not the poor, by a beneficent provision of our social arrangements, always with us.

If there were no poverty, it would be desirable to create it, that Christian charity might be in no danger of wilting within our hearts. The moral purpose is of more importance than the occasion which affords scope for its application. That profound truth is appreciated by those employers who, choosing the better part, lay off half their staffs that they themselves may, without pecuniary loss, contribute to the unemployment fund; or those Park Avenue ladies who close the least convenient of their country estates and discharge their servants so that they may draw a small check for the assistance of the destitute. As Mr. Hoover says, we are our brother's keeper.

While the fostering and inculcation of the most admirable dispositions of the human heart is one of the highest functions of religion, the important part played by charitable activities and institutions in the scheme of civilized society rests primarily upon the conception of the functions of the state. That conception harks back to the most ancient autocratic empires of the past. The state, represented by a divine and absolute ruler, was in that view understood to dispose unconditionally of all its subjects, their property, their labor, and their lives. A subject was supposed to be permitted to exist by a gracious act of magnanimity on the part of the state. His possessions, his wife, his family, his life were understood to be held by him on sufferance through the generosity of the state, which had a perpetual lien on them. The state might, of course, at any time foreclose. The life of the subject belonged to the state. To lay it down whenever he might be required to do so was a sacred duty and obligation of the subject. He was, by that act, merely paying back a debt. Converse duties and obligations on the part of the state did not, of course, enter into the scheme. Such a notion was meaningless. In the great American republic, the model of an enlightened modern democracy, the citizen is, as in the barbaric autocracies of the dim past, held to owe his life to the state. Any person who is admitted to the privilege of that citizenship is, in fact, expected to sign a specific declaration to that effect. But should the citizen die of starvation and exposure in Union Square, the mishap casts no shadow of blame upon the state. Mr. Hoover does not suffer thereby any aspersion. For obligations and responsibilities with regard to life, as between the citizen and the state, are all on the one side.

That is why Christian charity is so inestimably important. The life of the free American citizen who is about to turn up his toes in Union Square is entirely a matter for private sentiment, personal benevolence, eloquent perorations, appeal to high ideals. If the state takes any action in the matter, that is purely a magnanimous gesture arising out of the irrepressible generosity of the sentiments which inspire every thought of the exalted individuals to whom are committed the executive powers of the nation. To restrain those sentiments from overflowing in words of impassioned eloquence when their hearts are wrung with tenderness at the spectacle of suffering would be to expect too much of human nature. But in appealing to all and sundry to do their share in helping bear the cross of suffering and distress in times when the unfortunate miscarriage of speculative transactions and the immoderate ambitions of rugged predatory individualism offer more than ever an opportunity for the exercise of Christian charity, the executives of the state transcend, they are careful to make it clear, the strict limits of their official function and obligations, and speak as mere men to whom the spectacle of widespread suffering is intolerable.

Some misguided and uninformed persons have put forward suggestions to the effect that obligations as between citizens and the state should, as a matter of elementary equity, be reciprocal. The state, which claims a right over the citizen's life, should, they preposterously imply, hold itself responsible for the security of that life. When a citizen perishes from starvation and exposure in the vicinity of the Treasury, the misadventure, they represent, argues a gross dereliction of duty on the part of the state, and constitutes as clearly an act of indictable manslaughter as if it were chargeable to criminal neglect on the part of an individual. If the state does not guarantee the mere existence of its citizens, what, in the name of political philosophy, is its function?

But those are Bolshevik doctrines. The whole of the distinction between the social organization which Bolsheviks advocate and the decent civilized anarchy of respectable predatory individualistic societies lies precisely in the view taken of the moral obligations of the state. Ignorant and unbalanced extremists imagine that the state has duties and obligations toward its citizens. Persons who talk in that manner have no respect for venerable traditions. The state is fulfilling its obligations when it provides adequate protection to the pecuniary interests of the country. Nor does it ever show any remissness in the unflinching fidelity with which it discharges that sacred duty. The inordinate display of armed force which it provides when gentlemen having their offices in Wall Street think they have cause to feel nervous may, indeed, appear at times excessive. The state may be over-punctilious in the discharge of its duties when the vital interests of the country are at stake, but to expect that it shall take upon itself additional responsibilities for human lives which are of no pecuniary value is to misunderstand its character. It represents the august power of a great and potent nation. And that power resides in the great monetary interests of its financial and industrial leaders, not in the empty stomachs of those who are led by them to destitution and starvation. With a wise appreciation of its true function the state, faithful to its trust, places its resources at the disposal of bankers. Starving stomachs appertain to the province of private charity. What would become of the moral inspiration supplied by the exercise of the latter if the state, desecrating all moral ideals, should debase the virtue of Christian charity to the sordid level of an elementary obligation? What, even, would become of the Christian religion should the state blasphemously presume to play, except in regard to the bankers, the part of Providence?

Such an extension of its functions by a more or less Christian state solemnly pledged to uphold the principles of religion and of rugged individualism would be tantamount to a subversion of those principles. It would, we are told, be opposed to the whole spirit of the American people—whatever that may mean. Granted that the "problem of unemployment" constitutes a danger and a source of anxiety to those whose enthusiasm for those principles has created it, to meet that danger by a breach of those very principles would be no remedy. It would be a step toward social organization, that is, toward bolshevism. The cure would be worse than the disease. Placed as it is at the present juncture between the devil of social reform and the deep blue sea of dissolution, predatory individualism sees little hope of escape from the dilemma except in an appeal to the finer qualities and nobler impulses of human nature. In the generous self-sacrifice of private charity, in the spirit of good-will and human brotherhood, in the eternal principles of the Sermon on the Mount lie the hopes of Wall Street. To those immutable principles, accordingly, the President, whose piety is well known, appeals with husky eloquence. Let everyone, without distinction of class, practice charity. By that sign shall rugged predatory individualism win through to the prosperity which will bring back bigger and better depredation.

The solid interests which the government of the United States represents can no more accept a quixotic responsibility for the lives of workers which those interests no longer require than they could have been held responsible to the governments of the European countries whence they formerly inveigled cheap labor when they required it. And that the wretches once provided the means of building up an unexampled prosperity and of getting rich quickly is no reason why their lives should be safeguarded after they have outlasted their usefulness, and from being a source of profit have become a menace to those profits.

Private charity has the advantage of being ineffective. The security arising from regular state insurance does actually guarantee to the citizen the minimum of subsistence. The uncertain and insubstantial futility of the relief which charity ostentatiously offers is sufficiently unreal not to interfere unduly with the natural process of decimation by misery, which it serves to veil rather than to arrest. The nuisance and the perils arising from an unwanted excess of population that no longer serves a useful purpose in the scheme of profitable civilization are mitigated by the exercise of private charity, which is thus more than twice blessed, and compasses less noisily, if more gradually, the same desirable results as the use of automatic pistols and machine-guns. The abject humiliation and degradation inflicted by private charity help, moreover, by sapping the last remnants of self-respect, to break the spirit of the idle and destitute and thus to avert the dangers which might else arise from their despair.

Americans are an emotional and sentimental people. The appeal of generous sentiments is never lost upon them even though they may be slow to respond to the unbalanced emotions of moral indignation. Fortified by principles of wisdom, the government of the United States will preserve the trust placed in it by the solid interests of rugged predatory individualism. By their indomitable resolution to sacrifice everything to personal gain, those interests have raised this country to the exalted position which it now occupies among the nations that look up to it with mixed feelings. From the giddy height it may plumb the depth of the abyss on the brink of which it stands. The leaders of this great nation, who have placed it upon that pinnacle of perilous glory, shall ever lead it onward. Let the precious milk of human kindness be poured upon the troubled chaos which rugged predatory individualism has brought about. Let every man, except the representatives of the nation, be his brother's keeper. Let destitution, hunger, misery, and despair look for relief to charity. Let them not ask for justice.

Getting Out of Central America

By RAYMOND LESLIE BUELL

APOLOGISTS have recently declared that what Japan is doing in Manchuria is no different from what the United States has done in Central America. To a certain extent the statement is true. The Kellogg-Stimson intervention in Nicaragua in 1927, resulting in a futile campaign against Sandino which is still being doggedly carried on, in many respects resembles the Japanese campaign against the Chinese. The United States calls Sandino and his followers "bandits" just as the Japanese call their Chinese opponents in Manchuria "bandits." But there is this important difference between Japanese and American policy. Although Japan is becoming more and more aggressive toward China, the United States is attempting to withdraw from Central America, and is resisting new opportunities for intervention. However timidly, it is moving toward a policy of non-intervention which will accord with its frequent professions of pan-Americanism and with its obligations under the anti-war pact.

Whether this new policy will be fully carried out depends upon forthcoming events in Nicaragua and Salvador. Secretary Stimson has announced that the marines will leave Nicaragua in January, 1933, after the presidential elections of November, 1932. As in the case of the 1928 and 1930 elections, the United States will supervise the November balloting in the hope of leaving Nicaragua in the hands of a government which will command the respect of the people. Nevertheless, the difficulties which will confront the United States in the November elections are greater than those of preceding years. Owing to discrimination against third parties, the issue has hitherto been drawn clearly between the Liberals and the Conservatives. In each election the Liberals have won a decisive victory, thus confirming the impression that they constitute a definite majority throughout the country. But during the past few months the Liberal Party has experienced a split which, if it is not healed, may lead to a Conservative victory in November. The titular head of the Liberal Party, President Moncada, has never been popular with many members of the party. He was nominated in 1928 largely because of the impression that Mr. Stimson would like to see him President. He has probably made as good a President as any other Nicaraguan would have during the intervention period, though he has ruled with an iron hand. Supported by an American-officered Guardia, he has often imprisoned opponents without trial on the ground that they were Communists and Sandinistas.

According to the Nicaragua constitution, the President is ineligible immediately for a second term. To succeed Moncada at least four Liberal candidates have appeared: ex-Minister Juan B. Sacasa; Vice-President Aguado; Leonardo Arguello, former Minister of Foreign Affairs; and

Dr. Rudolfo Espinosa, former minister in Washington and a member of the unrecognized Sacasa government in 1927. Although for a time Moncada was supposed to be supporting Minister of Finance Barberena, today he apparently has no candidate and is accused of wishing to prolong his own term. So bitter has feeling become that the four candidates have formed an anti-Moncada branch of the Liberal Party. In March two separate conventions were held, each representing itself to be the true Liberal Party. It is this division which gives the Conservatives an unexpected opportunity.

Recognizing that the past disorder in Nicaragua has been due largely to the intense bitterness between Conservatives and Liberals, President Moncada, in February, 1932, published a brief monograph reviewing the history of the country and expressing the belief that national unity and stability could be secured after the withdrawal of the American intervention only by the representation of minorities. In the following month he published another pamphlet elaborating this suggestion. Thus, instead of being entirely excluded from participation in the government, the party which loses the presidential election would be given, say, one-third of the places in the Cabinet, courts, and general administrative departments. Although this reform could be adopted by an ordinary amendment to the present constitution, Moncada proposed that a convention be called to frame an entirely new constitution. This constitution, according to Moncada, should also legalize the existence of the Guardia Nacional, the military force now directed by Americans, and the Bryan-Chamorro treaty giving the United States the right to build the Nicaragua Canal. Moncada declared that this treaty violated the constitution forbidding the conclusion of any agreement affecting Nicaragua's "sovereignty." He did not wish to set aside this treaty, however, because the "rights of humanity" dictated that the Nicaragua Canal should be built. The treaty "cannot be submitted to new discussions of conventions, to national congresses, courts of arbitration, or the League of Nations." (In 1916 the Central American Court had ruled that the treaty violated the rights of Salvador and Costa Rica.) But Moncada asserted that the constitution should be amended so as to give the treaty validity. Apparently his proposal to constitutionalize the National Guard and the Bryan-Chamorro treaty was bait tempting Mr. Stimson to accept the rest of his plan.

Moncada's next step was to send a mission to Washington, composed of one Liberal and one Conservative, in an attempt to induce the State Department to postpone the 1932 presidential elections and supervise in their stead elections for a constitutional convention. Although Moncada has repeatedly denied any ambition to stay in power, this demand for a new constitution led to the accusation that he really wished to extend his office for two more years. It was pointed out that in case a convention to frame a new constitution were held, it would be impossible to elect a new President to take office in January, and that the alternative would be extension of Moncada's term as a de facto government. Moncada's references to the adoption in the past of new constitutions by de facto governments increased the suspicion that he really harbored a desire to prolong his term and that his proposal for a constitutional convention, elected under American supervision, was a means of securing State Department support for his ambition.

In a note of April 5, 1932, Secretary Stimson refused to be a party to any such transaction. He declared that the question whether Nicaragua should have a new constitution was one for Nicaragua alone to decide. Inasmuch as the Bryan-Chamorro treaty had received more than two-thirds of the votes of the Nicaragua legislature, it was valid according to Article 162 of the constitution. Finally, he warned that if Nicaragua should proceed to elect a constitutional convention this year, the United States would not supervise the November presidential elections. As a result of this note, Moncada has taken no further action in regard to a new constitution.

Because of the continuing split in the Liberal Party, there is danger that a minority candidate will win the November elections—an outcome which would create an unstable situation after American withdrawal. The Conservatives are nominating as their candidate Don Adolfo Díaz, whom the United States virtually made President in 1926. The one reason why the Conservatives are backing Don Adolfo is because they believe that Washington would look with favor upon his election. The State Department has declared repeatedly that it will be absolutely neutral during the coming elections, but the Conservative leaders apparently believe that the State Department wishes to have in Nicaragua a puppet government, and they are prepared to advance the most Americanista candidate in the country in the hope thereby of returning to power. If Díaz should be elected President in November, no one in Latin America would believe that his election was not dictated by the United States, and many of the gains of our new Latin American policy would thereby be lost. Moreover, if Díaz should come into power as a result of a split in the Liberal Party, it is probable that Sandino would march an army into Managua following the withdrawal of the American marines and plunge Nicaragua into another civil war.

While the State Department should not interfere in the selection of presidential candidates, it should make it perfectly clear that it is not supporting, even with its sympathy, the candidacy of Díaz. Justified as the State Department was in rejecting Moncada's plan for a new constitution, which would have inevitably prolonged the American intervention, the United States should nevertheless do what is proper to bring about an agreement between the Conservative and Liberal parties embodying Moncada's idea of representation of minorities. If both parties are given a share in the spoils, both may be reasonably content and the incentive to revolution thereby removed. The State Department should not repeat the error made in 1924 of leaving upon its withdrawal a political situation in Nicaragua which will make future revolution inevitable.

While planning to evacuate Nicaragua, the United States has also been trying to avoid intervention in Salvador. In December, 1931, a coup d'état led by the younger military officers forced President Araujo to flee the country. Despite his likable personality and liberal tendencies Araujo had proved a weak President. His entourage fattened off the treasury while the army remained unpaid. After the revolt against him the Salvador Congress quickly authorized Vice-President Martínez to take office in accordance with the constitution. There is no doubt that the revolt against Araujo was popular and that Martínez commanded respect.

On January 22 the government was rudely challenged by a Communist uprising. Although agitators had been at work for many years, no one even faintly believed that Salvador, a tropical, agricultural country, could be the home of one of the strongest Communist movements in the Western Hemisphere. The Third International, however, has found a fertile field in parts of this little country, where there exists a land shortage caused by overpopulation and desperate conditions upon the coffee estates. The government had decided to allow the Communist Party to participate in the municipal elections on January 3 and in the congressional elections of the following Sunday. But when it became evident that the Communists would carry several cities, the government excluded them from the polls. This arbitrary action—which is customary throughout Latin America—was a sign for an uprising in which the Communists made attacks in the Sonsonate and Ahuachapan districts. Although the attacks on the larger towns were repulsed, the Communists succeeded in taking Juayua, an important coffee center, and the Indian town of Izalco. Laborers and overseers who had been implicitly trusted for years rose up and killed estate owners and created a reign of terror on the coffee plantations. The Salvador army, remaining loyal to Martínez, with the assistance of 2,000 volunteers soon expelled the Communists from the cities. The Salvador property-owners, together with the army, throwing restraint to the winds, now engaged in a war of extermination, as a result of which between 3,000 and 7,000 Salvador mozos were slaughtered. There is no doubt that many innocent laborers were killed in this general holocaust and that many seeds of future bitterness were sown. The last cry of Augustín Martí, Communist leader and graduate of the Salvador law school, upon being executed February 1, was "Viva el Partido Comunista!"

A third factor in a delicate situation was the default of the Salvador government on its foreign loans on February 27. This default took on political importance because of the provisions of a loan contract drawn up in 1922 between the Salvador government and American bankers, the terms of which were severely criticized at the time by The Nation. According to this contract the American bankers could maintain a fiscal representative in Salvador to receive the customs pledged to the loan; but should the government go into default the bankers in cooperation with the State Department could establish a customs receivership. Thus the default of February 27 placed before the United States the question of establishing customs control over Salvador similar to that which existed in Nicaragua.

Now Salvador is one of the proudest countries in Central America; from the beginning it protested against the interventions of the United States in Nicaragua. Moreover, although the fiscal representative in Salvador, Mr. W. W. Renwick, has been popular because of his diplomatic efforts to assist the government in carrying out reforms, the 1922 loan contract from the first encountered severe criticism, which has increased during the last year. Under these circumstances the establishment of an American receivership in Salvador would have created intense indignation and overturned many of the gains achieved by the new Hoover Latin American policy. Consequently, the State Department has declined to assist in the establishment of this receivership—one reason being that it has not "recognized" the Martínez regime. Apparently this is the only instance in history where our recognition policy has worked to the advantage of a non-recognized government! For that matter, the bankers realize that the establishment of a receivership would give little additional security.

Although the United States has recognized revolutionary governments in South America during the past eighteen months, it declines to recognize Martínez because of the Central American treaty of 1923, which prevents the recognition of any government headed by a leader of the successful revolution or by a Cabinet officer in the overthrown regime. According to a number of foreign diplomatic representatives, Martínez had not been a leader in the revolt against Araujo. However, he had been elected Vice-President and had been appointed Minister of War. It would have been possible for the State Department to rule that since Martínez had been elected Vice-President, he was merely performing the duties of the Minister of War without holding that office—and consequently was eligible to recognition. But the State Department adopted the more obvious interpretation that Martínez as former Minister of War was ineligible to recognition under the 1923 treaty. It was believed that this ruling would force Martínez to resign, as did General Orellana under similar circumstances in Guatemala in 1930. Martínez, however, continues in office.

In applying the 1923 recognition treaty to Salvador the State Department has acted much more circumspectly than it did in Nicaragua in 1926. Instead of following an aggressive, literal interpretation of that treaty, it has acted in cooperation with the Guatemala and Honduras governments, both of which fear that revolutions would be encouraged if Martínez were recognized. The Department is not attempting to oust Martínez from office as it did Chamorro, and it showed restraint in not landing marines at the time of the Communist outbreak. Nevertheless, the application of the 1923 treaty to Martínez has stirred up indignation against the United States in Salvador and elsewhere in Central America. This indignation is particularly acute because the Salvador Congress approved the recognition treaty, on May 26, 1925, subject to a reservation that Salvador could not accept the clause preventing the recognition of revolutionary governments because the right of revolution is guaranteed in the Salvador constitution. Because of this reservation the Martínez government contends that this treaty clause cannot now be applied against it. The State Department declares, however, that this reservation merely controls the recognition policy of Salvador toward the other Central American countries; that it does not prevent the other countries and the United States from applying the 1923 treaty as a whole against Salvador. Technically this answer may be correct, but it ignores the equities of the situation. Had Salvador believed that any such legalistic interpretation was going to be applied to its reservation, it undoubtedly would have rejected the 1923 treaty as a whole. Because of this reservation and of the fact that the Salvador Congress has ruled that Martínez is eligible as President under the treaty, Salvador regards the non-recognition policy of the United States as an intervention in its affairs. The only means by which the United States can prevent the recurrence of such situations in Salvador and elsewhere in Central America is by bringing about the revision of the 1923 treaty, so as to make it possible to apply the same recognition policy to Central America that we apply in South America. Until the 1923 treaty is revised, the Hoover Latin American policy will not be able fully to achieve its ends.

The Artist in Soviet Russia

By LOUIS LOZOWICK

HISTORY does not record whether the Flemish master of Early Renaissance, Jan van Eyck, resented the title valet de chambre given to him at the court of Burgundy where he was employed. We know he earned his keep conscientiously, like so many artists of his time, by turning out masterpieces to the honor of his patron and the glory of the church (propaganda!). In accordance with the ideas of our own more enlightened age, the modern master Amadeo Modigliani was free from entangling ideological alliances and enjoyed, therefore, deservedly the title of "intellectual aristocrat"—compensation, perhaps, for his death from starvation and the suicide of his wife with an unborn child. Disinterested friends of art made a neat fortune on the sale of his works.

The fate of Modigliani is not an accident. It is as typical of our period as that of Van Eyck was of his. In our time, when a surplus of art works is ground out for the competitive market amid the din of newspaper ballyhoo, the starving artist is inevitably present wherever artists congregate—Paris, London, New York, Detroit. He is, indeed, so common as to be taken for granted, even romanticized. The Bolshevik Revolution, irreverent of so many capitalist institutions, abolished the romantic notion of the perennial bohemian. In Soviet Russia the starving artist has gone out of fashion and out of existence as well, and his place has been taken by the type of artist not uncommon in art history—the public agent actively participating in the social life of which he forms an integral part.

During the last fifteen years schools and tendencies have changed and shifted, but whether the Russian artists have constructed abstract "polygraphic objects," or painted in the reporter's manner of "heroic realism," or sought to combine the revolutionary theme with plastic qualities, they have all proclaimed unequivocally their complete adherence to the revolution, their identity with its vast program of creating a new Socialist society. Artists are members of a trade union together with printers, textile designers, and workers in other allied trades; they carry unemployment, sickness, accident insurance—paid by the institution employing them—and receive two weeks' or a month's vacation with pay. Though the artists paint more than ever before, they also find time for applied work—to introduce a distinction not always valid—of which there is an unlimited need.

To take a few specific instances: There is a campaign for the collectivization of agriculture. The peasants must be shown by means of posters the advantages of collective over individual farming; they must have a graphic picture of how collectivization leads to better homes, greater leisure, higher culture, more bread. On still another plane—it has been the custom in Central Asia to strap every child to its cradle for a full year after its birth. Posters are made to show the harmful consequences of such a practice and the superiority of a more sanitary method. Then, of course, there are numberless campaigns for the Five-Year Plan in Four, for Soviet aviation, for sports, hygiene, literacy. No phase of life is left untouched. These posters alone are enough to keep the artists of the nation busy. But they are only a beginning. There are newspapers to illustrate, book jackets, magazines by the ten thousand. Artists are attached to theaters, to city-planning commissions, to parks of culture and rest, to workers' clubs.

All of the work described is executed on the basis of contractatzia, that is, a contract or collective agreement for a stated period and compensation. Depending on qualifications, the compensation ranges between 200 and 360 rubles a month. In piece work more can easily be earned. Artists may hold more than one job. Several hundred rubles a month are quite common; even incomes of over a thousand rubles are not unknown. Many artists are under a year's contract with Izogis (Art Section of State Publishing House) to complete four easel paintings and ten sketches, on a given theme, to be reproduced in color and sold throughout the Soviet Union. The original painting is the artist's property, to dispose of at his discretion. After four years, if the reproductions prove to be popular, the artist gets a royalty on all new printings. Frequently an artist receives a com-mandirovka, a commission to visit various parts of the Soviet Union to paint pictures on some definite theme. Thus last year, on the themes of the Five-Year Plan and Fifteen Years of the Red Army, Izogis sent out a hundred artists, the cooperative "Artist" fifty, and the Commissariat of Education fifty. The artists' expenses are paid and the pictures painted are their own.

There are many painters still working in the privacy of their studios without definite contracts or commissions. How do they dispose of their work? Individual buyers, though theoretically still possible, have disappeared. Paintings are acquired by museums, workers' clubs, trade unions, educational institutions. The provinces are among the best customers. As all important exhibitions travel to all large and small cities of the Soviet Union, sales are made all along the way. In certain instances the Commissariat of Education, to encourage the sales, pays from its own funds part of the price on condition that some public institution pay the rest. There are also "peoples' artists" receiving a monthly pension sufficient to keep them in comfort. What are the subjects painted? In most cases social and cultural subjects—the revolution, industrialization, cultural gains; but there are also still-lives, landscapes, even nudes, even abstractions. There is, of course, no legal restriction as to subject matter, though Soviet critical opinion is overwhelmingly opposed to "neutral" art as a snare and delusion of bourgeois ideology. That such an attitude leads to abuse no one is more aware than the Soviet critics, who lambaste scathingly all shoddy work, repeatedly recalling Lenin's injunction about the working class deserving a great art.

A more intimate glimpse into the Soviet artist's life is afforded by the Artists' House in Moscow, a modern six-story structure equipped with hot and cold water, electricity, telephones, radio, solarium, public restaurant, laundry, nursery, library, exhibition room; in the yard a vegetable garden, fountain, flower bed, rabbit farm, tennis court. The project was initiated by the Association of Revolutionary Artists, designed by the architect Saveliev, and built in 1928-30 at a cost of 800,000 rubles, a tenth of which was furnished by the artists, the rest being a state loan to be paid back in sixty years. The rent for two- and three-room apartments, including heating, lighting, and payment on the loan, is 80 and 120 rubles a month respectively. Preparations are already being made for building a similar house on a lot next door, to include a publishing house, a printing-press, and a factory of applied work. A third lot is being considered, the aim being to establish an artists' quarter. Collective life is in every way encouraged. Thus, though there are facilities for washing and cooking in the privacy of the apartment, most members prefer to use the house laundry, restaurant, and nursery. There is an endless stream of social activities in the building—meetings, political and artistic discussions, participation in public campaigns, organization of artists' brigades to visit villages, factories, and Red Army units, or to help in the editing of "wall newspapers" and in the formation of amateur art groups.

"We regard ourselves," said one of the responsible officials of the house, "as part of the entire working-class army engaged in the building of socialism. The obstacles still in the way inspire us with greater efforts to overcome them. Beyond the immediate gains we look toward the ultimate ideal: 'From each according to his ability; to each according to his need.'"

In the Driftway

"BEWARE OF IMITATIONS" is the title of a little book unkindly published by the Viking Press. The Drifter says "unkindly" because the book shows the human race, genus Americanus, in the act of furious ratiocination, and the results are just a mite discouraging, considering the effort involved. "Beware of Imitations" is a simple compilation of some fifty patents duly issued by the United States Patent Office, with a diagram of each device and a description of it by its inventor. The compilers, A. E. Brown and H. A. Jeffcott, Jr., have added no comment. Comment, indeed, would be superfluous.

THERE is a design for a balloon propelled by eagles or vultures, in which birds are bound to the balloon and the contraption moves because of their flight. "It may be observed," says the inventor, "that the birds have only to fly, the direction of their flight being changed by the conductor quite independently of their own will." There is a combined plow and gun whose "utility as an implement of the twofold capacity described is unquestionable, especially when used in border localities." (Patent issued June 17, 1862.) There is a combined grocer's package, grater, slicer, and mouse and fly trap, which is described as being useful in all of these diverse directions. There is an "improved necktie and watch-guard combined"; a "combined matchsafe, pincushion, and trap"; and a "combined clothes-brush, flask, and drinking-cup." These combinations, however, which add ingenuity to difficulty in the making of a tool, are less striking than some of the simpler devices: for instance, a simple little tool for "shaping the upper lip," which when worn long enough causes "a depression to be formed in the upper surface and centrally of the upper lip . . . whereby the upper lip will eventually be changed to the form of the well-known Cupid's bow." The chewing-gum locket is another handy little trick; when worn by a ribbon around the neck it provides that chewing gum may "thus be carried conveniently upon the person, and is not left around carelessly to become dirty or to fall in the hands of persons to whom it does not belong and be used by ulcerous and diseased mouths, by which infection would be communicated by subsequent use to the owner."

* * * * *

THE Drifter has looked over the list carefully and he has a number of favorites. But probably none is more neat, compact, and ingenious than the artificial fish bait. This tool is constructed in the form of a small submarine with a hook at one end and at the bottom, and a catch for a line at the other end. The trick, however, is the insertion of a small mirror in the side. This, according to the inventor, insures the effectiveness of the bait in the following manner:

A male fish, seeing his image looking therein, will appear to see another fish approach it from the opposite side with the intent to seize the bait, and this will not only arouse his warlike spirit, but also appeal to his greed, and he will seize the bait quickly in order to defeat the approaching rival. In case the fish is suspected of cowardice, I may make the mirror of convex form . . . in order that the rival or antagonist may appear to be smaller. In the case of a female fish, the attractiveness of a mirror is too well known to need discussion.

Patent for this invention was issued April 25, 1916!

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

"Half-baked Communism"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Sidney Hook, in the opening words of his review of Robert Briffault's book "Breakdown" in The Nation of June 8, states that "the only intelligible thing about Mr. Briffault's book is its enthusiasms." Since "enthusiasms" were apparently the only things intelligible to Mr. Hook, it is not surprising that in the thousand or more words that follow this declaration, which remind one of a Hegelian fog more than of anything else, he exhibited not the remotest symptom of comprehension of what the book is all about.

Mr. Hook objects to what he disingenuously calls Dr. Briffault's "ferocity." It is permissible to remark that it is just such lamblike desk-philosophers as Mr. Hook who, while paying lip service to doctrines conventionally esteemed "advanced," shudder in their lily-white skins at the thought of "violence." I do not know whether Mr. Hook approves of modern Russia and its ideals, and frankly I do not care, but Mr. Hook will reflect that it was violence that made modern Russia and its ideals possible. It is through violence that capitalism holds its sway, and it is only through violence that that sway will be broken.

Mr. Hook objects to Dr. Briffault's discussion of the relation between politics and culture, and in order to show how foolish Dr. Briffault is in demanding that the scientists and others take sides, he says, among other things, that "the meaning and validity of a scientific proposition are completely independent of whether science functions in a capitalist or Communist order." This statement is typical of many made by Mr. Hook in his review, and like them it is entirely untrue. If Mr. Hook is not philosopher enough to be aware of this, then he is not worth arguing with. What really matters, it seems to me, about the validity of a scientific proposition is not so much the name of the state in which it has been determined as that it shall gain acceptance. Does Mr. Hook really believe that the willingness with which scientific propositions are accepted is independent of the form of the society in which they are proposed?

New York, June 10

M. F. ASHLEY-MONTAGU

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wonder if you were aware of your fine art in publishing Sidney Hook's review of Robert Briffault's "Break-down." Mr. Hook begins thus: "The only thing intelligible about Mr. Briffault's book is its enthusiasms." Enthusiasms about what? Evidently about unintelligible things! Anyone even slightly acquainted with the author knows him to be conspicuously intelligent in his enthusiasms. The reviewer not only does not know Mr. Briffault; he is evidently incapable of knowing him. Immediately one wonders why you published a review by one admitting that the book was beyond him.

But perhaps you have done exceptionally well. Since Mr. Briffault is convinced that traditional civilization cannot adapt itself to a changing world and must therefore collapse, what review could be better than one illustrating the reason for entertaining this thesis?

You selected a reviewer of known intellectual ability, who is at the same time a victim of traditional philosophy. His insistent refusal to admit the validity of the author's reasoning, his evasion of the true issues, his whole uncomprehending attitude are lovely illustrations of the non-adaptability of tradition-bound minds, the reason of the failure of a traditional civilization to be adjusted to a world of life and evolution.

Toledo, Ohio, June 8

NELSON MORRIS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I claim a few lines of your space to comment, not on Sidney Hook's pathetic attack upon me in your issue of June 8, which has not the slightest importance to anyone, but on certain dangers of which it is an illustration and which are of real importance to advanced thinkers. Mr. Hook is evidently in sympathy with the Communist Party. It has been that party's policy to attack those radical thinkers who are most in accord with its aims but who are not members of the party. There is considerable historical and tactical justification for the policy, for communism has suffered enormously from "half-baked" supporters and renegades, and I do not criticize or blame the policy. What is regrettable is its effect upon many honest thinkers. I should like to remind these that neither incidental tactics nor unamiable and illiterate personalities should weigh in the balance of principles. These stand above such considerations. Nothing, therefore, should incline intellectuals to retaliate in act, word, or feeling against those who, to the best of their lights, sacrifice more to the cause of social justice than do many intellectuals. That cause will certainly not be served by permitting views or words to be deflected by personal irritations. I hope and trust that in the test of need the place of all honest and competent thinkers will be by the side of those who may have ignorantly attacked them.

New York, June 8

ROBERT BRIFFAULT

Harlan Miners

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article Harlan County: Act of God? by J. C. Byars, Jr., in the June 15 issue of your publication contains a statement which is untrue and misleading in the extreme. I quote Mr. Byars as follows:

One does not have to explore far into mountain lore to learn how quickly the mountaineer falls back on his rifle or his knife when in trouble. The I. W. W. came into the Kentucky field and for a while expanded its organization on this tendency. It was with some surprise that I heard on every hand of the fight waged against the I. W. W. by red [Communist] organizers. So positive has been the stand of the National Miners Union against violence and so vigorously has it combated the I. W. W. that the I. W. W. has been largely ousted from the Kentucky field.

It will be concluded from the above that the "red organizers"—Communists—are advocating non-violent methods in order to curb and counteract the direct-action propaganda of the terrible I. W. W. Practically every statement Mr. Byars makes is incorrect. The I. W. W. advocates a disciplined and well-organized general strike of the workers in all industries. The I. W. W. has always discouraged the use of violence in industrial disputes as the weapon of hopelessness and desperation. Such inaccuracies have been used in courts before now to secure convictions of I. W. W. members. And Mr. Byars's remarks may be used with other similar statements to send forty innocent miners to the electric chair or to prison for life.

The General Defense Committee, 555 West Lake Street, Chicago, entirely without assistance from the Communists, has been sending relief to the imprisoned miners and their families and carrying the heavy burden of legal defense and publicity. In addition to supporting the prisoners and their dependents our committee has sent to Harlan County case relief amounting to more than $2,500 and much clothing and food.

Speaking not only as secretary of the General Defense Committee but as one who has on various occasions been in Harlan and who knows the facts thoroughly, I ask you to rectify Mr. Byars's blunder before the results are irremediable.

Chicago, June 15

HERBERT MAHLER

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation for June 15 there is a story about Harlan, Kentucky. I am from Harlan. The story is a bit misleading, because written in the present tense; you'd think the National Miners Union had a soup kitchen in Harlan now, and that the miners in thousands were flocking into the union. Sadly enough, this is untrue. Several months ago it was true, but not now. Today nothing is left of the union.

I've lived among the miners all my life, and I know they want a union. In the beginning I was heart and soul with the National Miners Union; it went about the job with daring, and I had hopes. Even now I may be wrong; the odds may have been too great, the sheriff and his gunmen too powerful; but then there is the red-flag waving and the atheism; and it's a question, in my mind at least, whether the Communists were more interested in propagandizing communism or in building a miners' union.

In West Virginia, where the coal operators were just as stubborn and the "law" just as corrupt, the miners have a clean, militant, growing union, numbering more than 12,000. They even had a strike last year, just as the N. M. U. did in Harlan, and lost, but Frank Keeney and Tom Tippet of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action remained on the job, rebuilt the union, and today the miners have their own candidates in the field! And the success of the one and the failure of the other may be a matter of approach, a matter of emphasis. Certainly what the West Virginia Mine Workers Union is doing is just as militant and soundly "labor" and revolutionary as anything any Trade Union Unity League organization has done. But there the emphasis was put upon actually organizing the miners to better their conditions, while the N. M. U. in Harlan, Communist inspired and led as it was, and impatient for action, waved the red flag. I'm bitter about it, because the miners in Harlan want a union. They thought they had found one that would stick with them. But the union is gone and the miners are greatly disillusioned.

New York, June 28

TESS HUFF

The Appeal to Justice

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. E. Haldeman-Julius has written me that I was incorrect when I charged him, in my recent article on Norman Thomas, with changing the name of the Appeal to Reason during the war to the New Appeal. I am glad to exonerate him from personal responsibility for this change of title and policy, although I wish he had thrown in his lot with those Socialists who openly opposed the war. But when the change of title occurred, he was not connected with the paper. Mr. Haldeman-Julius states that later he joined the staff as an employee, "with no editorial or business responsibility," and that when he finally obtained control he "changed the name back to the Appeal to Reason and eliminated its pro-war policy."

New York, June 22

DEVERE ALLEN

PLAYS

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN

With GLENN AUSTIN

DOROTHY STICKNEY, MARGARET WYCHERLY, JOHN HALL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."

—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

BOOTH THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

Another Language—Booth—45 St., W. of B'way.

A Thousand Summers—Selwyn—42 St.

Bridal Wise—Cort—W. 48 St.

Counsellor-at-Law—Plymouth—W. 45 St.

Face the Music—New Amsterdam—W. 42 St.

Of Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.

Show Boat—Casino—7 Ave. at 50 St.

The Cat and the Fiddle—Cohan—43 St. ■ B'way.

Finance

How Germany May Pay

THE formula that German obligations to private investors abroad must take precedence over reparations payments—a formula on which Germany has strongly insisted—seems likely to prevail; the French, in spite of their great stake in reparations and the comparatively minor holdings of French investors in the Reich, have not even suggested that the priority of the two classes of claims be reversed. The hollow ground upon which reparations stand, once the idea of collection through military force is abandoned, could hardly be more strikingly illustrated. Whatever Germany pays in the near future will be paid to the banks and individuals abroad who have advanced short-term or long-term credits to German corporations, towns, states, banks, business firms, and to the Reich itself.

When this is said, however, the manner and degree in which these obligations will be met at maturity remain in extreme uncertainty, as is clearly shown by their prices on the security markets. An issue of $10,000,000 Saxon Public Works (state-controlled electric utility) 5 per cent notes, guaranteed by the Free State of Saxony, matures on July 15. At this writing the notes are selling at about 41, a price substantially above that of a few months ago. The next maturity consists of $25,000,000 Deutsche Bank 6 per cent notes, payable on September 1. These, although the unguaranteed obligation of a private institution (in which, however, the Reichsbank has nearly a one-third stock interest) command a price of 80. The Saxon notes will not be paid, and will be the first German issue to default. Holders are offered a new 6 per cent note plus 5 per cent in cash, with the explanation that the authorities have refused permission to transfer the necessary funds abroad.

All transfers of money out of Germany are under the control of the Reichsbank, to which all foreign credits owned by Germans must be sold, and which in turn rations those credits to Germans having payments to make abroad. Unless the foreign funds are forthcoming from the central bank, the German debtor is powerless to remit to his foreign creditor. He may, and does, pay the amount owed, in equivalent Reichsmarks, into a German bank, but he can do no more. The country's rapidly dwindling excess of merchandise exports over imports and the fact that no more loans are being advanced by foreigners have reduced the supply of foreign exchange below the amount adequate to provide for German payments abroad. This is the "transfer" problem which vexed both the Dawes and Young committees, and of which no solution is forthcoming.

There is a possible solution. If transfers are suspended on an increasing number and amount of foreign obligations and the amounts due paid in Reichsmarks into "blocked" accounts within Germany, obviously foreigners will before long possess a substantial amount of German currency which should be available to purchase German goods for export. This would be a roundabout way of arriving at that payment in goods which, it is insisted, is the only way in which Europe can finally liquidate its debts to the United States. Under existing German regulations, even this method of balancing accounts may not prove feasible, for apparently the German exporter is expected actually to obtain a foreign credit for what he sells abroad, and turn it over to the Reichsbank. As matters stand, the credit has actually been obtained in advance, and refusal to permit it to be canceled through shipment of commodities would come close to repudiation. If exports were permitted against those otherwise almost useless balances, German dollar bonds would have an actual, if uncertain, value, based upon their commodity purchasing power.

S. PALMER HARMAN

Books and Architecture

Last Hour

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

No dial, no clock hand, no perfunctory chime
Marks what we know as having come to pass:
One moment unaccountable to Time,
Beyond the ebb of the inverted glass.
So in that bright nihility we rest
Waiting the turn, the pendulum's new arc,
A starry interval, a burning crest
Between the light and some eventual dark.

Earth will plunge headlong soon enough, will toss
Her mane of waters into spinning spray,
The foundering vessel and the Albatross,
Harbor and beacon, lost and swept away.
Lean to my heart and listen; for no clock
Will strike the hour that cedes us Ragnarok!

Germany

The German Crisis. By H. R. Knickerbocker. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

The Germans. By George N. Shuster. The Dial Press. $3.

Thoughts on Germany. By Richard von Kühlmann. Translated by Eric Sutton. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

MR. KNICKERBOCKER'S series of articles on Germany does not compare in interest and accuracy with his series on Russia, which won him the Pulitzer prize. His book suffers, moreover, from the fact that the situation in Germany is changing from day to day, and that newspaper articles printed in one month may misrepresent the actual situation the next month. Moreover, Mr. Knickerbocker guessed wrong in several instances. For example, he declared that Von Epp would be the Nazi candidate for President and poll fifteen million votes, and that the Communists would get six million. The latter actually polled four and one-half million, and it was not Von Epp who ran for the Nazis, but Hitler, and even this leader did not get more than eleven and a half million votes.

At times one has a feeling that Mr. Knickerbocker's orientation is in part due to the sensational title put over his articles when they first appeared: "Behind the German Smoke Screen," the suggestion being that the Germans were hiding the truth about themselves and their position behind a camouflage. One feels that he is writing to make his facts fit this thesis. He is at his best when he does not write in a forced style about the gay resorts in Berlin, which are supported not by Germans but by foreign visitors to the capital, but when he himself goes into the slums of Berlin, and into the desperate, starving small manufacturing towns of Saxony, where the poor people are but one degree away from the Chinese famine sufferers. Then he writes with sympathy and understanding and moving power. As it is, however, the book is sketchy and incomplete. There is nothing in it about Bavaria, Baden, East Prussia, Silesia, the farm districts, the trade unions, the moderate Socialists, and no picture at all of the feeling of the millions of middle-class Germans who are still working but have had to lower their standards of life in a most deplorable degree.

In brief, this volume has all the defects of a tract written for the moment, with the newspaperman's eye for that which is the sensation of the hour—in this case the Nazis and the Communists. It would be well for Mr. Knickerbocker to stick to his reporting, free it from sensationalism and propaganda in accordance with a preconceived theory; for he is capable of very fine work and has great energy and vitality, though he seems to lack political instinct. Like several of the recently published books on Germany this one suffers greatly from the lack of an index.

So does Mr. Shuster's volume, "The Germans," especially as its table of contents is so short. This seriously injures its value as a reference book. In many ways Mr. Shuster's is the most readable and comprehensive of the recent group of books on Germany. Most of his judgments are sound, though leaning to conservatism. He shows a remarkably detailed acquaintance with Germany ranging over a long period of years, and a thorough understanding of the spirit of the country. Without being loaded up with statistics his book is very informative. It is all the more regrettable, therefore, that it is marred by numerous inaccuracies in names, and occasionally in facts. Thus Bronner becomes Brunner; Stehr becomes Steyre; Bocksgesang becomes Böckgesang; Wechsler becomes Weschssler; Fritz von Thyssen is promoted to Baron Thyssen; Furtwängler becomes Furtwangler, while Lieutenant Colonel Dösterberg, the recent candidate for President, is reduced in rank to a lieutenant. Mene Tekel becomes Mane Thekel, etc. The trial of the Nazi lieutenants in the winter of 1931 took place not at Ulm but at Leipzig. Again, Mr. Shuster's figures (p. 59) as to the number of Reichstag members is erroneous, and there were not sixteen parties which elected candidates in September, 1930, but thirteen, to which one more was added by a split after the election. As to Mr. Shuster's judgments, it does not seem correct or just to declare that "in the stress of Hitler excitement the Berliner Tageblatt became a prejudiced, parochial, and quite undependable journal." There may perhaps have been a short time when it seemed to have lost its balance, but it remains a great, a distinguished, and a fighting liberal journal. It was also rather unfortunate to publish in a book, just after the Reichstag election in which Hitler polled eleven and a half million votes, this sentence: "Hitler's 7,000,000 voters congregated almost overnight; many of them have disbanded almost as rapidly." There is also evidence that Mr. Shuster is wrong in saying that Hitler did not consent to or have any knowledge of the plan that the Nazi representatives should walk out of the Reichstag. That this would be done was announced in the press some days before the action was taken.

As the title of his book indicates, Herr von Kühlmann has brought together some random sketches and notes—some almost too brief and superficial to be included in a serious volume. But the book has value if only because it throws light upon the present mentality of the writer, who, it will be remembered, was an official in the German Foreign Office in the last part of the war. That he has not been entirely cured of his old prepossessions is apparent: he still believes that "the old army was a good education for life and an excellent conclusion for a boy's school days. The rising generation's deprivation of this training is a loss to the German nation." When one recalls what that old militarism was, how great was the cruelty and the iron discipline of the old barrack life, with its Zäbernen and other incidents, and when one recalls the dominance of the super-caste of officers that it created, it is astounding to have as intelligent a man as Herr von Kühlmann write as he does.

The conservatism of this author's mind is also shown by his description of bolshevism asserting itself "not merely to subvert all forms of family, social, and economic life, but to destroy the structure of history and religion and even to remold human nature." On the other hand, it is pleasant to read his opinion that a dictatorship, whether fascist or bolshevist, would only destroy the progress toward recovery that has been made in Germany, and plunge that unhappy country into deeper misery. Striking, too, in view of what has happened, is his statement that "Parliament, in placing Chancellor Brüning at the head of the State, chose the personality who by nature and gifts is best fitted for such an office."

Herr von Kühlmann is so able and intelligent that it is a source of regret that he takes the course he does. One feels at all times that he knows a great deal better than he speaks or writes, as, for example, when he sums up the whole lesson of the German downfall in these words: "Germany must return to the principle that Bismarck held to be indispensable for the country when she was strong and flourishing—namely, to a policy of extreme caution, guided always by the main idea of preventing the formation of fresh overwhelming coalitions by every means at her disposal." This and nothing more!

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A Modern Novelist

A Modern Hero. By Louis Bromfield. Frederick A. Stokes. $2.50.

ISABEL PATERSON said recently of Mr. Bromfield that he was the sort of author one enjoys reading but shrinks from rereading. The comment focuses the dissatisfaction with which the last page of his novels leaves us—the feeling that somehow we should be much more moved by his ambitious stories, his large-scale characters, his "scope," and his "vitality" than we actually are. It is not that he is fooling us—he has written only one thoroughly dishonest book, "Twenty-Four Hours"—but rather that he is fooling himself. He hides his head in the sand to escape facing the bitter question: Is this the uttermost, the absolute uttermost, that can be done with this material? Again and again, in "The Green Bay Tree" and "A Good Woman," and now in "A Modern Hero," he projects themes of Balzacian, or at least Galsworthian, proportions, works at them with the greatest energy—but somehow fails to load them with the tragic weight their dimensions call for. At the crucial moments in each of his novels everything deserts him save sheer narrative skill. Conflict weakens to melodrama; his insight suddenly stands revealed as the intelligent cynicism of a superior man of the world; the carefully built-up characters flicker out as the "problem" of the novel emerges with painfully simple clarity; and one closes the volume quite ready to telephone the second-hand book dealer.

In proportion as Mr. Bromfield endears himself to the patrons of rental libraries his artistic stature diminishes. Today even the most fervent admirers of his early books find themselves a little puzzled at his lack of progress; for "A Modern Hero" is surely less interesting than was "The Green Bay Tree," and cannot even be compared with "The Strange Case of Miss Annie Spragg." At times, in fact, it comes perilously close to dullness. Why is it that the talented young writer who was hailed at the outset as "a new fixed star in the American literary firmament" should have dimmed so rapidly?

It is because the star has remained fixed. Mr. Bromfield has learned nothing new since his first novel. His geographical knowledge has increased—mainly some small annexations in the Park Avenue and Sutton Place regions—but nothing else. A few stock themes and "strong situations" still fascinate him: the spectacle of the aging, once attractive woman; the tragedy of the strong male ruined by too many females; the superiority of Parisian salon culture to American provincialism; the psychic domination of American women. All these themes he has treated with the worldly intelligence of a high-grade clubman.

None of them has he really come to grips with. None of them has he pursued to their deep roots in our social and economic structure. None of them has he grasped historically. An adept at recognizing surface social phenomena and types, he gives them that apparently portentous and actually sentimental overtone which sends thoughtless readers into a sweetly solemn reverie—the voluptuous brooding, the and-life-goes-on mood. Louis Bromfield may not be the American Galsworthy, but surely Vicki Baum is the German Louis Bromfield.

His latest novel shows up nicely his truncated talent. It deals with the tragedy of the exploiting temperament. The central character is Pierre Radier, a circus rider of romantic antecedents who possesses that peculiar come-hither dark handsomeness and that introspective egotism with which non-Jewish novelists inevitably endow their Jewish or partly Jewish heroes. (Will Mr. Wodehouse please write a novel about a tow-headed, snub-nosed young man who enjoys life and makes other people enjoy it, and whose name is Hymie Glubkin?) Pierre Radier's life is ruined by his desire for power, by the fatal attraction he exerts on women, and by his inability to extract any final values either from them or his own career. This is a perfectly good subject—in fact, Theodore Dreiser did pretty well by it some years ago in "The Titan" and "The Financier"—but Mr. Bromfield does very little to make us believe either in the personality of his hero or in the symbolic importance of his tragedy.

In the first place, the problem of representing the two chief traits of Pierre's character—his sexual and personal charm and his ruthless ability to rise in the world—is shirked by the author. Pierre encounters a succession of women—and what stock types they are: the farm girl, wise in her strong, stoic simplicity; the anemic, repressed industrialist's daughter, bound up in her sour domestic banalities; the middle-aged woman of the world, tender, understanding, sacrificing; and the hard, coldly erotic, calculating, high-grade international adventuress. All these women make a bee-line for Pierre. Why? We are told he is the typical homme fatal; but though the results of his fatal charm are stated again and again, the charm itself is simply chucked at us without convincing demonstration. As for his rise from bareback rider to capitalist, Mr. Bromfield gives us the whole story minus a shred of evidence. Pierre encounters a man named Müller who is a natural mechanical genius; this accident precipitates him into the growing automobile business; and then the old Radier allure works on the boss's daughter. The outline of his career is preposterous Horatio Alger hokum. We are supposed to believe that his force and charm would have operated even without these favorable circumstances; but while we are convinced of the amiable fortuitousness of the circumstances, we remain thoroughly skeptical of the force and the charm.

Mr. Bromfield's failure is one of intelligence, which is to say, it is a failure of conscience and of nerve. The problem of the exploiting temperament, particularly as it manifests itself in our industrial society, cannot be solved by the projection of half a dozen "vivid" characters or by the elaboration of a picturesque plot. If Mr. Bromfield is going to call his book "A Modern Hero" he must be prepared to expose, in all its tragic detail, the irony of the title. That is what Theodore Dreiser did when he called his novel "An American Tragedy." He needed two large, slow, carefully thought-out, massively organized volumes in which to do the job—but he made a very fair go of it. Why? Because he realized then—and now, five years later, probably realizes even more clearly—the tragic interrelation of his hero and the American background from which his hero emerged. Because Clyde is closely studied as a historical end-product, he convinces us; he is real; he is American. But Mr. Bromfield cannot bother to study those forces which make possible his Pierre Radier. He is afraid to touch on the real weakness of Pierre, to expose its roots in a rotting social system. He refuses to see that Pierre's egotism is not only a defect of personality, not merely a picturesque and exciting vital urge, a convenient character trait with which to generate a story and produce a melodramatic catastrophe—but a blindness that is part and parcel of the whole competitive post-Civil War industrial system. The roots of Pierre's failure lie not merely in his unstable biological inheritance but in that unthinking economic arrivisme which is the peculiar expression of the stupidity of the petty bourgeois, as fake cultural arrivisme is the expression of the stupidity of the big bourgeois.

Had Mr. Bromfield's intelligence, his conscience, his nerve been equal to the task of really writing a book about a modern hero in these terms, he would not, as the genteel critic might say, have turned out a "sociological novel." He would have created a character seen as a historical totality, a character set roundly and solidly in his time, a "modern hero" in every sense of the phrase. Either Mr. Bromfield recognized the problem and was too modest to attempt its solution, or—this is more likely—he did not see it at all.

CLIFTON FADIMAN

A Victorian Sundial

Men and Memories. Volume II. By Sir William Rothenstein. Coward-McCann. $5.

SIR WILLIAM ROTHENSTEIN has done it again. By this I mean that he has here repeated the extraordinary success of his first volume of memoirs, and apparently there is no stopping the man. No doubt he can go on forever at the pace he has set for himself. The chatty, informal, decorous style flows onward: there is just the right proportion of anecdotal levity, the right seasoning of celebrated names. He has now rounded the curve of the last century into more difficult times, away from his own generation of Max Beerbohm and the Yellow Book into Edwardian and Georgian England. But times are never difficult for Rothenstein; he is supremely poised, voluble, and gracious. The names of his characters change; there are new heroes in the illustrated weeklies and in the art and literary supplements of the daily papers. Rothenstein sees and hears them all; he remains the same.

The new figures of the second volume (supplanting Pater, Swinburne, Wilde, Whistler, Beerbohm, Sargent, and Verlaine) are Augustus John, Tagore, W. H. Hudson, Joseph Conrad, Sir William Orpen, Eric Gill, and Epstein. It is John who takes the honors here, and his first wife, Ida, whose letters, personal and of no deliberate consequence, revive the spirit of the moment, the very hour in which she wrote them down; they are not many—possibly three or four—but they contain the essence of what has made the correspondence of Jane Welsh Carlyle a minor classic in English literature.

Before more names are listed and before more anecdotes are told, Rothenstein himself demands examination. Here he assumes more prominence than in the first book, for he has matured, gained something of a reputation in British art circles, and is a leader of the New English Art Club, whose influence at last entered the Royal Academy. By merely glancing over the surfaces of his memoirs one might say that he was living in the Golden Age of English art and letters: here are his masters of painting—Orpen and Augustus John! The disquieting thing about this impression is the slow conviction of its falsity. Beneath the round of dinner parties, genial, witty, almost never malicious conversation, something is wrong. Surely Augustus John has all the manner of a giant. His letters are written in the best style of Stafford House, spontaneous, easy, and embellished with vigorous, neat abbreviations of words and phrases, a style more recently acquired by Ezra Pound—these are the attributes of nothing less than a great man. Very well, John was and still is a great personality, and anyone who has read "Point Counter Point" will recognize the fact. But he is not, for all his power of draftsmanship, a first-rate artist. His sensuous ladies have real bodies, real arms and legs; his portraits have an air of inexhaustible vitality—and yet today much of his strength seems meaningless; its gestures are incomplete. As for Sir William Orpen, he had all the modesty of greatness; a small, alert man with the inferiority complex that so often marks the Irishman. His work contained whole oceans of sunlight, and was skilful, sharp, and, judged by academic or popular standards, somewhat spectacular; yet we know already that little of what he has done deserves to live. And Rothenstein himself has all the limitations of a man of great charm; he knows his rules and abides by them, and is successful as a politician and a writer.

One of the great defects of English painting during the period covered by Rothenstein has been the influence of a literary imagination. It is an art of illustration, or the visual conception of a literary idea. There are times when such an art produces good portraiture, but the idea never becomes fully translated into terms of clay and stone, paint or pastel. The traces of its origin remain. The Paris school, for all its "artiness" today, for all its lack of content and general odor of decay, always trained the minds of its students to think in terms of painting. In England the literary tradition was too strong; it overwhelmed the artist; too early he became a secondary figure in the arts, a polite adjunct to the social-literary salon of the period in which he lived. Much of Epstein's difficulty with the British critic and the public may be traced back to this tradition; it is only by the force of his own convictions that he has survived—and it is to Rothenstein's credit that he was among the first to defend Epstein's genius.

But there is something more to be discovered in Rothenstein's classic memoirs (for they have the atmosphere of an imperishable record), something beyond the mere gossip and the flawless manner of telling an amusing story that includes a number of great names. We are given the life of a successful artist, a man who must have kept a careful journal of all that he saw and heard daily, and filed his commentary in a safe place, not forgetting a complete notation of all the letters he received as well as copies of his own. We must remember that the dates covered by this second volume include the years of the Great War. During this period Rothenstein became a public figure, and with Augustus John and Orpen was commissioned to make official records of the war on canvas. It was not only possible for him to meet everyone from Thomas Hardy to Albert Einstein and MacDonald, but now his profession became a duty, and a patriotic duty at that. Rothenstein is like the sentimental sundial that can mark time for only sunny hours; the storms, the dark days are blank; we must consult our watches. Despite the air of cheerfulness, despite his very real enjoyment of his duty, despite the fine places where he lived and visited, in country and in town, there is a sunset glamor cast over the entire scene, something ominous, as though we were reading a history of the decline of bourgeois art. The very weaknesses of the artists who surrounded Rothenstein, local and particular as such weaknesses may be, seem to indicate social corruption—and the victory of the politician (literary or graphic) over the artist. Rothenstein's perfect social graces, the social graces of a ruling class, delightful as they may seem to us, are oversensitized. His liking for the pale, inoffensive mysticism of Tagore is a significant example.

Rothenstein is by no means completely unconscious of this last interpretation of his work, for he says: "I once called Picasso the gigolo of geometry. . . . We are singing, maybe, the swan song of luxury before a new social order sweeps it away."

HORACE GREGORY

Have-nots and Know-nots

Rebels and Renegades. By Max Nomad. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE rebels and renegades Mr. Nomad deals with in this volume, Malatesta, Briand, Scheidemann, MacDonald, Trotzky, Mussolini, Pilsudski, and Foster, are analyzed in terms of a philosophy which is challenging and original. The whole approach is new in America. Inspired by the doctrines of the Polish revolutionary Wacław Machajski, Mr. Nomad, a revolutionary himself, has projected in this book a vigorous analysis of civilization as well as a striking series of portraits.

It was Machajski who once startled Trotzky, while they were both exiles in Siberia, by his criticisms of bolshevism from the left. Machajski's theory revolves about the problem of the intellectuals as well as the proletariat. In the eyes of Machajski and his disciple Max Nomad, the revolution must go through two stages instead of one: the first stage is the revolution of the have-nots against the haves, a revolution which has been successfully achieved already in Soviet Russia, and the second stage is the revolt of the know-nots against the knows, the manual workers against the intellectuals. In the opinion of Mr. Nomad, the intellectuals who join the revolutionary movement do so not because of their sympathy with the proletariat but because of their unconscious or conscious ambition to assume the positions of power in the new society after the power of the capitalists has been overthrown. In his portraits of Briand, Scheidemann (an ex-worker intellectual), MacDonald, Mussolini, and Pilsudski the author takes great pains to show how completely the careers of these men confirm his theory of interpretation. In short, for the sake of their own interests they betrayed the interests of the working class upon whose shoulders they rose to power. But Mr. Nomad does not stop there. Despite his sympathies for Trotzky and Foster, he does not conceive of their role as being the ultimately revolutionary one they declare it to be. He is convinced, on the other hand, that even the phrases of the Marxians, promising the workers a new world founded upon their interests, are false.

What the Marxians are really interested in, in Mr. Nomad's opinion, is the substitution of the rule of the intellectuals for that of the capitalists. The Communist Party in Soviet Russia or in any other country, he is convinced, is not primarily interested in the fate of the proletariat. Its appeal to the proletariat is only the means which it uses in its struggle to attain power. What it is interested in, as in Soviet Russia today, is the establishment of the rule of the intellectuals, the domination of the knows over the know-nots. The Communist Party in Soviet Russia, in Mr. Nomad's opinion, has become a new ruling class, with the rest of the population rendered subservient to it. But that is an inevitable phase in the revolutionary process. The next phase will come when the manual workers, the know-nots, revolt against the rule of the intellectuals and establish absolute equality of income, the sine qua non of genuine communism, and absolute equality of education. Opposed to Marxism as a form of theology, Mr. Nomad is convinced that Marxian doctrine has become a tool by which the intellectuals have been able to deceive the manual workers into an acceptance of the rulership of the intellectuals. But the class struggle will go on—it is only the class-struggle aspect of Marxism which Mr. Nomad accepts—and in the next phase of the revolution the manual workers will rise and by threat of force create "equalization of wages for manual and mental workers . . . make higher education accessible to all alike," and thus turn over "a new page in human history."

The weakness in Mr. Nomad's theory, and in the whole philosophy of Machajski, is in its assumption that the intellectuals themselves can constitute a ruling class and retain power when they represent no definite or distinct productive unit in society. Every ruling class in the past has acquired power by virtue of its control of the economic resources of society. The feudal nobility possessed land; the capitalists possess machinery—but what would the intellectuals possess? Political power, Mr. Nomad would reply, but political power is a function of economic power, and in a society such as Soviet Russia today, where economic power is built about a social matrix, it is impossible for the intellectuals to establish themselves as an economic class and rule in that capacity. The very nature of the new economy would defeat such a possibility. While Mr. Nomad's stress upon absolute equality of wages has meaning in terms of the future, to demand it in terms of the present, regardless of contradicting circumstances, seems a little too utopian. Besides, there is nothing in the structure of Soviet economy to indicate that equality of wages will not be meted out to all in time, manual workers as well as mental, and that the Communist formula, "To everyone according to his needs and from everyone according to his ability," will not be realized in its full import. On the contrary, it is only the logic of the proletarian state which insures that development.

If in his foreword and concluding chapter Mr. Nomad falls into the utopian fallacy in his interpretation of the function of the Soviet state, he does not distort historical fact in the chapters devoted to interpretations of the lives of his eight rebels and renegades. Indeed, one of the most amazing things about the book is that despite the author's particular approach—and if we were to classify it in terms of American nomenclature we should call it an expression of philosophical I.W.W.ism—he never converts history into a form of falsification in order to illustrate his thesis. That virtue alone is enough to make his book singularly compelling and challenging. The studies of such traitors to the revolutionary movement as Mussolini and Pilsudski are done with superb skill. While the essay on Briand is brilliant in parts, it does not possess the excellence of certain of the others. The study of Malatesta, the Italian anarchist, is perhaps the most sympathetic in the book. Rich in specific insights and observations as the studies of Trotzky and Foster are, on the whole they fail to add much to what has been written about these men in the past, and they leave one with a sense of regret that much that might have been said has been left unsaid. No one, however, has written a better exposé of the renegade Scheidemann, and if other exposés of the turncoat MacDonald have recounted many of the same facts that the author records, no one in recent days, at least not since Trotzky's "Whither England?" has done a more thorough job of annihilation.

V. F. CALVERTON

The Essential Issue

Prohibition Versus Civilization. By Harry Elmer Barnes. The Viking Press. $1.

THIS little book by Professor Barnes is a brilliant and forcible piece of pamphleteering. It represents scholarly journalism at its best. There is probably no subject that has been discussed more often in the last decade than prohibition. Yet the attack of Professor Barnes sounds amazingly fresh. It derives this quality partly from the phrasing of its individual arguments, but even more from its method of approach, and its rare spirit of honesty and candor. No problem has probably ever been so much confused by secondary considerations as prohibition. The purpose of Professor Barnes is to face the essential issue of the prohibition question, which he considers to be the harmlessness of "civilized drinking."

If rum were the demon it is represented to be in dry tracts, no price would be too high to pay for enforcing national prohibition. In the face of the necessity for social control it would be idle to prate of the freedom of the individual. Professor Barnes, however, sees in prohibition only the expression of a dry psychosis. Having rid himself of extraneous issues, he can frankly make admissions which are usually avoided by wets. Thus he points out that the loss of internal revenue resulting from prohibition is little more than ex-Secretary Mellon turned back to wealthy taxpayers in rebates on inheritance and income taxes. He also admits that repeal would actually increase unemployment, and at least temporarily aggravate the crime situation by driving the bootleggers into more dangerous channels. Even in the spirit of "lawlessness" supposed to be the result of prohibition, he sees a possible good in increasing dissatisfaction with existing legal institutions.

There will doubtless be some old-fashioned liberals to quarrel with Professor Barnes. His appeal is to physical science, to the biological experiments which show that the moderate use of alcohol is actually beneficial. Still, even if the contrary could be shown, it might be argued that prohibition would be unwise in the absence of a preponderant sentiment in its favor. It may be admitted that the freedom of the individual is not sacred. Nevertheless, there may be many social risks in reforming a nation against its will. As a matter of fact, Professor Barnes does not abandon his liberal principles entirely. In the end he somewhat inconsistently denounces the courts for failing to interpose supposed legal and constitutional obstacles to prohibition. It is true that the courts have not shown a like tenderness to social legislation, but the remedy should hardly be a further raid upon legislative autonomy.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

The Nationalist Spirit

The Historical Evolution of Modern Nationalism. By Carlton J. H. Hayes. Richard R. Smith. $3.50.

A GOOD deal of what is said or written today about nationalism not only contrasts nationalism and internationalism as if the two had no points of contact, but also implies that nationalism is a quite definite theory or point of view as well as one distinctly disagreeable. Nationalists, one gathers, think the same thoughts and use the same phrases whatever the difference of language, look about as much alike as men who wear ready-made clothes, and agree in opposing the international world-order from which such blessings as mankind now needs are destined to flow. Professor Hayes, who is one of the leading students of the subject in this country, points out in the lectures that make up his book that historically there is no one prevailing type of nationalism, and that both the earlier and the later exponents of the idea often make place for internationalism in their thought. It is natural that they should do so, for the nationalist theory that was a product of eighteenth-century "enlightenment" envisaged a group of self-conscious European states which together should work for human betterment, while even the Jacobin nationalists of the French Revolution "instituted or confirmed a host of reforms which they knew to be good, not only for themselves, but for everyone." When reaction against the Jacobin school intensified their nationalism, they still "altruistically and enthusiastically" fought and killed. The traditional nationalists, also, who reacted from both the principles and the conduct of the French revolutionaries and felt more concern for the fate of the classes than for that of the masses, were themselves humanitarians.

Neither to the masses nor to the political philosophers, however, does Professor Hayes ascribe the creation of modern nationalism. "Philosophers, by fashioning and expressing it as doctrine, may have contributed indirectly to its vogue; the 'masses,' by accepting and acting on it, have undoubtedly contributed directly to its vogue." He accordingly divides his book pretty equally between a review of the writings of the philosophers from Herder, Bolingbroke, and Rousseau through Carnot, Barère, Burke, Schlegel, Bentham, Guizot, and Mazzini down to the "integral" school of Taine, Barrès, and Maurras, and summary sketches of the political or economic course of events which put theory into practice.

When it comes to explaining why nationalism has been given such great vogue in modern times, Professor Hayes frankly confesses that "we really do not know." Economic developments have "made for nationalism, and for more and more intense nationalism," but this does not mean that they are either its cause or the explanation of its sweep and hold. Modern religious skepticism, he thinks, may have had something to do with it, and still more "the growth of a belief that the state, particularly the national state, can and should promote human progress."

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Shorter Notices

Southern Road. By Sterling Brown. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Mr. Brown has made use of the Negro folk themes and feeling in a new way. Folk poetry of suffering, of native humor, of primitive frankness becomes in this volume of poems the source from which the poet himself draws his own authentic interpretations of the meaning of Negro life. These are no mere rewritings of Negro folk songs; they are the modern Negro speaking in his native rhythms, his own finely poetic imagery, his own language. They are written in no artificial dialect, but in the natural racy speech of the Negro of today. And they have, moreover, a truly universal significance as good poetry, and a poetry which is true of all peoples who have known submission, bravery, and naive optimism. Odyssey of Big Boy is the odyssey of any simple, live, and recklessly vital soul:

Done took my livin' as it came,
Done grabbed my joy, done risked my life;

Slim Greer is a character whom everyone will recognize:

Talkin'g's guy
An' biggest liar,
With always a new lie
On the fire.

And the cycle of poems concerned with this Negro character is delightfully humorous. Most of Mr. Brown's poems are made to be read aloud; one hears the rich Negro voice behind them. And the poet succeeds always in his projection of the authentic Negro emotion. The poems in literary English, on the other hand, are not convincing.

Minnie Maylow's Story and Other Tales and Scenes. By John Masefield. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The thirteen poems in "Minnie Maylow's Story" make it clearer than ever that John Masefield has lost his grip. He is a poet with nothing to write about. Aside from the sonnets in "Lollingdown Downs," his best work is, obviously, in the long narrative poems from "The Everlasting Mercy" to "Reynard the Fox." In these poems, writing about the common people and utilizing that almost Chaucerian power of observation that is his greatest gift, he said very well what he had to say. But unwilling to repeat himself, he began looking about for other suitable themes; he has never found them. In this volume he has four playlets on historical subjects, two narratives concerned with the Tristram legend, various other narrative poems, and an imitation of Chaucer. All of them are dull and few have any distinguished lines. In the lighter poems the underlying bitterness is unmistakable.

Architecture

Dishes to Break

FRIENDS have been showing us their new dishes. Poor innocent souls, they do not know that the pattern they are so crazy about is already obsolete. The blue flowers themselves are pretty enough; but that is not to the point. The point is that the internationalists who dictate the latest mode have declared against painted flowers of any sort, and that goes for dishes too.

The man who started all this, as much as anyone did, was the Austrian Adolf Loos, though his viewpoint differed from that of the internationalists. It was a matter of taste. To the man of the Renaissance, so declared Loos (I forget the exact passage), there was nothing repugnant about eating his elaborately ornamented peacocks, pheasants, and pastry castles from a dish on which was portrayed a whole battle of the Amazons. But the modern man prefers straight beefsteak; he wants none of these "stuffed carcasses"; he wants the material itself. And he hasn't the iron nerves that would permit him to pick it off the bodies of the battling ladies, or to flow gravy over the rape of Proserpine. The dish must be plain.

Unfortunately my own taste is not quite so fine. When it comes to the house as a whole, then it is true I am sick of moldings and foliage. After how short a span of years they become sticks and garbage! Two days of illness in bed suffice for a man to exhaust the pattern of almost any wallpaper. The house as we know it has to last a good long time. But when it comes to a dish, I am not so cautious. At home we have a dish with peaches painted on it that has managed to last five years, and is still an inviting object to reach for on the shelf. Our haphazard collection has some other colorful ones. We like plain dishes better if they are first class; but the quality of design and workmanship in a plain one has to be so superior that good plain ones are rare.

When our dishes tire us, we have a simple expedient. Yet the trouble is that the next one to break will just as likely as not be the peach one. A dish is first of all a problem in washing and breaking. No matter what pretty pattern you have chosen, you will have to wash grease from it three times every day, and you are meanwhile carefully trying to make its days go on forever.

That is the paradox of the dish. Fragile as it is, if it doesn't break, it will never wear out. And on this paradox, in the past, rested in large part the subjugation of women. They played the little game. Three times a day they carried their precious dishes through the death hazard. This kept them busy—and concerned. The cleverest, most masterful man let the lady have very pretty ones.

Now that women have freed themselves anyway, what is the use? The chief function remaining to the clay dish is to keep salesmen busy pushing elaborate dish-washing machines at us to take the woman's place. These most modern devices are to be put in the service of what is most ancient and unchanged. They are to preserve for the future ruins of Pittsburgh and Toledo the same crockery content that marks the excavations of Chichen-Itzá.

But why? What we really like to do, style or no style, is to go to the ten-cent store and buy some paper ones that can be thrown away after a picnic. This country needs a genius to domesticate and to perfect the paper plate. After the meal, scoop up the silver, if you are conventional enough still to have it, and then sweep the dishes right into the trash. What a relief! In the future, fine crockery and glassware as utensils will be found only in the decaying mansion of the one surviving millionaire. The rest of us will not see any because the samples will be in the museums.

Since the dish will be so wholly ephemeral, I see no reason why it cannot be as gaudy as the whim of the day, or as austere. There is a guiding principle of design that covers the case; it was laid down in the first decade of our century by the same Adolf Loos whom I have been quoting, and it needs only to be brought up to date. He declared that the design must be good enough to hold up as long as the material does. If the design goes out of favor any sooner, then good material has been wasted.

You can readily see what a demand this lays on the pattern of a dish which is intended—if it doesn't break—to become an heirloom. Nothing will do short of perfection. And to locate such perfection, when you buy your set of dishes, you have only a shopping tour. No wonder people get sick and tired of their dishes. But in the case of the future composition dish, the design need please only for a day, or rather for a meal. That gives both the designer and the purchaser more chance to breathe.

The compunctions some people will feel about "throwing good material away" are unnecessary. The material will be reclaimed. And anyway it is not material that stands at the center of the equation today, as it did in the craftsman's period in which Mr. Loos spoke, but energy. To explain this would require another column. Suffice it now merely to restate our principle of design for our own times: The design must remain pleasing not as long as the material holds together but as long as the utensil remains useful.

This is the minimum requirement. But in design there can be no rule against an overplus; its excellence comes free. The butterfly, too, lasts physically only for a day. Yet the beauty of the rock is not more lasting.

I have written about dishes, not quite wanting to say yet how parallel is the case of that great big piece of obsolete crockery, the brick house.

DOUGLAS HASKELL

Contributors to This Issue

ROBERT BRIFFAULT is a writer on philosophy and social anthropology. He is the author of "The Mothers" and, more recently, of "Breakdown: The Collapse of Traditional Civilisation."

RAYMOND LESLIE BUELL is research director of the Foreign Policy Association.

LOUIS LOZOWICK, painter and illustrator, is a contributing editor of the New Masses.

CLIFTON FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

HORACE GREGORY, author of "Chelsea Rooming House," will have a new volume of verse published in the fall by Harcourt, Brace and Company.

V. F. CALVERTON is editor of the Modern Quarterly.

WILLIAM SEAGLE is the author of "Cato, or the Future of Censorship."

WILLIAM MACDONALD contributes historical and political reviews to The Nation and other periodicals.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 20, 1932

No. 3498

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	45
EDITORIALS:
The Golden Age .....	47
The Settlement at Lausanne .....	48
Relief and Politics .....	49
The Lesson of Art .....	49
THE SOVIET-JAPANESE WAR. By Louis Fischer.....	50
AN OPEN LETTER TO OSWALD G. VILLARD. By Norman Thomas.....	52
THE WORLD'S ECONOMIC CRISIS. By J. A. Hobson.....	53
FOOD, DRINK, AND POLITICS. By Paul Y. Anderson.....	54
IN THE "JUNGLE." By Harold M. Ware and Lement Harris.....	55
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	56
CORRESPONDENCE .....	57
FINANCE: ENGLAND CONVERTS THE WAR LOAN. By S. Palmer Harman.....	58
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Emerson: Last Days at Concord. By Horace Gregory.....	59
David Hume. By Henry Hazlitt.....	59
The Talent of Charles Morgan. By Clifton Fadiman.....	60
American Exile. By Robert Cantwell.....	60
Unspectacular Realism. By Horace Gregory.....	61
The Carpet-Bag Era. By Benjamin B. Kendrick.....	61
Notes on Fiction .....	62
Films: Personality or Talent? By Alexander Bakshy .....	63
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.....	63

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT and President Hoover have, in their official capacities and with the utmost politeness, exchanged notes on the question of the negotiations with Canada looking toward the construction of a Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway. Had this been merely a formal exchange of correspondence between the executive of a State and the Chief Executive of the United States, we might be warranted in discussing the case on its merits. But Franklin Roosevelt chose to reduce the question to the status of a political controversy. The letter he addressed to the President was at the same time given to the press for publication. He was all too obviously attempting to convince the voters that he was more ardent than his political opponent in advocating "immediate construction of the deep waterway" and "development of abundant and cheap power." Mr. Hoover promptly accepted the implied political challenge. He declared that it would be unconstitutional for the Governor of New York to intervene in the international negotiations, and added that the "purely domestic" problems involved would have to be considered after the conclusion of the treaty. When that time came, Mr. Hoover said, he would be happy to discuss the issue "with you and other governors." The President's final sentence was a triumph of delicate insult: "Having ardently advocated for more than ten years," Mr. Hoover wrote, "this shipway from Duluth and Chicago to the sea, I am glad to know that it will meet with your support."

THAT THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT is as unwilling as the United States to make any real reduction in its military establishment is indicated by the British reply to the Hoover arms proposal. According to the statement read by Mr. Stanley Baldwin to the House of Commons on July 7, the British army is already below the number recognized as necessary for the maintenance of internal order. His Majesty's Government can consent to the abolition of tanks only above a weight of twenty tons; and it cannot accept the Hoover suggestion that all aerial bombing be abolished. The one constructive idea advanced by the British plan is that the size of future war vessels be reduced. It asks that the battleship be reduced from 35,000 to 22,000 tons, and that in the future no cruisers larger than 7,000 tons or carrying guns exceeding a caliber of 6.1 inches be constructed. Unless the submarine is abolished, the British are unwilling to cut their destroyer strength. Valuable as is the proposal to reduce the size of future war vessels, the fundamental weakness of the British plan is that it affects only the construction of new ships. Unlike the Hoover proposal which would involve immediate scrapping of certain vessels, the British plan would continue navies at their present strength; any savings would accrue only gradually as replacements are made. Moreover, there is the positive danger that if the size of the battleship is merely reduced, the American Congress would be willing to authorize the replacement of our fifteen battleships in 1937, whereas if the present giant size were maintained the cost of replacement would be so enormous that Congress would refrain altogether from any new battleship construction. Unless the British supplement their plan with a proposal for immediate reduction, it is only a deception.

IN THE FIGHT OVER BEER the Democrats in Congress are discovering that in politics one may be indiscreetly valorous. When they were in convention assembled they dared all for the cause, and did not hesitate to insert in the prohibition plank the words: "We favor immediate modification of the Volstead Act to legalize the manufacture and sale of beer." Back in the House in the sober light of the morning after, they find that "immediate" is taken by the rude Republicans to mean "now," and to vote now for modification puts the valiant Democrats in an unfortunate position. If they win, their plank loses much of its campaign force; it will have lost point as an argument, being already realized. If they lose, the triumphant drys can declare that the country is not so very wet after all, and maybe it will be just as well to stick by the more moderate Republican program. And Governor Roosevelt, who accepted the party platform "100 per cent," is in the same delicate position. He may adopt the stand of Senator Ashurst of Arizona, who, in discussing the proposal of Senator Bingham for amendment of the home-loan bank bill to include 3.2 per cent beer, declared: "I stand without equivocation or evasion for the Democratic platform. But it is up to the Democrats to say when the platform will be put into effect." In this case we respectfully suggest to the candidate that he insert a glossary in his opening campaign speech. "By 'immediate modification,' fellow-Democrats," he might say, "we mean 'modification after next November 8 when we are safely in.' With this minor correction, I accept the platform 100 per cent."

PUBLIC
LIB.

THE CONFERENCE of the League for Independent Political Action, meeting July 9 and 10 in Cleveland, voted to support Norman Thomas for President and indorsed a generally progressive party platform. "Our task," said Howard Williams, national director of the league, "is to furnish the people an adequate philosophy of government, a definite program of action, and an organization springing from the grass roots." Although the conference was unwilling, in its indorsement of Mr. Thomas, to pledge itself necessarily to "support every feature in the ultimate program of the Socialist Party," it pronounced itself in favor of a "party of the people," who would unite to control the government, in contradistinction to the increasingly Fascist color of the executive power. The conference refused to vote for a straight repeal plank, but declared: "While on democratic principles we recognize the right of the people to vote on the abolition or modification of the Eighteenth Amendment, we condemn the Republican and Democratic parties for subordinating urgent economic issues to the liquor question." Unemployment insurance, direct relief for unemployed, the six-hour day for federal employees, and the public ownership and control of public utilities were some of the concrete proposals inserted in the platform. The conference was largely attended and the platform enthusiastically indorsed.

NO ONE CAN DENY that the War Department has become a master of military propaganda. How else can one explain that "purely by accident" a George Washington bi-centennial military tournament took place in the waterfront stadium of Chicago simultaneously with the Democratic convention? Some 1,200 troops, drawn from various forts, were concentrated in camp on the edge of the lake commanded by a major general and a brigadier general. Every night the performance went on. The spectacle of fifty airplanes in the sky coincided accidentally with the hours of the departure of the delegates to the convention. The foreign-born were interested by making every night a Czecho-Slovakian, or Scandinavian, or what-not night. The major general entertained lavishly at dinner in one of the hotels; the cost of the fireworks sent off in the city of the starving and unpaid would have fed a good many out-of-work people. In the convention itself an illuminated, moving electric sign, the only one allowed, made it impossible for the delegates to overlook the merits of the tournament should they, by any chance, have failed to see the airplane or the trench-hatted soldiers marching through the Loop when the delegates were moving out of the hall.

AN EXTREMELY IMPORTANT DECISION affecting the rights of Negroes has been handed down by the Maryland Court of Appeals in granting a new trial to Euel Lee. Readers of The Nation will recall that Euel Lee, aged and friendless Negro, was a few months ago convicted of murdering a white farmer and sentenced to be hanged. He was represented by the International Labor Defense, which was first instrumental in saving him from lynching, and later in having his case transferred to another section of Maryland where it was thought he would be assured a fair trial. His conviction was appealed on the ground that no member of his race had sat on the jury that tried him. It has for years been the practice in Maryland, as in many other States, to bar Negroes from acting as jurors, although there is nothing in the Maryland statutes prohibiting them from serving in that capacity. The Court of Appeals, in ordering a new trial, declared that this practice, both generally and with specific reference to the Lee case, denied to the Negroes "that equality of protection which has been secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States." There is little doubt that Negroes in other States where there has been discrimination will henceforth demand that they be permitted to sit on juries as a matter of constitutional right. Not only for the Negroes is this victory important, but also for the radical International Labor Defense, which fought the Lee case through without help from other organizations.

JAMES McNEILL, Governor-General of the Irish Free State, has demanded that President de Valera publicly apologize for certain acts of members of his government which McNeill considers were "deliberately discourteous" to him as the representative of the British crown in the Free State. Of no great importance in itself, this incident nevertheless reflects the extent to which relations between the Free State and England have lately been strained. The Governor-General did not help matters any when, in defiance of the state-secrets act, he released for publication all the official correspondence concerning this question that he had exchanged with the De Valera government. This new quarrel comes, unfortunately, just at a time when hope was growing that at least one of the major disputes between London and Dublin would be adjusted. President de Valera had suspended the annual payments due England as compensation for the Irish farm property which English landlords had been forced to turn over to the peasants some years ago. Believing that De Valera had actually repudiated this obligation, the British Parliament voted by way of retaliation to impose a 100 per cent duty on all imports from the Free State. But when it was discovered that the money involved was being put into a special fund, the ultimate disposition of which would depend upon anticipated arbitration, the moderate members of the British Parliament and other English leaders promptly moved to bring the question to arbitration. It remains to be seen whether this move toward at least partial reconciliation will be halted by the Governor-General's ill-timed outburst.

COLONEL FREDERICK POPE, an engineer of New York City, has upon his own initiative and acting as a private citizen directly interested himself in the question of American recognition of Soviet Russia. He talked recently with officials in Washington, and although reports from the capital suggest that there is little hope of any change in the American attitude, Colonel Pope found his conversations in Washington encouraging enough to persuade him that it was worth while to proceed to Russia, where he laid his proposals before the Moscow authorities. His plan is to have the United States send an unofficial commissioner to Russia with a view to undertaking informal negotiations preliminary to formal recognition. A similar procedure was followed before we recognized Germany and Turkey after the World War. Only by the method of direct conversations can the misunderstandings that divide Moscow and Washington be cleared up. How else are the State Department and President Hoover officially to know, for example, just where Russia stands on the debt question? If the American policy has been sincere, something more than a mere blind for an undying hatred of the Communist system, Washington will take advantage of the opportunity which this intermediary has created.

TO THE SICK POOR, the visiting nurse must appear as the saving grace of an otherwise dark world. She relieves pain, she wards off death, she guards the lives of children, she brings an assurance of security and health into homes where poverty, malnutrition, and fear are the daily lot. In such times as these the demand for her ministrations in every large city throughout the country is greater than ever, just as they are increasingly difficult to provide through the ordinary channels of charity. In New York City it is announced that the Visiting Nurse Services of the Henry Street Settlement, which for thirty-nine years have given free service to the sick poor, must restrict their activities unless financial aid, public or private, is given. "During the six months ended July 1," runs the report, "our nurses made over 300,000 visits, 30,000 more than during the corresponding months of last year and 70,000 more than during the first half of 1930 . . . the sick among the lowest income groups who in other years insisted on paying ten or fifteen cents for a visit [which costs $1.15] now cannot afford even that gesture of self-support. . . . The Visiting Nurse Services have reached the limit of their resources." It is difficult to see how the City of New York can refuse to accept Felix Warburg's suggestion that the Visiting Nurse Services be taken over as a form of municipal relief.

THE ANNUAL JUNE SHOWER of honorary college degrees has fallen. And at least two of the citations did honor to both the recipients and donors. Princeton, in a handsome though somewhat delayed gesture, conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters upon a distinguished graduate of 1905, Norman Thomas, Socialist candidate for President of the United States. For seven years, from 1917 to 1924, Mr. Thomas was unofficially "discouraged" from speaking on the campus of his Alma Mater; we are glad to learn that Princeton has had the courage to reverse its attitude toward Mr. Thomas by a public gesture. The other citation of which we heartily approve is the honorary degree conferred by Smith College on Miss Josephine Roche, president of the Rocky Mountain Fuel Company of Colorado, whose admirable and unprecedented labor policy and general good management have been cited before in The Nation. In this year of depression Miss Roche is able to report a 13 per cent increase in sales in the first quarter of 1932 over the same period in 1931 and a decrease of 26 cents per ton in the cost of production in 1931 as against 1928, while she pays her miners an average wage of $8 a day as compared with the $3.50 to $4 which prevails elsewhere in Colorado. Smith College could not have chosen a woman more worthy of recognition.

The Golden Age

KENNETH GRAHAME is dead, and this would be occasion enough, if occasion were needed, to reread "The Golden Age" and "Dream Days" as a gesture to a vanished youth. It is interesting to note that Mr. Grahame once told an interviewer that "the children were not any particular children. I never had any brothers and only one sister. They were any and all children." One might add that the books are not really for children to read, but for adults who remember—or perhaps who have forgotten their childhood. And the flavor of the incidents, reread in the harsh light of 1932, is faint, tinged with melancholy, sweetly archaic like a fairy tale with the folk magic left out and only the gentle incredibility left in.

The golden age of childhood is, for adults, irretrievably gone; the "Golden Age" of Mr. Grahame is gone, too. Written nearly forty years ago, the books describe another world, a world of tidy relationships, of expected events, of adults who moved serenely through their little sphere of visiting and teas and discipline for the young and life in the country over whose fields one's young charges roved widely and were always up to some devilment or other. The world, in short, before the war, which the children of today know nothing of and which their parents and guardians remember with a faint astonishment. These Edwards and Harolds and Charlottes of Mr. Grahame's, climbing in and out of their bedroom windows to escape restraint, christening the pig after a favorite uncle, building a huge bonfire to commemorate Trafalgar Day, living in their own world of knights and elves and enchanted princesses, and knowing themselves immeasurably remote from the unfriendly and incomprehensible world of the grown-ups who had power over them, have few counterparts today. Our children are more practical; depending on their social status, they occupy themselves with the movies or the radio, they are familiars of the machine, and their magic lies in the airplane and the dynamo, the flight of steel, the heavy security of concrete.

To go back to 1895 and Mr. Grahame out of this new world is somehow comforting. In the last story of "Dream Days" he tells how Charlotte, the youngest of the five, having inherited in due course the toys that all of them had used, finds herself deprived of them by one of the strange fiats of the grown-ups. An uncle is seized with the idea that the toys must be sent to a children's hospital. But Charlotte and Harold, who had last heired them, determine that not all of them shall go to strangers. In the middle of the night the two children steal downstairs to the nursery where the big box is ready to be shipped; they extract one of the dolls, by no means as fresh as she once had been, but dear still; they pull out the leather bull and a painted rooster from the ark. Solemnly they march down to the farthest corner of the garden and there bury these ancient playthings. They at least shall be kept from strange hands which may not touch them gently, from strange eyes which might not appreciate their worth. In the Garden of Mnemosyne there have been many such interments; treasures once precious and still cherished, which their owners wish to protect from an unfriendly world. Here Mr. Grahame wrote soundly and true; for this he, too, deserves his memorial resting-place.

The Settlement at Lausanne

ASSUMING that reasonably prompt ratification follows by the participating nations, the settlement of the German reparations reached at Lausanne must stand as a forward step of the very first importance. It is an immensely better settlement than, at the beginning of the conference, there seemed any reason to hope for. It is the first real break in the clouds of the last three years, one might almost say since the armistice.

A realization of the importance of the settlement can hardly be achieved without a brief recollection of the whole history of German reparations, beginning with the preposterous figure of $125,000,000,000 originally suggested by Allied statesmen. This was followed by the hardly less preposterous figure of $64,000,000,000 proposed at a meeting of the Allied representatives at Boulogne in June, 1920; then by the Reparation Commission's figure of $31,680,000,000 in April, 1921; next by the Dawes Plan, which arranged a scale of annual payments but set no total; and next by the Young Plan, which fixed a total of $8,800,000,000. Even a year ago, after the Hoover moratorium, it would have been considered extremely optimistic to suppose that this amount would be reduced by France by as much as 50 per cent. The negotiators at Lausanne, however, have reduced the reparations payments to less than one-tenth the total fixed under the Young Plan. The agreement provides for payment of a bond issue totaling $750,000,000, which is less than the amount of two annual Young Plan instalments. No payments are to begin on these bonds for at least three years, and then only if the state of German credit permits their sale; they are to bear interest at 5 per cent and to be amortized at the rate of 1 per cent a year. This would mean an annual payment of approximately $45,000,000. Such a sum is thoroughly "payable." One need merely recall that in a period of hardly five months—from the end of July last year, when the "standstill" agreement was arrived at, to early December—Germany was somehow able to pay its private creditors about $250,000,000.

To the men who negotiated this agreement the highest praise must be given. One hardly knows whether to give the greatest credit to Ramsay MacDonald, for his dogged patience, his steady pressure on both the German and French negotiators, and his quiet determination that the conference must not fail, or to Edouard Herriot, who had a far more difficult public opinion at home to placate, and whose generosity and conciliatory attitude were almost revolutionary for a post-war French premier. One may argue that France could not have got more out of Germany and that it was in her interest to negotiate such a settlement; but for that matter it has been in France's interest for nearly fourteen years to negotiate a reasonable settlement. M. Herriot, whatever his motive, whatever the forces that impelled him, will be remembered as the statesman who actually did it. And even Von Papen, who won nearly everything, is to be congratulated on not overestimating what he could win.

This settlement was arrived at without the slightest help from the United States. Except for the moratorium now expired, we have not lifted a finger to help the world out of its impasse. What Europe has done at Lausanne will not begin to have the tremendous effect it could have on the revival of world confidence unless we show that we have the same sense of actualities, and are prepared to act in as generous a spirit as Great Britain, Italy, and France have acted. Any sense of consistency, any sense of justice, demands that the debts of the Allied governments to us should be, if not altogether canceled, then cut down to the merest fraction of their present total. The separate negotiations we originally entered into with each of our debtors were ostensibly based on the "ability to pay" of these debtors. That ability to pay is by any possible measurement much lower than it was at the time that the earlier settlements were arranged. Our debtors were then counting on huge payments from Germany to pay us in turn; those payments are now, even officially, a thing of the past. The debts were payable in terms of gold, and since the settlements were arranged, the international gold price level has fallen nearly 50 per cent. As international payments are ultimately made in terms of goods, this means that it requires almost twice as much real sacrifice for our debtors to make their payments to us now as it did when the agreements were signed.

But wholly apart from consistency and justice, every consideration of even the narrowest self-interest requires a drastic reduction of the debts. As long as the debts remain at their present level, the world will not be confident of the revival of international trade and the return of world stability, and the current stagnation and unemployment will continue. The Nation can only repeat here the comparison already made in its columns between the amount of the annual foreign debt payments now due our government—$270,000,000—and the present loss in the national income of actually a hundred times that sum—about $28,000,000,000—as a result of the current depression. It is no longer possible to deny the close connection between the crisis and the world's war-debt burden. But even if we assume that it would be possible for the world to achieve a real recovery with that burden unreduced, we cannot fail to recognize that if we allow France and England and Italy to make the very great sacrifices they have in scaling down the German reparations to less than a tenth of their previous total, while we in turn refuse to abate their debt to us by a penny, then we must reap nothing but the world's ill-will and hatred for years. The unfriendly reaction in Washington to the "gentleman's agreement" which accompanied the Lausanne proposals, and which in effect makes them contingent upon debt reduction, is not only discouraging but unrealistic.

A reduction of the war debts, of course, will not end our duty. Hardly less imperative is the immediate lowering of our disastrous tariff wall, which, ever since the Hawley-Smoot Act was passed, has automatically grown higher and higher, for all specific duties, as world prices have fallen. The tariff on Cuban raw sugar, to take but one example, has become nearly five times as high, in terms of the price of the product, as when the Hawley-Smoot Act was signed by the President. The tariff must be lowered if even radically reduced debts are to be paid.

Relief and Politics

IT was Herbert Hoover who more than a year ago denounced Congress for "playing politics with human misery." The President conveniently ignored the fact that he was guilty of the same offense. Since then both Mr. Hoover and Congress have continued without let or hindrance to use the unemployment-relief problem for partisan purposes. During the coming campaign the Republicans will seek the help, particularly the financial support, of big business, the bankers, and conservative interests generally. The Democrats have already shown that they intend to play to the masses, to Franklin D. Roosevelt's "forgotten man." Hence it is not surprising to find the Republican nominee attempting to have government relief extended almost exclusively to the financial and industrial interests. He would have Congress appropriate the wholly inadequate sum of $300,000,000 to lend to States that cannot feed their own unemployed, but at the same time he wants the federal government to continue lending billions of dollars to the banks and the railroads.

Speaker Garner, the Democratic nominee for the Vice-Presidency, has damned the Hoover program as "class legislation," which it undoubtedly is. But Mr. Garner is advocating class legislation of another sort and for a similar purpose. He wants to make it possible for the "forgotten men," the jobless workers, the bankrupt farmers and small merchants, to borrow from the government precisely as the banks and the large corporations are doing. And all, of course, with a view to making Democratic voters out of the farmers, workers, and shopkeepers who normally vote Republican. To a certain extent we agree with Mr. Garner. Surely if big business is entitled to government help in the form of loans, the workers and small business men ought to have it too. The government belongs to the lower classes as much as it does to Charles Gates Dawes or the Pennsylvania Railroad.

In condemning the Garner plan Mr. Hoover said it would make "the Reconstruction Corporation the most gigantic banking and pawn-broking business in all history." It is already that, thanks largely to Mr. Hoover's skilful guidance, and its favors are being distributed with painstaking discrimination. For example, when the Dawes bank in Chicago was in difficulty recently, it found it a simple matter to borrow $80,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, from the presidency of which Mr. Dawes himself had retired only the week before. At the same time thirty-nine smaller banks in Chicago, denied such help, were allowed to close their doors. Yet by throwing the resources of the Reconstruction Corporation open to all comers, as Speaker Garner would do, Congress would indeed be turning the government into a Gargantuan pawnshop. Just how is the Garner plan to be financed? And how are the jobless, the people who are in greatest need, to find the necessary security with which to obtain loans? The government erred when it established the precedent of lending money to banks and railroads, and the Democrats would now for political purposes magnify that error. In playing this political game both parties seem to have forgotten the increasing necessity of direct and prompt unemployment relief.

The Lesson of Art

THE old argument concerning the artist's obligations vis-a-vis the social problems of his time is once more to the fore. Not in a generation has the relevance of the poet's or the novelist's political creed to any discussion of his literary value been so hotly urged as it is being urged today. And yet it is strange how seldom the disputants seem to realize that the influence exercised upon society by poetry and by fiction is always much more far-reaching and subtle than that which results from an author's championship, however outspoken, of any definitely formulated creed.

Not only does literature serve to transmit and propagate conceptions of justice, honor, and propriety too complex to be clearly formulated except in connection with the concrete situations of a story, but it serves also to keep current an extensive repertory of possible responses to most of the usual crises, both major and minor, of life. If we are faced with the treachery of a friend, the loss of our fortune, or even the rudeness of a stranger, then our actions, our words, and our very thoughts are influenced if not determined by what we have read in books about the conduct of ideally consistent personages under the stress of similar circumstances.

Dazed as we are by the impact of dismayed surprise, we should be either paralyzed or, at least, capable of only the most primitive responses if it were not for the fact that we have often met the situation before in the course of our vicarious experiences with art, and if we were not, for that reason, familiar with a whole repertory of roles among which we have only to choose. Certain men have committed suicide and certain other men have lit cigarettes as the result of similar incidents—largely because of the stories which had impressed them most in youth; and certainly the lover who has an outraged husband to meet would do well to find out whether the latter is more impressed by melodrama than by social comedies.

Nor are those moments when we are aware that we ourselves or someone else is "playing a comedy" or "talking out of a book" more than merely the most obvious examples of an influence that is too all-pervasive to be always noticed. Art helps to establish in artificial societies all the opinions, all the phrases, and all the tastes which are regarded as "proper," "civilized," or "chic," and by means of which the members of that society recognize one another. And it does almost as much for societies less artificial. We can hardly appreciate a certain landscape, be amused by a certain situation, or even resent a certain injustice without leaning far more than we realize upon the various books which have cultivated the sensitivity to that landscape and that situation or formulated the protest against that injustice. Books that seem to teach nothing usually teach things too subtle to be analyzed, and a literate society is what it has read—not merely when it administers or votes, but almost every minute that it lives.

Art for art's sake never existed and never can exist. But an artist frequently fails to teach what he thinks he is teaching and frequently teaches something he did not know could be taught.

The Soviet-Japanese War

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, June 28

MOSCOW no longer fears a war with Japan. The Soviet Government looks into the future with greater calm than it did half a year ago, not only because of the difficulties which face Tokio in Manchuria, China, and at home, but because there is a vastly increased confidence here in the fighting capacity of the Red Army. Military attachés whom I have interviewed testify to the excellent morale of the Red Army and to the high quality of its training and equipment. If Japan were to start a war with the U. S. S. R. today it would meet a much worthier foe than the demoralized, corrupt, unprepared Czarist land and naval forces which quickly succumbed to a few surprise blows in 1904. Foreign experts quite unencumbered by sympathies for bolshevism or Russia are not at all certain that Japan would win a war against the Soviets. At any rate, such a war would be prolonged and extremely expensive. No one can foresee what anti-Japanese repercussions it would produce in China or how the peasants and factory employees in Japan would react to it. The sentiment here, therefore, is that unless Tokio statesmen lose their senses completely they will not attack Russia single-handed. To which one might add, however, that statesmen have lost their senses completely in the past.

Nevertheless, the Moscow political bourse is bearish on war prospects. Men acquainted with the international scene feel that no responsible Japanese government would dare to invade the Soviet Far East without a firm assurance from Poland and Rumania that they would attack Russia simultaneously in the west. Such an assurance will not be given readily. France and Poland entertain definite sympathies for the Japanese cause. American bankers have long suspected that Paris was supporting the yen and comforting Japan diplomatically. In Europe, on the Pacific, and at disarmament conferences, French and Japanese interests usually coincide. Yet France is probably not inclined to provoke a new and more devastating world war by inspiring a Polish offensive against Russia. Nor is Poland likely to accept French dictation unquestioningly. A few days ago in Warsaw a Polish Foreign Office official told me that Poland would be pleased to see Japan deprive the Soviet Union of Vladivostok and the Maritime Provinces. But Poland's financial stringency, economic distress, and domestic political disaffection are so great that any war would be a threat to her very existence. The United States ambassador in Warsaw, the American military attaché to Poland, the Soviet minister at Warsaw, Polish officials and journalists, and American correspondents in Warsaw with whom I have spoken during the last fortnight, all expressed the opinion that Poland's public mind was more preoccupied with German events than with Russian or Far Eastern events. And this is logical and natural.

The rising power of the Hitlerites is no comfort to Polish leaders. The National Socialists, the Steel Helmets, and the German Nationalists look longingly to the Polish Corridor and Danzig; and though the Nazis may hesitate long before sending Europe to the trenches again by seizing Polish territory, their ambitions in that direction create justifiable uneasiness in Pilsudski's entourage. Persistent gossip in Berlin about the possibility of a Franco-German rapprochement likewise has a disturbing effect on Polish politicians. To be sure, an agreement between Germany and France by the terms of which the Germans would get the Corridor as compensation for suspending reparations payments appears quite fantastic. Germany has too little to give France. Much more is involved, too, than the relations between these two countries. The unmitigated international economic depression, fast assuming the forms of utter collapse, serves as a further obstacle to such a Franco-German settlement. Yet Poland is perturbed by French coolness toward Polish financial needs and foreign political interests, especially so since important personages on the French General Staff are said to be wondering whether Poland, in its present state of weakness, would not be more of a liability than an asset in case of war.

Under these circumstances the possibility of a Polish attack on Russia must be discounted. It is not excluded. Nothing is excluded in the insane asylum which calls itself Europe. But it is not very likely. In the last six months the Bolsheviks have gone out of their way on numerous occasions to win the good-will of Poland. Soviet diplomats and newspapers have received orders from above to respect Polish sensibilities. Polish-Soviet trade is improving, and the Poles, God knows, need business. The Japanese, to be sure, have been active in Moscow and Warsaw courting Polish favor. Yet I do not think that Japan could depend on Polish cooperation at the beginning of its invasion of Siberia. Nor could it depend on Rumania.

Poland's preoccupation with Germany and its disinclination to be involved in a big military undertaking are the most reassuring factors in the Far Eastern situation. On the other hand, the assassination of Premier Inukai, the inflated influence of the immoderate militarists, the transfer of Japanese staff headquarters to Harbin nearer the Soviet frontier, and the evacuation of Shanghai, which released several Japanese army corps for operations in northern Manchuria, have had a disquieting effect on the Bolshevik press and Soviet public opinion.

The rulers of a country cannot leave anything to chance. Stalin cannot proceed on the assumption that the Japanese will weigh all factors calmly and refrain from aggression. Nations on the warpath have been known to inflict damage on themselves; witness Germany's unrestrained U-boat war. It looks as if Japan would not be foolhardy enough to engage the Red Army without allies. But too much is at stake for the Kremlin to trust to luck and Japanese wisdom. If the Mikado's forces had proceeded on to the Soviet Maritime Provinces immediately after taking Mukden on September 19, 1931, they would have found them poorly defended and easy to occupy. With a powerful aggressive neighbor just across the border, such a position of unpreparedness was intolerable to the Soviets, so the last six months have been spent in feverish activities with a view to strengthening Russia's Far Eastern front. An excellent red air fleet is stationed in the region. The Bolsheviks have been building Zeppelins. If Japan were to open hostilities now, Soviet aviation could probably spare sufficient units from defense purposes to bombard supply stations and army and navy bases in the Japanese archipelago. The harbor at Vladivostok has been mined, and it would take the Japanese at least several months of costly fighting to capture the coastline—unless Voroshilov and Blücher voluntarily retired to draw them inland, where the invaders would meet a well-equipped army with unsurpassed morale, numbering, according to an American military observer, from 125,000 to 150,000 men. It would be a first-class engagement; Japan could not carry off an easy victory. Japan might conceivably lose. Defeat would have a tremendous and incalculable effect on Nippon's international position.

The population of the Soviet Union suffers by reason of these efforts to reinforce Soviet lines of defense in Siberia. Factories which ought to be turning out goods for daily use or machines for production are making war supplies. Food is being diverted from the civil population to the army's reserves. Certain construction projects are retarded in order that others may be hastened to meet the exigencies of war. The war danger, in a word, upsets and distorts previously charted economic schemes. It frightens the peasants into withholding their produce from the market. Whenever the Bolsheviks begin to shout about the imminence of war, the village hoards its grain and begins to buy salt. This has happened several times since 1927. A war scare, moreover, can be used by unscrupulous politicians to suppress opposition and to hide the true causes of economic failures. Measures calculated to strengthen the front often weaken the rear, and I am not sure which is more decisive in time of conflict. Yet the Bolsheviks insist that the Trans-Siberian Railway must be double-tracked no matter what the expense, because signs of unpreparedness would simply tempt the enemy into Siberia. There is scarcely any section of the Soviet Union which escaped widespread ruin and destruction during the period of foreign military intervention between 1918 and 1921, and the fear of another invasion is enough to stimulate a violent preparedness psychosis.

Although the winter will bring some relief, the war scare is sure to flare up again next spring. There always remains the sense of uneasiness that Japan cannot be depended upon to keep the peace. The Russians, therefore, are intent on dispelling the atmosphere of hostility and uncertainty which dominates Soviet-Japanese relations. A concerted effort is being made to establish new cultural ties between the two countries, and the future may see Russian authors and artists traveling to Japan on good-will trips. More important is Moscow's desire to conclude a non-aggression pact with Tokio. Last year, when Yoshizawa, the Mikado's representative at the League of Nations, passed through Moscow to become Japan's new Foreign Minister, Litvinov and Karakhan met him at the railroad station and suggested negotiations with a view to the conclusion of a treaty of non-aggression. Nothing came of this suggestion. The Japanese did not know; perhaps they would want to undertake aggression. Any treaty can become a scrap of paper. Japan has disregarded the Kellogg Pact and the Nine-Power Treaty signed at Washington which pledged it to the principle of Chinese territorial integrity. Yet on occasions these potential scraps of paper act as little stumbling-blocks which delay the inception of wars, and Tokio has wished to keep the road clear. Moscow, nevertheless, continues to press Japan to sign the pact, and serious conversations may now be in progress. A friendly American gesture toward Russia could strengthen Moscow's hands in these pourparlers and guarantee a greater measure of peace on the Pacific. The only consideration which will finally sober the Japanese militarists is the knowledge that in the event of war against the Soviet Union America might help the Soviets. To be sure, the United States government does not like Bolsheviks and will not recognize a regime now approaching its fifteenth-anniversary celebrations. But if America wishes to prevent another war in which it is likely to be involved, the best thing to do is to improve Washington's relations with the Kremlin.

Japanese aggression on the Pacific is an expense and an embarrassment to the United States. America keeps its entire fleet in the Pacific. Mr. Stimson has stated, in effect, that to grant independence to the Philippines would make them a prey of Japan. Anti-Japanese agitation again lifts its head in the Hawaiian Islands. China buys less and American business loses money. Our insistence on the Open Door notwithstanding, Manchuria is closed to American investments and exports. All these unpleasant consequences of Japan's encroachment on the Asiatic mainland focus attention on the possibility, still remote, of open hostilities between Japan and the United States. Sensational, irresponsible journals in Japan boast that America's turn will come after Russia has been put in her place. Other war-mongers are not decided whether the first round ought to be with the United States or the Soviet Union. The violent utterances of these publications are quoted in the Soviet press and invested with undue significance. The Far Eastern issue promises to become a hardy perennial. It will still be alive after the Presidential elections in November.

In the absence of Russian-American cooperation the U. S. S. R. must depend on its own resources. The intense military activity in Siberia during 1932 has enabled Moscow to talk more firmly with Tokio, and the new Japanese government seems to be impressed by the improvements in the Red Army's position in the Far East. Tokio, too, can no longer underestimate the task of pacifying Manchuria. The fine imperial German army, numbering at least 300,000 men, which occupied the Ukraine in 1918 never really succeeded in subjugating that country, and it never got the bread for which the invasion was undertaken. It may be years before Manchuria becomes an asset instead of a huge budgetary outlay. A combat between Japan on the one hand and the Soviet Union and the Chinese insurgents on the other would constitute a severe test to the Japanese army and navy. I think, therefore, that the Far East may now look forward to a period of peace by default.

The war danger, to be sure, remains, and for years, perhaps, Russia and Japan, fully armed, will gaze fiercely at each other from opposite sides of the thin Manchurian fence. But final security lies in the mounting industrial power of the Soviet Union and in the economic decline of Japan. Peace could be guaranteed earlier by international diplomatic action. Without it, Moscow can trust only in the fulfilment of the first and second Five-Year Plans. Or will the world blow up before then?

An Open Letter to Oswald G. Villard

DEAR MR. VILLARD: In your issue of May 11, 1932, you wrote an interesting and important letter to Governor Roosevelt. This letter ends with some fourteen pertinent questions to which you asked an answer, yes or no. You do a public service in trying to compel candidates to face real issues.

Of course neither you nor I nor anyone else has a right to ask of Franklin Roosevelt any more than that he shall declare where he stands as a Democrat. We all know that he is not a Socialist or a radical of any sort. There is, however, about your open letter something more than a faint suspicion that perhaps you and The Nation would be comparatively well satisfied if Governor Roosevelt were to declare himself on the liberal side of your fourteen questions. It is this suspicion that prompts me to ask you in turn to declare yourself categorically on some deeper questions than you have raised for the Governor to answer.

All that you have said about Governor Roosevelt's equipment and opportunities, I can say of you and more. It is because of the place that you personally hold in American life and the immensely useful role filled by The Nation that it seems to me worth while to ask you to declare yourself once again and very explicitly on the fundamental problems of our times. These questions go much deeper than a half-hearted approach to government operation of the railroads and possibly of the power industry. The importance of any answers to these specific questions which you ask on power and the control of industry is considerably affected by the answer to a preliminary and more fundamental question. Are you seeking to patch up for a while longer the capitalist system or are you seeking to change in orderly fashion that system to the end that we may establish a cooperative commonwealth? It is this basic inquiry which prompts my specific questions:

1. Do you believe that the capitalist nationalist social order is doomed? Yes or no?

2. Do you believe that the effective management of the machine age in its present development, as well as the realization of any worth-while ideals of plenty, peace, or freedom, requires social ownership of those things necessary for the common life and their management for use rather than for profit? Yes or no?

3. Assuming that you share in some degree the present enthusiasm for economic planning, do you believe that such planning can be plastered on the essential and chaotic planlessness of our profit system? Yes or no?

4. Do you believe that capitalism can remain capitalism and yet get rid of unemployment and abolish cyclical depression? If so, how?

5. Do you believe that the world can stagger out of the depths of this depression without consciously lightening its present load of fantastic debts piled up during the war and post-war years? If so, how?

6. Do you believe that our present capitalism or the fascist form of capitalism to which we may be drifting can reasonably be expected to preserve the peace of the world if the struggle for material advantage, prestige, and power implicit in it continue to characterize all social relations, foreign and domestic? Yes or no?

7. Assuming that you acknowledge the fantastic and cruel insanity of our present system and the essential reasonableness of socialism—I use the word in a most inclusive sense—do you think it is possible to plan for a relatively orderly and peaceful transition? If so, by what means?

8. Do you believe that the process of transition requires as its basis and inspiration the assertion of a new and revolutionary philosophy of loyalty to a cooperative society, in a classless world in which the solidarity of workers with hands and brain will cross national and racial lines? Yes or no?

9. Do you believe that an orderly transition period requires careful plans consciously directed to the rapid socialization of land, natural resources, banking, and the principal means of production, their functional administration, and their control under a general planning board? Yes or no?

10. Do you believe that taxation of land values and of incomes and inheritances should be used not merely to provide the revenue but also to bring about an actual transfer of ownership and control? Yes or no?

11. Do you believe that it is essential to build up organizations of the workers with hand and brain in consumers' cooperatives, in labor unions, and in a political party which will express the needs and ideals of the workers? Yes or no?

12. If you believe in such organization, is it not more reasonable to accept the Socialist Party and to work to make it stronger rather than to wait vainly for the emergence of some non-existent mass movement, progressive rather than Socialist in nature, and more appropriate to an earlier stage of capitalism than to this hour of crisis? Yes or no?

NORMAN THOMAS

Mr. Thomas's questions are frequently not clear, lack adequate definition, and nearly all smack of the oratorical, thus making it extremely difficult to give him categorical answers. None the less I reply as follows:

1. Yes, if it continues as it has since 1914.

2. In ignorance of what "those things necessary for the common life" are, or what constitute "worth-while ideals of plenty" I answer no, while favoring the socialization of utilities, pipe-lines, the public ownership of natural resources, and the control and direction of such broken-down industries as coal and iron.

3. Yes. But in using the phrase "planning . . . plastered on . . . planelessness," Mr. Thomas puts the question in a biased form.

4. Yes, by unemployment insurance and planning, and by government control of key industries as above.

5. No.

6. No.

7. Yes, by the same kind of evolution by which we are now proceeding, with greater speed than most people realize, toward increasing socialization, frequently proposed and carried through by the conservatives themselves.

8. Yes. "My country is the world, my countrymen all mankind."

9. Yes. I believe that the transition period requires orderly planning, but I am not certain that nearly so much socialization will be required as this question assumes, and I specifically except the land.

10. Within limitations, yes; again excepting the land.

11. Yes, but I am opposed to any party which shall be restricted to being a purely one-class party, on whichever side that might be organized.

12. No.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The World's Economic Crisis

By J. A. HOBSON

Hampstead, England, June 22

THE world's economic situation suggests the following chain of argument:

1. This country and the whole world are suffering from a failure of the purchasing power of consumers to keep pace with the increasing power of production in most branches of industry and agriculture.

2. The insufficient rate of consumption is not due primarily to any insufficiency of money income. For normally in all processes of production the money costs, currently paid out as wages, salaries, rent, interest, profit, are sufficient to buy the whole product.

3. If, therefore, there is insufficient purchase of consumption goods, this must be due either to an excessive purchase of new producers' goods (through saving and investment), or else to withholding of some purchasing power from purchase either of consumption goods or producers' goods (capital goods).

4. The present visible excess of productive power must be attributed in the first place to an earlier tendency to put more income into the purchase of new production goods than is required to supply consumption goods at the rate they can be purchased by the money that remains in consumers' hands.

5. If this attempt to create and operate an excess of productive power is made, it must express itself in a period of overproduction and collapse of prices, to be followed by a slowing down of production and a stoppage of employment of all the less efficient capital and labor.

6. When this stage is reached, effective saving for the creation and operation of new capital must be greatly reduced. For profits, the chief source of business capital, will be reduced, and the money savings that are still made will lie on deposit waiting for a recovery of trade in order to get invested.

7. If this is a correct account of the situation and its causation, no remedy can be effective unless it corrects the initial tendency to create capital too fast—to oversave.

8. Since it is generally admitted that the richer classes can and do save a larger proportion of their incomes than the poorer classes, it appears that oversaving can only be stopped either by a tendency toward greater equality in incomes or by processes of taxation or social ownership which divert larger quantities of higher incomes to public revenue and expenditure.

9. This analysis condemns as positively injurious the cutting of salaries, wages, and pensions in public services and the curtailing of such services and of local expenditure upon works of public utility.

10. If all the money thus saved for the taxpayer and the ratepayer were certain to be spent by them without delay in demand for consumption goods, it would not worsen the immediate situation so far as volume of employment went, but would only divert some expenditure on necessities to expenditure on comforts and luxuries, with grave incidental damage to the hygiene and morale of the nation.

11. But since direct taxes and rates are mostly paid by the richer classes, the net effect of such public policy is to worsen the inequality of incomes and so to obstruct the path of economic recovery. It is doubtful whether such a policy of public economy even helps to balance the budget. For if, as seems certain, it reduces private consumption, lowers prices, and enlarges the volume of unemployment, the public revenue may suffer in tax yields as much as it gains in economies of expenditure. Moreover, the cut in the British dole may be attended by a corresponding increase in the number of unemployed.

12. If, as is widely urged, public economy is to be attended by a lowering of wages in our export trades, with a view to increasing our share of the shriveling foreign trade, further trouble is in store. For even if such cuts in wages were accepted by the workers and some enlargement of foreign markets were attained, the reduced wage rates of a larger number of workers in these trades would not be likely to bring a net increase in their demand for consumption goods.

13. The cut in costs of production in our export trades would, in the present state of the world, almost certainly fail in its objects, provoking competition in wage-cutting among our foreign competitors and a rise in the tariff walls of countries whose markets we sought to enter.

14. But supposing cheaper labor did enable us to enlarge our foreign markets, our lower selling prices would not help the recovery of a world suffering from excessive falls of prices. It would only shift a little of our unemployment to the other countries whose goods we ousted by our sweating policy.

15. If we accept the plain truth that, since we are living and working in a world economic system, the recovery and health of one country cannot be got at the expense of other countries, we shall perceive that these attempts to set our separate houses in order are futile and inimical to that world understanding and cooperation which alone can win security and progress.

16. There is an increasing tendency among the statesmen of most countries to accept this truth and to make it the basis of some early practical monetary policy. But the monetary measures taken in the several countries for their own recovery do not betoken any clear grasp of the vital issue—namely, the putting of a larger volume and a larger proportion of the spending power in the hands of those who will spend it on consumption goods. For unless action is first stimulated in consumer markets, it is useless to offer abundant supplies of cheap bank credits or investment capital to industrial concerns. These latter cannot use more capital profitably unless they can have reasonable security that their enlarged outputs can be sold without further fall of prices. And this confidence they cannot get unless they know that the consuming public will have the wherewithal to purchase the increased supplies.

17. Inflation, or reflation by international action, can only operate successfully so far as it secures that an increasing proportion of the enlarged supply of money passes into the hands of consumers to be expended without delay in demand for consumers' goods.

18. Finally, such ad hoc creation of more purchasing power, if rightly applied, could only produce a temporary recovery. When the economic system was restored to normal health, the return of surplus income in the shape of high profits, rents, dividends, et cetera (payments in excess of what is needed to evoke the use of the factors of production) would begin once more to throw the working of capitalism out of gear by inciting attempts to save an excessive proportion of the aggregate income.

19. This "surplus" forms an irrational element in our economic system which can only be absorbed and utilized by conscious organization on the part of our economic society.

Food, Drink, and Politics

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, July 9

IF you hunger and thirst, be patient. The nation is in the midst of a grave economic and political crisis in which the wants of Big Business and Big Politics must necessarily come first. Hence the Democrats in Congress have just enacted a relief bill designed to show that they are anxious to provide food, jobs, and credit; and hence President Hoover is preparing to give it a veto designed to show that he is opposed to "radical measures." When both sides have made their respective bids for votes they will doubtless unite on a measure which will yield neither votes nor relief but will provide each with a campaign alibi. Although it is hard to contemplate the present bill with enthusiasm, it is harder to respect the President's purported objection to it. A hybrid offspring of the original Wagner and Garner plans, it would appropriate $300,000,000 for direct-aid loans to the States and $322,000,000 for public construction (to be used if and when the Treasury approves—meaning never), and would add $1,500,000,000 to the capital of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to be loaned to anyone furnishing adequate security. It is characteristic of Mr. Hoover's peculiar mind that he chose the last feature as the ground for his objection. He is willing to enlarge the capital of the government lending agency but unwilling to enlarge the class of persons and corporations eligible to borrow from it. Just why it is proper to make a loan to the Missouri Pacific Railroad to enable it to satisfy the bankers, but improper to make a loan to John Smith for a similar or more worthy purpose, is a question for the metaphysicians and crystal-gazers. Carried to a natural end, the President's logic means that all such loans are improper and discriminatory and that the R. F. C. never should have been created. As a matter of fact, that very conclusion has been forced on a number of people by the revelation that Charles G. Dawes's Chicago bank borrowed $80,000,000 from the R. F. C. a few days after he ceased to be president of the latter, although thirty-nine smaller Chicago banks were permitted to close their doors during the same month!

THE soundest case for government lending which has been heard in this vicinity was made out this week by Donald R. Richberg, representing the railway labor organizations in behalf of the Costigan-La Guardia bill. This measure would set up a government agency similar to the R. F. C. except that its business would be to extend credits not exceeding $500 each to unemployed heads of families, such credits to be expended for certain designated necessities of life. In addition to relieving immediate existing distress, its object is to place purchasing power in the hands of those who would promptly use it in obtaining the products of essential industries, thus creating new employment. Sad experience with federal relief projects may prompt us to question the wisdom of all such policies, but every argument advanced in behalf of the R. F. C. applies with added force in behalf of the new proposal. If money injected at the top of the economic system may be expected to trickle to the bottom, then money injected at the bottom may be expected to climb to the top. The law of capillary attraction is fully as valid as the law of gravity—and, where money is concerned, is much more generally observed. And what, in God's name, is the sense of financing productive enterprises to turn out additional commodities for which there are no purchasers?

* * * ■ ■

TURNING from the subject of hunger to that of thirst, I am confronted with the duty of conveying certain melancholy information to those citizens who have anticipated a quick change from the muddy Heimgemacht of sink and cellar to the sparkling lager of the breweries. Recent events undoubtedly mean the return of beer, but I shall be profoundly surprised if Congress passes a beer bill at this session. Politics again furnishes the answer. Wet Republican Senators and Representatives would like to help themselves and rob their Democratic opponents of an advantage by passing a beer bill now, but others in the party believe that such action would embarrass President Hoover and alienate the remainder of the dry votes. Moreover, the Democrats, perceiving that they have a popular issue, can see no reason for removing it from the campaign at this stage. If they could be certain that President Hoover would veto a beer bill they probably would pass one now and gladly let him face the music. He has indicated he would do exactly that, but they don't trust him. Consequently beer drinkers will have to keep up their home work for another year. As this unwelcome fact dawns upon them, the lives of their Congressmen will be filled with new worries, which is one reason so many Congressmen are eager to adjourn. Another reason is a growing belief that the Shivering Chameleon in the White House has reversed his tactics and now plans to use Congress as a whipping boy as long as he can. The publicity which rewarded his recent attacks on Speaker Garner and other Democrats apparently has opened his eyes to the fact that if he no longer had Congress to shoot at, the country might start shooting at him. Accordingly, a species of Old Guard filibuster is being conducted by Dave Reed in the Senate and Bert Snell in the House. These statesmen were recently declaring that the greatest blessing Congress could confer on the country would be to adjourn. Fortunately, they are capable of rising high above every consideration of principle when party welfare is at stake.

* * * * *

RETURNING from the Democratic convention, I find myself in a regrettable state of disagreement with the editors of The Nation over the merits of Governor Roosevelt's candidacy. It is true that his stealthy advance on the nomination was not exactly inspiring. Nor could one feel exalted over the deal by which he acquired the necessary delegates by giving John Garner second place on the ticket—although every honest man must have been tickled to see him get away without making a single concession to Tammany. More, if I were not a disfranchised citizen and taxpayer of the capital of the United States I should certainly vote for Norman Thomas as the most intelligent and courageous nominee in the field. But there are certain facts to be considered. One is that the real backers of the fight on Roosevelt were the public-utility interests. Indeed, one of the commonest arguments against him was that, since the public utilities are "the only people who have any ready money," Roosevelt's nomination would insure a generous campaign fund for Hoover. Knowing that he had been labeled "dangerous," "radical," and "demagogic," Roosevelt had an unparalleled opportunity in his speech of acceptance to assure Big Business that he was just as "safe" for it as Hoover. Instead, he definitely aligned himself on the opposite side. Regardless of whether his actual proposals were concrete or vague, the moral effect and implications of his speech are undeniable, and no realistic observer can doubt who will get the big campaign contributions. The contrast between the Republican and Democratic platforms needs no comment. To have such men as Justice Brandeis, Commissioner Eastman, Senator Norris, and Charles A. Beard in our midst at a time like this, and to know that, owing to the mysterious workings of democracy, we cannot have any one of them as President, is sheer tragedy and anguish, but realities must be faced. The next President will be Roosevelt or Hoover. Can anyone honestly say it makes no difference which? I cannot.

In the "Jungle"

By HAROLD M. WARE and LEMENT HARRIS

ON a trip through the agricultural byways of the country we have seen revealing things. We have seen one of the leading citizens of a small town, head of the local Red Cross office, brutally ignore the appeal of an unemployed farm worker—a young father, forced for the first time to ask for charity because his child was ill and needed medicine. We watched that man redden, then turn a long grim look upon the Red Cross worker who had handed back the doctor's prescription with the curt statement: "The Red Cross issues no funds for patent medicines!" Below his prescription the doctor had added, "One jar of Vick's Salve—Tom Ridgeley's baby has pneumonia and needs these remedies."

In the streets of villages we have seen husky men armed with ordinary house brooms. In talking to them one senses the white-hot resentment and shame they feel at becoming a public show as they pretend to sweep up imaginary horse manure among the omnipresent Fords. They are the personification of the theory that the poor must not be pauperized by a dole lest they prefer charity to labor. If the object is to make Americans hate charity, those who administer charity, and the people responsible for poverty, then the method is signally successful.

Certain streets in every city are reserved for cheap restaurants and employment agencies known in the vernacular of our farm workers as "slave markets." There we have watched men recently discharged anxiously scanning the blackboards, still puzzled by their fate and still hopeful that there is a job: "There must be! We aren't bums!" Yet just across the streets in the city parks sit innumerable veterans of the unemployed poignantly aware of their fate. With bitter cynicism they can rate the number of days a passing stiff has been out of work. Some can still pretend to be going somewhere, some carry their coats, others have none, some have only overalls and a terrible need for food and tobacco.

Crossing the plains of our country we have learned much about the "jungle"—that waste spot on the edge of the American city where the unemployed can camp. In Stockton, California, it is on the city dump along a drainage canal back of the wharves of the Sacramento River. When we saw it, smoke was rising from the shelters made by many groups, or "combinations" of several nationalities. For, "rugged individualism" notwithstanding, man is a social animal, and misery is making him more sociable in many ways. Each little group of unemployed was intent upon cooking messes of "food." The whole situation was fantastic. There, in sight of the city with its shops, an elevator storing grain on one side, a sugar plant on the other, and the food warehouses along the city wharves, these men, able and anxious to work, had scratched over the garbage piles of the warehouses, retrieved half-rotten carrots or onions or beans, peeled away the worst of them, and were boiling them in any old tin can they could salvage. We have been taught in the good old American fashion that this is a free country, and it is. These men had a free choice of three alternatives: they could steal, starve, or become scavengers.

As we walked through this graveyard of American civilization with its human and material refuse, we met one man who had recently owned a farm. It brought to our minds a phrase coined by a prominent writer for an agricultural journal who was theorizing on the reasons why farmers submit to low standards, and who had said: "Farming is a way of life, and it is the equality of the poverty that makes it bearable." Well, here in the "jungle" was a democracy, a taxless way of life, and an equality of poverty any dispossessed farmer might yearn for. And it really has great natural advantages—shelter, a free food supply, water, and a splendid isolation from the well-to-do and curious. Only when fate drives too many unemployed through the town in their pathetic search for imaginary work and these advantages tempt them to "hole in," does the town "law" bother them. Then heavy-soled boots kick apart these mean shelters. With characteristic American democracy no favoritism is shown. The poor fireplaces of Mexicans, Chinese, Filipinos, and Americans are all destroyed and the still tame population of the "jungle" is herded out of town. Can it be that our much-advertised "rugged individualism" fears to let men even suffer collectively?

It is not easy to walk among hungry men with a full stomach. But these men, strange as it may seem, are essential to the great agrarian companies which grow and pack your breakfast fruit and luncheon salads. And it is such migratory unemployed who normally pick and pack, all up and down the Pacific seaboard. We have been told by competent people that the number so employed has shrunk from 400,000 to about 265,000. The slack is expressed in terms of uncultivated acres, unpicked fruits, wives and children doing unaccustomed work in the fields—and the overcrowding in the "jungles" of the West.

Among the Americans here was a man who had been a lieutenant in the navy; another was an expert watchmaker who still packed his tools. One had been a house painter, but most of them had been farm workers for years. All were bitter against Hoover because he had done so little to help them. They still want work and have a conviction that the government could get it for them if it wanted to.

We have gone from one end of the Main Streets to the other. But nowhere have we found agricultural leaders or bankers looking far ahead for a solution. Instead, some of them are looking backwards a hundred years and fatuously prescribing the self-sustaining farm unit of covered-wagon days. All shake a pious head at the "extravagance" of farmers and workers who enlarged their farms or bought radios and bathtubs on the instalment plan. But to anyone who knows the "jungle" folk today this platitudinous hocus-pocus fails to dispel the conviction that unless something is done, the imaginary lines that separate masses of hungry men from great reservoirs of food will be broken.

In the Driftway

ONE of the Drifter's colleagues has just received an invitation. It is to join a "selective group of literary people" who will make a visit to a nudist colony not far from New York. "They will be driven to the camp," the letter stated, "where the typical nudist luncheon will be served." And the final paragraph declared: "Of course you understand that all visitors must disrobe before entering the camp. We hope you will come!" The Drifter's colleague seemed a little alarmed. He did not know, he said, what a typical nudist luncheon would consist of; he did not know the exact legal status of the nudist cult, and was a little uncomfortable at the thought of being escorted to the police station minus his suspenders; and finally he wanted to know "who else was going." It is all very well for the young, the slim, and the well-formed to dispense with their outer covering. But the rest of us who feel that life is sad enough at best do not wish to add unnecessarily to our burdens.

* * * * *

THE Drifter is aware that the champions of nudism have a ready answer to this objection. One does not undress for appearance's sake, they say. Not for the good of the eye, but for the good of the soul, it is well to lay aside clothing. Take off your clothes, they say, and see how good you feel; see how the very country looks different, more fresh, more green, more clean and new. You can run better, walk better, lie more comfortably, swim more freely. And as your body is freer, so are you freed from the petty conventions and prurient curiosity that hamper men and women. Never having been a member of a nudist colony, the Drifter cannot testify as to the disappearance of prurency. But he has spent some time outdoors without his clothing. And he was not always either free or even comfortable. In the latest book on nudism there is a charming picture of a young lady lovingly hugging a sheaf of wheat to her bare side. The sight made the Drifter quiver. For wheat is scratchy. There were other pictures of young persons prone upon the earth. But grass is scratchy; pebbles are sharp under foot and sharper to sit on; sand can scrape one's very hide off; the softest lawn, which under a shoe feels like velvet, contains a hundred needles to the square inch when approached by the bare pelt. The ground is rough to walk on, cold and hard to lie on. And stacking sheaves of wheat is something that should be done with a protection of blue-denim overall.

* * * * *

THIS combination of Philistinism and tender-footedness will doubtless cause the nudists to give three long shudders. But the Drifter does not really care. He counts among his friends a pioneer among them, a young man who, for all the years the Drifter has known him, has maintained, from head to heel, summer and winter, a uniform shade of handsome polished walnut. This young man, however, is less a nudist than a sun-worshiper. He likes to lie in the sun, on a bare rock, high up, away from people. This last he considers an indispensable adjunct to his enjoyment. Although there is no fiercer champion of nakedness than he, he entertains at the same time a deep suspicion of anything that sounds like a nudist colony. And the Drifter cannot help feeling that while there is much to say in favor of nakedness, this position is eminently sound.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Mr. Gill and Chicago

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: At a meeting of the Social Service Independent Committee for Political Action held May 31, 1932, the following resolutions were adopted and the secretary was instructed to send a copy to the editor of The Nation. They are apropos of Mauritz A. Hallgren's article, Help Wanted for Chicago in The Nation of May 11, which we believe unjustly misrepresents Mr. Gill.

WHEREAS Joseph L. Gill, Clerk of the Municipal Court of Chicago, has fulfilled in every particular his pre-election promises to reorganize the Social Service Department of the Municipal Court of Chicago; to divorce this department absolutely from politics; to appoint a committee of recognized leaders in social-service practice to compile and supervise examinations for all positions in the Social Service Department, and to act as a permanent advisory committee of the department, and further;

WHEREAS Mr. Gill, although not expected to place social-service workers in the "Renters' Court," did, at the acute stage of unrest caused by family evictions in August, 1931, voluntarily extend his Social Service Department to this Civil Court Branch, and thus perform a service of inestimable value to the social agencies of Chicago and Cook County and to the city at large; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Social Service Independent Committee for Political Action express its appreciation of Mr. Gill's earnest and energetic action in organizing and maintaining a Social Service Department in the Municipal Court of Chicago with a trained professional personnel free from any political, racial, or religious influences.

Chicago, June 10

IRENE JEAN CRANDALL

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Through misinterpretation of information given to me by a person who has closely followed Mr. Gill's work I appear to have done Mr. Gill an injustice. I do not hesitate to apologize for my error, which was certainly not intentional.

New York, June 12

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

For Readers in Manila

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I should like very much to get in touch with Nation readers and like-minded people in and around Manila, who would be interested in joining an informal discussion group.

Such a group is very much needed here, and I'm sure that Nation readers would enjoy meeting one another occasionally. Anyone who is interested may communicate with me at Box 1650, Manila, Philippine Islands.

Manila, P. I., June 20

R. B. BLACKMAN

Miners' Relief

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There is a situation in the coal fields of West Virginia to which I should like to call the attention of your readers, many of whom will remember the strike of the West Virginia Mine Workers Union last summer. Since that strike many of the victimized families have lived in tent colonies; there are at present sixty-nine families still living in tents.

In addition to strike victimization, unemployment for other causes is rampant in the valley. Charity as well as State and county funds have been exhausted for months, and the condition of the unemployed and especially of the miners hidden away in isolated camps has now become desperate—so desperate that six children and one woman have died in the past two weeks and many more are at the point of death. An epidemic of flux has broken out in the tent colony at Ward and two children have died from the disease. Thirteen other children and the father of one of the babies who died are now in bed seriously sick. At Blakely, farther up the mountain than Ward, where there was a tent colony most of the winter, four small children and a woman have died of the same cause in the past fortnight. Flux, the county doctor says, is caused by malnutrition. There is a letter here in the union office today from a sick family in the Ward tent colony asking us to send up olive oil and milk of magnesia for the dying children. We do not have the money with which to comply with this request.

Money for relief may be sent to George Scherer, Secretary, West Virginia Mine Workers Union, Room 9, Old Kanawha Valley Bank Building, Charleston, West Virginia.

Charleston, W. Va., June 20

TOM TIPPETT

The Indian Bureau

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Allow me to call to your attention the present deplorable condition of the American Indians. I quote from their petition to the Senate: "When Secretary Wilbur and Commissioners Rhoads and Scattergood took office in 1929, we were led to feel a wonderful hope. They announced great programs and made great promises. We assert that they have forsaken their programs. They have broken their promises. They have new evils of far-reaching kinds—evils which their predecessors did not sponsor." They have not supported the legislation they promised. On the contrary, openly or by delay and obstruction, they have fought it.

Further, these officials have illegally seized thousands of square miles of Indian tribal lands and leased them to whites. They have forced allotted Indians to sign over power of attorney to Indian agents who lease the land to whites. They have blocked the Frazier bill for an honest and business-like accounting of Indian Bureau money. They have, with ostentatious virtue, closed down just three, or 2.2 per cent of the notorious boarding-schools. They have done their utmost to prevent payment of the money due the Pueblos for their land and water lost through government neglect. They have delayed the sending of available Department of Agriculture money for the starving sheep, which are the livelihood of the Navajos.

The full account of these doings may be read in the Congressional Record of the Senate's proceedings on March 9, 10, and 11, 1932, or in the reprint obtainable from the American Indian Defense Association, 219 First St., N. E., Washington, D. C.

Columbus, Ohio, May 24

CONSTANCE NICE AND PUBLIC
LIB

What Is a Poet?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the excellent discussion of the characteristics of a poet—taken as the type of all artists—by Mark Van Doren, the final distinction can amount to no more than the self-evident definition that the poet writes poetry—that he is not essentially different from other men. However, the difficulty which Mr. Van Doren recognized in attempting to reconcile the popular belief that an artist is extraordinarily sensitive with the logical truism that he uses his strongest emotional experiences for the purpose of his art constitutes a principal distinction between the worlds of art and non-art.

The artist's individual reaction to experience, whether directly personal or observed even indirectly through the most remote vicarious sources, must be sufficiently stronger than that of other men to enable him to record it with unequaled power, or it must awaken within him related thoughts and feelings which will enrich his work through the perspective or orientation they lend to the theme of which he treats. These two trends, incidentally, point the difference between the simplest poetry of passion and that which seeks to convey the greatest possible number of ideas and feelings within a minimum number of lines. The primitive purity of folk poetry is typical of the former, the richly burdened works of Keats of the latter.

In this sense it is genuinely true that the artist must be almost abnormally sensitive to impressions and thoughts; but this very sensitiveness may prove his undoing if undisciplined, as with the extremists of the French romantic movement. Herein the power to treat these powerful emotional experiences with an objectivity of expression is necessary—it is here that the lofty and complete steadiness of view which is Arnold's characterization of supreme art in Sophocles takes its origin. This is the paradox of art, that the poet is sensitive to impressions beyond the common, but that, if he follows a proper artistic discipline, the most intense of personal emotions will affect him less than the man in the street. He may almost be said to use his emotions for purposes of business, but that is part of the price of artistic creation. The poet sacrifices his privacy to a great extent—traditionally, at least—and his apparent callousness is needed both as a shield to this condition and as a means to artistic objectivity.

Detroit, Mich., June 6 HAVILAND FERGUSON REVES

Dining with The Nation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A few Nation readers in Washington, D. C., actuated by a desire to further the cause, want to organize a dining club. We will give you a vote of thanks if you will ask your other readers of like mind hereabouts to send their names and addresses to me at 2630 Adams Mill Road.

Washington, D. C., June 15 FREDERICK HALLER

For New Jersey Readers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If there are any Nation readers in Union County, New Jersey, interested in forming a local discussion group, I should like to have them communicate with me at 319 East Dudley Avenue, Westfield, New Jersey.

Westfield, N. J., June 25 MALCOLM B. AYRES

Finance

England Converts the War Loan

WITH one of those sweeping operations which excited admiration and wonder in times past, the British government has announced its intention of retiring its 5 per cent War Loan, issued in 1917, and substituting for it a 3½ per cent issue. This appears to be, by all odds, the greatest refunding project undertaken by any government, for the War Loan is outstanding in the amount of more than £2,000,000,000; say, nominally, $9,740,000,000, or $7,200,000,000 on the present gold value of the pound. The new bonds will bear an interest rate as low as any of our own Liberty Loan issues; in fact, our 3½ per cent Liberty bonds confer upon their owners complete exemption from State and federal taxes, save only estate and inheritance taxes, whereas the British bonds paying that rate will be subject to income tax. Moreover, in the preliminary announcement nothing is said about maturity, and the investor is merely asked to surrender his old 5's and accept 3½'s in lieu thereof, in the confidence that British credit is fairly priced at the latter figure and will continue to be so priced indefinitely.

The investor will not be compelled to accept this smaller return. He can, if he chooses, demand cash—provided he so notifies the authorities by September 30 next. In times like these, when bondholders are supposed to long for nothing so much as cash, such an option of payment appears audacious. To issue only half as much paper money as would be temporarily required to redeem the issue would swamp the British credit mechanism and send the pound sterling to depths not hitherto touched. There are, in fact, some indications that large amounts of cash will be demanded. Numerous British banks, knowing the loan was soon to be called in, are reported to be holding large amounts of it as a short-term investment, and these institutions presumably will be unwilling to accept a long-dated or perpetual obligation in exchange.

Moreover, it is estimated that some £200,000,000 of War Loan is held abroad, and non-British owners may not be attracted by so low an interest rate, payable in a fluctuating currency. They, in particular, may want cash; but it so happened that in the British budget introduced last March a huge fund of £150,000,000 was set up for the avowed purpose of preventing the pound sterling from rising in value too fast, as it then showed a tendency to do. The natural way to keep the pound down would be to utilize this fund to buy credit balances abroad; to the extent that this has been done the British authorities are now in funds to meet War Loan payments.

Thus, with forethought and precision, England is preparing to deal with a pressing fiscal problem and save for the Exchequer some £23,000,000 annually in interest payments. Already British bonds have advanced sharply on the news—and already sterling exchange has had a rather bad break in New York. The financial odds against London are still heavy, but the traditional method of dealing with the difficulty nearest at hand is being followed with courage and assurance. If one of the world's main troubles today is the burden of debt, England is striking at the root of it by scaling down the debt. In the United States we have no pressing problem of retiring high-rate bonds and substituting others carrying lower coupons. On the contrary, the Treasury is borrowing at ridiculously low rates on short-term bills and certificates. The funding of that floating debt, now uncomfortably large, into long-term and more costly obligations is likely to provide the ultimate test of American financial skill and foresight.

S. PALMER HARMAN

Books and Films

Emerson: Last Days at Concord

By HORACE GREGORY

O my America at Concord's bridge true marriage of the east and west Brahma whose lips nurse at my veins

Where was the green brass cannon sunken in churchyards after the shots were fired; listen, the world is sleeping and the noise coils in thunder where Dover's beach shall wake no more and the Indian ocean pours its blood into the sun when evening's tide uncovers bones upon the shore.

Cut me a frock coat: for the oversoul sleeps naked; parts, limbs (united with death in a broken coffin) expose, o violent nether flesh!
to quick March winds

Where are your lips, hands, Brahma
What was the name, your name or mine?

Come friend
we shall walk in the west orchard drinking russet wine kiss daisies where the transcendental tree (look how the death worm feeds upon its roots) shelters our love and fiery blossoms fall in Plato's vineyard
I have rolled the world in my brain, have seen its heroes diminish saw oceans, continents dissolve in sunlight on Concord window sills.

Are you my friend,
then here's my secret I have forgotten all friends and the words that joined my lips to theirs Better to keep faith and believe no one. Better to be a patriot disowning this land: Give back America to sunlight wind and rain Set sail for India from Concord's bridge, leap to the quarter deck where our Columbus once more commands his ships.

Is that a storm in the sky
And are these apples ripe? I grew this orchard to be a paradise this side of Eden.

David Hume

The Letters of David Hume. Edited by J. Y. T. Greig. Oxford University Press. Two volumes. $15.

THESE two volumes are the most comprehensive edition of David Hume's correspondence yet published. They contain 548 of the philosopher's letters, of which 59 have never been published before, and of which 120 have been published only imperfectly. In addition, there is a very extensive appendix containing some of the most important letters to Hume from various correspondents. Mr. Greig is an admirable editor. His footnotes are generous but never redundant, and they are extremely readable in themselves.

It cannot be said that the new letters throw any essential new light on Hume's character. That character, far from complex, was a very simple and transparent one. The most detached and impartial of men, Hume himself described it with great accuracy:

I was, I say, a man of mild dispositions, of command of temper, of an open, social, and cheerful humor, capable of attachment, but little susceptible of enmity, and of great moderation in all my passions. Even my love of literary fame, my ruling passion, never soured my humor, notwithstanding my frequent disappointments.

Only two leading qualities are omitted in this account, though both are in a way implied—his great kindliness and his great complacency. Even his inflexible resolution "never to reply to anybody" springs as much from the second of these qualities as the first. He seldom seems to have doubted his ability to crush an opponent if he really felt inclined to. To one correspondent who had criticized his "Treatise of Human Nature" severely, he merely replied: "The truth is, I could take no revenge, but such a one as would have been a great deal too cruel, and much exceeding the offense." More frequently he contented himself with remarking: "With regard to our philosophical systems, I suppose we are both so fixed that there is no hope of any conversions betwixt us; and for my part, I doubt not but we shall both do as well to remain as we are."

When this amiable complacency has been remarked upon, there is very little that can be said against the character of David Hume. The only occasion on which his astonishing equanimity was upset was that of the famous quarrel with Rousseau. When the latter was obliged to leave France, Hume befriended him, offered him an asylum in England, wrote all his friends to say how amiable and virtuous Rousseau was, mild, gentle, modest, affectionate, disinterested, "a perfect child in the ordinary occurrences of life." "The philosophers of Paris foretold to me," he wrote Hugh Blair, "that I could not conduct him to Calais without a quarrel; but I think I could live with him all my life, in mutual friendship and esteem." He put Rousseau up at the country place of a friend and arranged to have George III grant him a pension. Out of these blue skies Rousseau suddenly accused Hume of conspiring with his enemies to dishonor him, and wrote a long, violent, denunciatory letter. The good David was so thunderstruck that for months he could think of nothing but "the monstrous ingratitude, ferocity, and frenzy of the man," and he now wrote all his friends that Rousseau was "surely the blackest and most atrocious villain, beyond comparison, that now exists in the world." After a while he was willing to agree that perhaps Rousseau was less a villain than an "arrant madman." What is especially interesting about this extreme judgment is that it was shared and, indeed, had long been anticipated, by most of the leading French writers, by D'Alembert, Voltaire, and Diderot, among others. One cannot but feel that it was in large part the result of the inadequate psychology and vocabulary of the eighteenth century. It knew only sanity and madness: it had no satisfactory words for the many intermediary stages and kinds of neuroticism and paranoia, and hence it never really understood Rousseau.

When Hume had regained his composure he was once more the serene and most detached of men. Few writers of the eighteenth century had so wide and eminent a circle of correspondents—among them Adam Smith, Francis Hutcheson, Lord Kames, Montesquieu, Horace Walpole, William Robertson, Benjamin Franklin, Hugh Blair, Turgot, Smollett, D'Alembert, Gibbon. The letters as a whole, however, are disappointing in one important respect: though they are written with the dulcet lucidity that distinguishes Hume's books and essays, they tell much more about him as a man than as a thinker. He seemed either to feel that his philosophic ideas needed a great deal more room to turn around in than a letter provided, or he was afraid of boring his correspondents by discussing them, or he was lazy. Even, for example, when his friend Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations" appeared, he contented himself with twenty lines of comment—containing two very shrewd criticisms, one of them an anticipation of Ricardo's theory of rent—and added, "But these and a hundred other points are fit only to be discussed in conversation." The letters, therefore, while unfailingly pleasant and agreeable, fall far short of doing justice to the greatest of British philosophers, and one of the most acute and candid intellects that the world has ever seen.

HENRY HAZLITT

The Talent of Charles Morgan

The Fountain. By Charles Morgan. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

MR. MORGAN'S affinity, apparently, is with the contemplative, the introspective, for this is his third novel dealing with the type. It is also by far his best, and for the most part deserving of the praise it has received. Its action—an unhappy word to apply to a book whose sole concern is with the mystery of the spiritual life—takes place mainly on the great landed estate of the Van Leydens, not far from The Hague. To it comes Lewis Alison, a young English officer interned for the duration of the war, now entering its last phase. Alison is a singularly un-twentieth-century character, a combination of the lover, the scholar, and the mystic. He belongs, indeed, in the century to which his spirit most naturally returns—the English seventeenth.

Throughout the story he disciplines himself like an anchorite, preparing for the writing of a history of the contemplative life in England. It is Alison's purpose "to discover an inviolable ghost in the sensible body," to create within himself a constant spirit of detachment which will not, at the same time, remove him from the stresses and strains of mundane life. (This problem, by the way, though it is very clearly and intelligently posed by the author, is never, at least to one reader's satisfaction, completely solved.) "Though the contemplative life was rare [thinks Alison] the contemplative desire was universal, being, in the spirit, what the sexual desire is in the flesh, the prime mover of mankind. Contemplative stillness is but the name for a state of invulnerability, and to be invulnerable is what all men desire."

This "invulnerability," Alison's deepest concern and the aesthetic groundswell of the entire book, is threatened by the love he develops for Julie von Narwitz, an English girl connected with the Van Leydens. Julie, however, reoriented by her passion for Alison, cleaves to what is central in him. Their love, while it remains rooted in its sensual base, flowers into a joint adventure, a common search for "invulnerability." (How Santayana, with his idealistic naturalism, would admire "The Fountain"!)

The homecoming and the death of Rupert, Julie's husband, overcasts at the same time that it deepens their relationship; but Rupert, too, in the Prussian—as Alison in the English—manner, seeks the inviolable citadel; and so the three, forming a unique triangle, come to understand one another. At the end, indeed, it is Rupert's stoic wisdom, far more noble and inflexible than Alison's, which serves to bring the lovers together.

Mr. Morgan is not the supreme master that the pernicious London clique has made him out to be, but he is a beautiful and accomplished writer. He deals with very special characters and very special domains of life; but within his carefully chosen limits he works precisely and movingly. There are technical faults even in this exquisitely written book—the conclusion is a little soft, the scene of Von Narwitz's death is melodramatic, and the major characters are just a bit too noble to be quite credible—but on the whole "The Fountain" is the most distinguished novel England has sent us for some years.

The real proof of Mr. Morgan's artistry is the spell he is able to cast over those to whom his point of view is antipathetic. The intellectual premises from which "The Fountain" proceeds are belief in some (unspecified) form of immortality, acceptance of the necessity for "a privileged and responsible class," respect for the traditional virtues of an enlightened aristocracy, a feeling for art as "a cloister" where men may "cool their fevers in this world." Mr. Morgan's contemplative ideal assumes a body-mind dualism which many of us would cavalierly reject. The life his hero would like to live can be enjoyed only at the expense of less fortunate beings and must inevitably involve some evasion of reality, some form of intellectual blinking. Yet Mr. Morgan, without dogmatism, without snobbishness, with remarkable persuasiveness, writes as if this life were manifestly compatible with the highest morality, and as if the values upon which it is erected were eternal, platonically essential, and independent of the changing forms of society. He is so fine an artist, so adept an arranger of his scene, that his central idea becomes almost convincing. The war is but a faraway backdrop for his genuinely idyllic picture of the Holland countryside; and so firmly, so confidently are his leisurely aristocrats drawn that it is with a start we realize that they are no more—that they have disappeared since the time of which Mr. Morgan is writing.

Fifty years from now, let us hope, the society and the ideology upon which "The Fountain" is based will have vanished, and the book itself will appear to readers as a lovely but quaint historical novel. Any sensitive reader of today will be glad to admit that no novel of the last generation has developed more beautifully or more imaginatively the antique morals and metaphysics of the author of the "Phaedo."

CLIFTON FADIMAN

American Exile

Year Before Last. By Kay Boyle. Harrison Smith. $2.50.

IT is not surprising that the story of the exile has had a strong appeal for the American novelist, nor in another sense is it surprising that novels revolving around expatriates have found comparatively wide American audiences. The predicament of the exile, more or less isolated in a society he can only partially understand, and unable to communicate freely with those around him, perhaps corresponds with the predicament of the individual in American society more closely than we ordinarily acknowledge. Moreover, the expatriate colony (as a numerically small group whose members are loosely bound together by common interests, by a common language and a common point of view, surrounded by people with whom they have only mechanical or commercial contacts) is not greatly different from the American social unit, particularly the social unit of the metropolis. By emphasizing the lack of understanding between the group and those outside it—Hemingway's international associates in Spain are an example—the novelists have called attention to a similar situation in American life, where the diversity of specialized experiences and the absence of unifying traditions have created barriers to communication almost as great as those supplied by the lack of a common language. It is noteworthy that the exile in "Year Before Last," living in France, can scarcely understand French, and that his patroness, with partial control of his livelihood, is deaf.

Kay Boyle has concentrated on establishing the repulsion of her hero by society, and in this she has been remarkably successful. He is spiritually and physically outcast: his occupation—he is a poet, and editor of a literary magazine—cuts him off from an age in which poetry is not held in great esteem; his illness, tuberculosis, forces him to abandon one refuge after another as the tradespeople enforce a kind of unconscious boycott against him. Since he is dependent for his livelihood on the generosity of the deaf and eccentric Scotchwoman, and since she is given to sulkiness and fits of petulance, his income is uncertain and irregular. But these are only the obvious ways in which the isolation is established. It is implicit in what is seen and in the interpretation of events, and it controls the descriptions of physical objects, so much so that in the end mountains and rooms are made to seem unfriendly or hostile. One clear impression is gained from these accumulated rebuffs: the writing of poetry becomes a desperate and furtive business, a hopeless and endless conspiracy against some unknown enemy.

In conveying this impression Kay Boyle reveals a rich and resourceful imagination; the means by which the effect is created are varied and the images are always unusual and frequently striking. The paradox is that a note of artificiality, a suggestion of an emotional inflation, comes from the same source that makes the poet's position tragic—that is, from an over-precious conception of the purposes of poetry. Like her hero, Kay Boyle seems to identify excellence in writing almost exclusively with uniqueness of phrase, and with this basic conception poetry seems, indeed, a lost and futile art, and poets a haggard and desperate crew. The reading her poet enjoys and remembers is principally remarkable for a kind of homely unusualness of statement. Literature is not a vocabulary, he says, it is a taste, and if you can give someone else the taste for it, then you are a writer. All this is indicative of that attitude which holds that poetry is but an added ornament to living, a luxury, instead of a development of communication and a need. But within the limits set by the subject, "Year Before Last" states its case as few contemporary novels do; it is a notable advance in a career that already includes "Wedding Day" and "Plagued by the Nightingales."

ROBERT CANTWELL

Unspectacular Realism

Young Lonigan. By James T. Farrell. The Vanguard Press. $3.75.

THE publishers of this first novel show signs of a peculiar neurosis—a fear of censorship and the hope that people who see that a book is advertised for "doctors only" will storm the book shops and empty their pockets to secure a copy. The book is innocent. Only the most obscene and stunted mind could find salacious delight in Mr. Farrell's use of Chicago street slang—and bolder words than his are now appearing regularly in the novels of John Dos Passos and Ernest Hemingway. Incidentally the book happens to be an unusually good first novel, and if "physicians, surgeons, and psychiatrists" are interested in the development of the American novel, they should be urged to buy it, read it, and remember the name of the author.

The story of "Young Lonigan" bears all the marks of being a young man's autobiography. The scene is Chicago's South Side, in the heart of what was once an Irish settlement but has now been invaded by Negroes, Italians, and Jews. The hero, a fifteen-year-old boy graduating from the primary classes of a Catholic school, is a product of the lower middle class. The background of such a boy's life is of course the street; his leaders are gang leaders; and whatever he learns outside of school is picked up at corner drug-stores and pool halls. Contrasted with the reality of street language and the excitement of adolescent sexual adventure, the platitudes recited at school and glibly rolled from the lips of obtuse, ignorant parents seem very like inept quotations from a dead literature.

Nothing extraordinary happens; a series of street fights, swimming parties, kissing games provides the action of the book. It is not long, however, before we realize that young Spuds Lonigan's environment is deadly. The bleak wide streets, the roaring of the El, the spiritual and actual poverty of more than a million people crowded within a restricted area—all point toward disaster. A pragmatic philosophy of dog eat dog is enforced, and an amoral world ruled by boys who will make future henchmen for adult gangsters takes shape.

Young Spuds himself has natural ambitions to be a tough guy, to be a "champion." Mr. Farrell has scrupulously avoided any exaggeration of his impulses or desires. He is emotionally stirred by the sight of his sister in a nightgown, but the emotion sinks inward. He falls in love with a girl of his own age, but the affair never progresses beyond kissing games and holding hands. Mr. Farrell's unblinking, open-eyed veracity reminds one of Theodore Dreiser at his best.

A word or two should be said about Mr. Farrell's prose. "Young Lonigan" is written in the harsh, flat vernacular of the American Middle West. The surfaces are crude and clumsy, almost inarticulate, yet Mr. Farrell has used this medium with great skill, revealing young Lonigan's emotions with delicate understanding. The few words that have evidently frightened Mr. Farrell's publishers fall naturally into the pattern of his style; here if anywhere is a legitimate use of a realistic idiom.

The effects produced by Mr. Farrell's novel are not dramatic but cumulative, and for that reason its closing chapters retain their hold upon the reader's imagination long after the earlier sections of the book are forgotten. There is real horror in one of its final scenes: a small Jewish boy is attacked, beaten, and robbed by young Lonigan's gang. Here one might say is the beginning of another Arnold Rothstein. As for Spuds Lonigan, he has gained nothing from his increasing brutality but a confused sense of bewilderment and a disorganized will-to-power.

Mr. Farrell has built his first novel upon a solid foundation that may be characterized as honest, unspectacular realism clothed in a vigorous, well-rounded style. I believe that he is one of the two or three young novelists in America whose future work bears watching. In a brief introduction to this volume Professor Thrasher of New York University vouches for the accuracy of Mr. Farrell's social observation.

HORACE GREGORY

The Carpet-Bag Era

South Carolina During Reconstruction. By Francis Butler Simkins and Robert Hilliard Woody. University of North Carolina Press. $8.

THIS book is significant in that it marks a new development in the historiography of the reconstruction period. The older Northern historians regarded this epoch as one in which the natural fruits of victory were garnered. That certain unfortunate incidents accompanied the process was attributed to the apostasy of Andrew Johnson and the rebellious spirit of the Southern whites. To the extent that reconstruction was undone, it was accomplished by unjustifiable violence, intimidation, and fraud. This school of historians was followed by another (mostly Southern) who looked upon the whole business of reconstruction as the work of hypocritical politicians who for partisan purposes wreaked vengeance upon a brave and defenseless foe through the agency of "Carpet-baggers," "Scalwags," and "Smart Niggers." These unspeakable scoundrels and all their nefarious works were irredeemably damned. The undoing of reconstruction was the commendable work of high-minded men who were determined that Anglo-Saxon civilization should not be destroyed by African barbarism. To the extent that it was accompanied by violence, intimidation, and fraud the noble end more than justified the regrettable means.

To neither of these points of view do Messrs. Simkins and Woody subscribe. That the period of reconstruction was indeed a "tragic era" and "an age of hate" they by no means deny. That corruption was all too prevalent at Columbia and in the county seats is freely conceded. That many of the white and Negro Republican politicians were venal is unquestioned. However, there were exceptions. From reading the political part of the narrative one gains the impression that while practical politics was rotten enough, its reputation was a good deal blacker than the thing itself. The political game was conducted with more naivete and less finesse than is ordinarily the case. Moreover, the players were hated outsiders, scorned "inferiors," or despised renegades whose every act was closely watched by hostile contemporaries and investigated in minutest detail by hypercritical successors.

But the greater part of the volume is not devoted to politics. Thirteen of the twenty chapters deal with social, economic, religious, and educational matters. In these chapters the authors point out that many of the innovations of the reconstruction era survive to this day. Among the more notable of these are the liberty of the Negroes to manage their own church affairs, the system of land tenure which permits the Negro tenant considerable freedom in the operation of his farm, and social adjustments in which the Negro is given an opportunity to aspire to many things that would have been denied him under the sort of peonage to which his former masters were ready to assign him. Moreover, "the principle of the equality of all men before the law was then grafted into the judicial practice of the State . . . and the right of all to attend State-supported schools" was also accomplished. "Although the makers of the constitution of 1895 [native white Democrats] roundly attacked the constitution of 1868, the document they produced is scarcely more than a revision of the handiwork of the radicals."

In short, Messrs. Simkins and Woody, without appearing polemical, defend the thesis that reconstruction was in fact a revolution. Like all revolutions it had its seamy and tragic sides, but also, like others, it marked an advance in the long struggle for human liberty and equality. That two South Carolinians have given this turn to the narrative of an eventful epoch in the history of their State is a hopeful indication that that struggle still possesses some vitality.

BENJAMIN B. KENDRICK

Notes on Fiction

The Quick and the Dead. By Claire Spencer. Harrison Smith. $2.50.

In "Gallows' Orchard" Miss Spencer wrote a vigorous story of strangely harassed and thwarted persons. But the novel, with all its virtues, gave an annoying impression of artificiality, and one constantly felt that the author was straining for effect. "The Quick and the Dead" contains all the faults of its predecessor and exhibits few of its good qualities. Miss Spencer works very hard to describe the emotions of her characters, but she never once succeeds in making those characters interesting or their emotions contagious. Her puppets assume grotesque attitudes, but one is conscious only of the hard-working woman who is pulling the strings. Though it is a little difficult to know just what Miss Spencer is driving at, the book is presumably a study of maladjustment. Since, however, neither Peter nor the world in which he lives is made convincing, the reader is not particularly enlightened.

Babylon on Hudson. Anonymous. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

In some ways this novel has features that recommend it: an acceptance of large social problems as a legitimate field for fiction, a few shrewd characterizations, an unpretentious style sustained at a level somewhat above the average. These do not entirely compensate for the tedious rehashings of Spengler, for the aimlessness of the work as a whole, or for the grave error in judgment that allowed the author to employ his dullest character (a pompous lawyer goes about muttering "Can such things be?") as his observer. As a general rule, Spengler's point of view seems to produce unsatisfactory novels. The characters have a tendency to accept whatever happens, from adultery to stomach trouble, as evidence of the Decline of the West.

Soft Answers. By Richard Aldington. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Mr. Aldington feels so candid a distaste for his characters that the reader grows somewhat uncomfortable before this collection of stories is finished; reading it is like listening to long and sarcastic character sketches of someone's bitterest enemies. The distaste is communicated; the causes of it are not. The stories turn upon the exposure of hypocrisy, affectation, and stupidity, rising to burlesque in the account of an intellectual's conversion to Catholicism, in Stepping Heavenward, and degenerating to aimless and tedious gossip in Nobody's Baby. All the characters seem so unimportant that one cannot understand why they merit ridicule.

Letter from an Unknown Woman. By Stefan Zweig. Translated from the German by Eden and Cedar Paul. The Viking Press. $1.25.

In this excellent novelette, cast in a mold whose simplicity is deceptive, the author of "Amok" has told a singularly tender and passionate story. On his birthday a famous novelist receives a letter from an unknown woman. The woman is writing by the deathbed of her only son, the novelist's son as the letter in due time reveals. And to the growing astonishment of the recipient of the letter he learns that his correspondent has devoted her whole life to him, that she loved him even as a child when she caught her first glimpse of him. Later, as a young woman, whom he thought he had picked up lightly, she gave herself to him, and still later, as a woman of the world, once again, without his ever knowing or troubling to learn who she might be, and without once understanding that the child, the girl, and the mature woman were one and the same person.

Pigeon Irish. By Francis Stuart. The Macmillan Company. $2.

This novel is laid in the Ireland of the future, at a time when war is destroying the rest of the world. A never very coherent revolt is built around the idea of preserving small bits of Ireland against the peace; closed parks, it seems, to house old traditions. With the initial difficulties offered by this theme, the novel is well done. The characters are clearly captured, and apt and realistic details break down the sense of remoteness and make the fantasy credible. The meaning is never altogether clear. From the enthusiastic praise of Yeats and others one gathers that the novel has some special significance for the Irish that is missed by the American reader. A curious effect is produced by this fanciful and whimsical handling of a subject that seems to demand a Swiftian bitterness.

Films

Personality or Talent?

MERTON OF THE MOVIES," the novel of Harry Leon Wilson, and later the great stage hit of a few years ago, has now been made into a film with the new name of "Make Me a Star" (Paramount). One cannot say with certainty whether Mr. Wilson set out deliberately to burlesque the movies. It is probable that all he was interested in was to tell the amusing story of a small-town simpleton whose naive earnestness and weird notions of acting are adroitly used by a film company to turn him into a star comedian. The public, however, unquestionably regarded the play as a skit on the movies and on the absurd way in which ignorant and talentless nobodies rise to the dizzy heights of stardom. It cannot be denied that an implication to this effect, whether intentional or not, is present in the story. The stage version certainly saw the movies as if they were merely a vulgar copy of the stage. "Look," it seemed to be saying, "how ludicrous it all is. A fellow may be an utter fool and not know a thing about acting, but in this crazy movie world even his foolishness and ignorance can appear as a talent for acting." To which one can only reply, "And why not?"

For the ability to act and particularly to act intelligently, with the full realization of the effect of every movement, gesture, or inflection of the voice, which is what good acting means on the stage, is really not an essential requirement for good film acting. In the days of the silent films, when "Merton of the Movies" was written, film acting neither did nor could resemble acting on the stage, although in the general treatment of their material the movie directors tried their hardest to imitate the stage play. So, at that time, the jibe of "Merton of the Movies" was substantially beside the point. Today, in this era of talkies, it would have been more justified on general grounds, since the talking picture does imitate stage acting, in its misguided attempt to reproduce stage dialogue and situations. But is it quite true in fact? I do not think so. The majority of the film actors of today are recruited from the stage, and although there are quite enough incompetents among them, I doubt that the number is any greater than is found in the theater. What is more important, the acting ability that shows off most successfully on the screen is decidedly of a lower degree of competence than that required on the stage. Unlike the stage actor, the film actor appears best when he acts least. All he needs is personality, character, for this is enough to make his acting both natural and convincing. For this reason an actor like James Cagney, who would probably cut no figure at all on the stage, makes one of the best screen actors; whereas Edward G. Robinson, who acts very effectively on the stage, seems forced and unconvincing when he does his very intelligent and expert "acting" on the screen.

Not without its own unconscious humor is the fact that "Make Me a Star," which makes fun of unconscious humor in screen acting, belies its moral by demonstrating the superiority of natural character acting over the more dextrous "impersonation" of a character. Stuart Erwin, who plays the small-town boy crashing the studio gate by his disarming artlessness, is perhaps too comic a character for his part, but his acting is natural and he succeeds in being telling without any display of histrionics. Miss Joan Blondell, on the other hand, is much more of an actress, and her persistent efforts to play the part, emphasizing her points with facial expression, fall mostly flat precisely because of that emphasis.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, is the author of "Machines and Men in Russia."

J. A. HOBSON is one of the foremost British economists and a contributing editor of The Nation.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

HAROLD M. WARE and LEMENT HARRIS have recently made an agricultural survey of the United States.

HORACE GREGORY, author of "Chelsea Rooming House," will have a new volume of verse published in the fall by Harcourt, Brace and Company.

CLIFTON FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

ROBERT CANTWELL is author of "Laugh and Lie Down."

BENJAMIN B. KENDRICK is professor of history at the North Carolina College for Women, and is coauthor with Louis M. Hacker of "The United States Since 1865."

PLAYS

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN With GLENN ANDERSON
DOROTHY STICKNEY, MARGARET WYCHERLY, JOHN BEAL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."

—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

BOOTH THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

Another Language—Booth—45 St., W. of B'way.

Bridal Wise—Cort—W. 48 St.

Counsellor-at-Law—Plymouth—W. 45 St.

Of Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.

Show Boat—Casino—7 Ave. at 50 St.

That's Gratitude—Waldorf—50th St. E. of B'way.

The Cat and the Fiddle—Cohan—43 St. & B'way.

FILMS

Blumenfrau von Lindenau—Little Carnegie—146 W. 57 St.

Brand in the Oper—Europa—154 W. 55th St.

Bring 'Em Back Alive—Mayfair—B'way at 47 St.

Grand Hotel—Astor—45 St. & B'way.

☐ RESORTS

THE OLIVER HOUSE

Marshall's Creek, Pa.
(Near Water Gap)

View, modern, attractive, congenial. Rooms with private baths, $20 per week. Golf course near. Rowing and bathing on premises.

Telephone 1-8 ■ 1-2

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, Warrensburg, in the Adirondacks. One minute from Echo Lake with splendid bathing. Canoes and boats for guests. Tennis court. Cabins if desired. Beautifully located. We meet all guests at Lake George. Rates $18 and $20. R. J. Venton.

VINEYARD LODGE, Ulster Park, N. Y. (near Kingston). Modern hotel amidst gorgeous 200 acre fruit farm, sunbaths, saddle horses, tennis court, social activities, refinement, congeniality. Kosher. Reduced rates $18.00-$20.00 weekly. Joseph Rosenthal. Phone Kingston 3430.

RIVERSIDE INN, Seymour, Conn., on Lake Housatonic. Picturesque country. Woods. Hills. Only 70 miles from New York. Swimming, boating, fishing, tennis, basket ball, ping pong. Horses. $21 per week. $3.50 per day. Telephone Derby 231-2.

For delightful vacations — or week-ends TOPSTONE FARM, in the Connecticut hills, restful, secluded. We keep our own saddle horses, and provide instruction. Address: R. F. D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn. Phone Ridgefield 648.

COME to the seashore for delightful weekends and vacations. The finest surf bathing on Long Island; beautiful beach and boardwalk. And at Reiber's Cottage you get most comfortable accommodations and choicest food. Reasonable rates. Belle Harbor 5-0089.

BUDD LAKE, N. J., CAMP DAVIS (Esperanto). Only vegetarian rustic camp of its kind. Delicious meals. All activities. Ideal weekends. $16 a week. $3 a day. $1.95 round trip. Write R. S. Davis, P.O. Stanhope, N. J. or call Riverside 9-4080.

SUMMER RENTALS

ADIRONDACKS, overlooking Hudson. Young sculptor offers cottage, with kitchen. Will share big studio, car, boat. Either $40. Beauty incarnate. Boating, bathing, delightful hiking, famous fishing. Golf. Library. C. Brande, Warrensburg, N. Y.

SUBURBAN ACCOMMODATIONS

CHEERFUL room with meals, private home. 45 minutes from New York. Quiet and healthful surroundings. Ideal for complete relaxation. Mrs. W. Wright, Ho-ho-kus, N. J. Tel. Ridgewood 6-3438.

☐ FOR SALE

WESTPORT, CONN. For sale at great sacrifice. About thirty acres of land and two houses. One six rooms and bath, large barn, and two-car garage. Another three rooms and small garage. Abundance of shrubbery. Trees and fruit. Twenty acres of woodland. River on property. Six miles from station. Good road.

WESTCHESTER COUNTY, N. Y. Three acres or more of beautiful woodland at the very low price of $400 per acre. Five miles from New Canaan, Conn., station. Good road. Electricity and telephone available. Terms. Harvey P. Vaughn, 29 Greenwich Ave., New York

FOR RENT—CALIFORNIA

FOR RENT: In Palo Alto, Calif. (Stanford University). 8-room house. 2-story shingle, enclosed porches, furnace, garden, fruit. One mile from station, bus at corner. By the year, $100 per month, furnished. ALSO, 2-room cottage in garden, French doors, fireplace, partly furnished. All improvements. $30. Address Owner, 915 Channing Ave.

☐ RESORTS

If you are sensitive to beauty and charm, make Green Mansions your vacation place this summer

The most modern and complete adult camp in the Adirondacks

Reduced Rates
PRIVATE GOLF COURSE

Tel. Chestertown 37

Write for booklet

Directors

Lena Barish Sam Garlen

11 W. 42 St., New York
CH. 4-1345

SEA GATE RENDEZ-VOUS

"Where food is the best"

3913 Laurel Ave., Sea Gate, N. Y. Harbor
Situated in the exclusive community of Sea Gate, by the Ocean.

Ideal place for vacation or weekend.
RATES WITHIN YOUR MEANS

Mrs. S. Tell, Mgr. Tel. ESplanade 2-8877

SEA GATE—Accommodations available for several guests in quiet, refined boarding home. Home cooking, special dietetic attention to children. Private boat runs to Battery daily. Moderate rates. Mrs. Blum, 4120 Manhattan Ave. ESplanade 2-8550.

HILLSIDE COTTAGE. For those requiring quiet and restful holiday in a lovely countryside. Bathing nearby. Own milk, eggs, fruit and vegetables. Daily $3, weekly $15. P. O. Box 85, Ivoryton, Conn.

CARETAKER WANTED

WANTED: Writer or artist to occupy quarters in country house indefinite period, 1 hour from New York, Ramapo Mts. Free rent, heat, light in exchange for slight services as caretakers. Only cost food. Apply Box 719, c/o The Nation.

A NATION reader writes us:

"Of the eleven replies to our advertisement, three were sufficiently interested to make the trip (75 miles from New York) to see the place and all three wanted to rent it. We rented it to people who please us very much and certainly consider THE NATION an excellent medium for our purpose."

The VEGETARIAN HOTEL

of the Catskill Mountains

fulfills your vacation requirements. Wholesome natural foods, which include home baked whole wheat bread; modern conveniences; recreational facilities; fresh mountain air and sun baths. Rates are moderate. Send for detailed information—address Mrs. F. SHAFER.

The VEGETARIAN HOTEL, Woodridge, N. Y.

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship, wholesome food. Tennis.

THE HILBERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y. Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 953

CAMP DOR-CEL for Nature lovers. Fresh and salt water bathing at our door. All other sports. Food from our own farm. Rates $14 per week. For information write Doris Ariewitz, Norwich, Conn., R. D. No. 7, or Phone Kingsbridge 6-9907.

EDUCATIONAL
CONVERSATIONAL FRENCH

Spanish - Italian - German

Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES 1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

FRENCH Spanish, Italian, German Russian, Conversational. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c. Daily 9-9. Fisher School of Languages, 1264 Lexington Av. (bet. 85-86 Sts.) Est. 1905. ATwater 9-8075

☐ OPEN SHELF

CURIOUS BOOKS Send for Catalogue of Privately Printed Unexpurgated Items Exotically Illustrated Limited Editions
THE FALSTAFF PRESS
Dept. N, 260 Fifth Avenue, New York

RESTAURANT

LIBERALS AND RADICALS
dine and lunch in a congenial atmosphere at the CIVIC CLUB OPEN AIR RESTAURANT
18 E. 10th St. Gram. 5-2987

Ping Pong Table for Guests

Committee meetings and other groups accommodated on short notice. Prices moderate. Rose Finn, Manager.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 27, 1932

No. 3499

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	65
EDITORIALS:
The President "Warns" Europe.....	68
Labor Racketeers .....	69
An Appeal to Liberia.....	69
Food for a Penny.....	70
THE BONUS ARMY SCARES MR. HOOVER. By Mauritz A. Hallgren.....	71
THE OTTAWA CONFERENCE AND WORLD TRADE. By Robert A. MacKay.....	74
WILSON WAS FOR WAR IN MARCH, 1916. By C. Hartley Grattan.....	76
WHAT I BELIEVE. By Conrad Aiken.....	79
A PROGRAM FOR REVOLT. By Devere Allen.....	80
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	82
CORRESPONDENCE.....	82
FINANCE: OTTAWA SEEKS A FORMULA. By S. Palmer Harman.....	84
BOOKS:
Strict Acre. By Joseph Auslander.....	85
Prelude. By Conrad Aiken.....	85
The Artist as a Youngish Man. By Dorothy Van Doren.....	85
Westermarck on Ethics. By Joseph Wood Krutch.....	86
Revolution as a Fine Art. By Max Nomad.....	86
"Faust" a Hundred Years After. By William Harlan Hale.....	87
Amber-Tinted Elegance. By Gerald Sykes.....	88
Our Economic Muddle. By Maxwell S. Stewart.....	88
Prisoner of War. By Isidor Schneider.....	89
Shorter Notices.....	90
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.....	91

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN      MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN      FRED A. KIRCHWEY      MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT      H. L. MENCKEN      CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON      NORMAN THOMAS      ARTHUR WARNER
MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

SO THE FIRST SESSION of the Seventy-Second Congress has come to an end. Few sessions have been as vital, few have called forth as much unwarranted abuse of Congress, and few have witnessed so clear-cut an issue between the Executive and Congress—with the Executive regrettably getting rather the better of it—to the grave detriment of the American principle of three coordinate and independent branches of the Government, the Executive, the Congress, and the Judiciary. This phase of the session has received scant attention. Instead, public interest has been focussed on the bills dealing with the economic crisis. Nothing radical and nothing that goes deep into the causes of our troubles has been accomplished. True, certain relief bills have been passed and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been created to ladle out the people's millions to railroads, banks, and other corporations. But only $300,000,000 has gone to the so-called direct relief of the starving—and that is not direct at all but indirect, being appropriations to be given to States—not even cities—which are in turn to apportion them; the President announces that these loans are not to be resorted to "except as a last extremity," but he is sure that it will be enough to give us "a solid back log of assurance that there need be no hunger and cold in the United States." What humbug! Three hundred millions would last only a very few months if applied at once to the starving.

As for the other $1,800,000,000, that sum is to be loaned to the States, municipalities, and other public agencies for self-liquidating projects, to limited dividend corporations for housing and to finance agricultural exports with $136,000,000 for immediate building of roads and trails.

THAT THE GLASS BILL to inflate the currency by $1,000,000,000 passed in the last hours of the session as an amendment to the Home Loan Bank bill, which appropriates $300,000 for the organization of a system of eight to twelve government-supervised banks to finance individual home builders, is distinctly regrettable. As we have stated, we cannot see the slightest excuse for adopting this measure, for there has been no shortage whatever of currency as such. We believe that even the discussion of the bill has done harm. Senator Glass himself, in introducing the bill, stated that he did not think it was necessary at this time but that he offered it in order to head off a worse measure of inflation, the Goldsborough bill. Perhaps it will do no further harm if it is allowed to be a dead letter. While it went through, however, Congress unfortunately failed to act on the proposal of one of the few men who have shown statesmanlike qualities in this session, Congressman La Guardia, that Congress should not adjourn but recess until September 15, with semi-weekly meetings from then until November 21. Unfortunately this proposal was not brought before Congress for a vote. It is what the situation calls for; it is dangerous to adjourn Congress until December when we have a President in the White House whose heart is absolutely steeled to the suffering in the country, who appears determined that hundreds of thousands shall die of starvation before they get a dollar directly from the federal treasury. Never was there a time, in our judgment, when Congress so greatly needed the right to reconvene without being dependent upon the call of a hostile Executive.

WHERE WILL the increasingly grave unemployment crisis finally bring us? City after city continues to report that its relief funds are exhausted. The latest is St. Louis, the scene of a serious riot a few days ago. The responsible citizens of St. Louis recognize that something must be done to help the jobless, but no one seems to know where to turn for the necessary funds. At a meeting of public officials and prominent residents, Mayor Miller declared with grave emphasis that "an emergency exists. No more serious difficulty has ever confronted our city." Although it was told that the funds raised earlier in the year had been spent, the meeting adjourned without agreeing upon a definite plan for raising further funds. That task was left to a committee of business men. A few days later a crowd of 3,000 jobless men and women gathered before the city hall to beg for help. Apparently frightened by the desperate appearance of the demonstrators, the police opened fire. Four of the jobless were wounded, and in the rioting that followed six policemen were injured. But what else could one expect? The relief agencies which were feeding 25,000 families on July 1 have had to drop 13,000 since then.

The jobless must choose between starvation and picking up refuse among the dumps of the river front. Indeed, some fifty homeless families have moved down to the river front where they are now living in rude shacks. Many other American cities are in the same tragic predicament. Will some one please notify Herbert Hoover?

HOG PRICES HAVE BEEN RISING for months. Among some of our more optimistic observers this is taken as an almost certain sign of returning prosperity. In any case, as a New York Times dispatch from Chicago put it, the livestock boom "is causing the western farmer to smile again." We earnestly wish that this were true, that the farmer had reason to smile, and that the livestock boom was something more than a temporary phenomenon. Unhappily, the signs point another way. For one thing, the price of hogs has its economic basis in the price of corn; when one goes up the other is sure to follow. But for the last few months the price of corn has been falling. This suggests that some temporary, perhaps unhealthy, factor has entered the situation to inflate the price of hogs. Indeed, the Times disclosed the real cause in the same dispatch:

When prices were lowest early in the spring apparently no one wanted cattle, hogs, or sheep. Farmers were broke or so nearly so that they were almost panicky in trying to sell their livestock to pay rent, mortgages, and other expenses. It was said to be one of the best clean-outs the industry has known in years. [Italics ours].

In other words, the farms were virtually stripped of their marketable livestock. When they had nothing left to sell, the price of hogs quite naturally began to go up. But who has been profiting by this tremendous rise? Surely not the farmers who had to sell on a panic market. If anyone is in a position to profit, it must be the packers.

TWO DECISIONS almost revolutionary in import have recently been handed down by the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin. Under the first ruling the Wisconsin Telephone Company, serving 102 communities, has been ordered to reduce its rates 12½ per cent on the ground that the purchasing value of the dollar has increased more than one-third since the last schedule of rates was approved. This increase in the value of the dollar, according to the commission, enables the telephone company to buy its labor and materials, the cost of which fluctuates with changes in business conditions, much more cheaply than it could four years ago, while the subscriber, whose rates for telephone service are fixed, is today "paying very substantially more than he paid for the same service in 1928." Hitherto a "fair return" has been generally considered by regulatory bodies to be governed by static and unchanging factors, but the commission pointed to a ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States holding that a "fair return is a flexible concept," and that rates for utility services must be governed by current economic conditions. Furthermore, the decision suggested that by reducing its rates the telephone company will probably be enabled "to hold the business of that portion of its subscribers who can only afford telephone service if the cost is low." That the cost of telephone service in numerous sections of the country is today beyond the reach of many is indicated by the growing number of subscribers who are having their telephones removed.

THIS TELEPHONE DECISION, because it is a radical departure from the usual practice of State regulatory bodies and because of the possibility that other States may follow Wisconsin's example, has greatly disturbed the utility interests. But much more alarming to the power trust is the second ruling of the Wisconsin Commission. This calls upon seven major utility companies to suspend dividend payments on common stock pending an investigation. The commission said it would not permit the assets of subsidiary public utilities operating in Wisconsin to be drained off for the benefit of holding companies. It emphatically asserted that the customers of the local companies "have a vital interest in dividend payments, especially when capital is impaired or threatened with impairment." This decision is doubtless the greatest blow the power trust has ever received. Local electric, gas, telephone, and water companies have for years been milked by parent corporations and banks controlling or owning their capital stock. It was, indeed, to perfect this process that holding companies have lately been manipulated. State utility commissions have found it difficult to guard against abuses because the holding companies have invariably had their headquarters in other States where they could not legally be reached. If the Wisconsin Commission can now compel operating units to refuse dividend payments to the holding companies whenever such payments impair the capital structure of local companies, the whole intricate network of holding companies upon which the power trust rests will be endangered, for these companies have no other source of income.

AS THE DEPRESSION CONTINUES it becomes increasingly difficult to preserve domestic peace in Germany. More than seventy persons have been killed and several hundred injured in street fighting since June 16, on which date the Von Papen Government restored the National Socialist private army to good standing. On one day alone, Sunday, July 17, twenty deaths were reported. Carl Severing, the Socialist Minister of the Interior in Prussia, has issued strict orders to the police to withhold permits for meetings or parades unless sufficient police guards are available, and to state prosecutors to demand extreme penalties for persons found unlawfully bearing firearms. The Von Papen Cabinet and President Hindenburg have now acted to the extent of stopping all open-air meetings. It may be doubted that the Communists and Nazis will pay much attention to the commands of Minister Severing. The Nazis have become almost hysterical in demanding that the Socialists be driven out of Prussia, that the Communist Party be forthwith suppressed, by violent means if necessary, and that a state of siege or martial law be declared throughout Germany. These demands, daily repeated, have had an immeasurable effect upon the rank and file of the fascist party. From every section of the country come reports that gangs of young Nazis are terrorizing whole communities, destroying property, assaulting and even killing members of political parties other than their own. Former Chancellor Brüning, interviewed by Dorothy Thompson for the Saturday Evening Post, probably had this in mind when he said he could easily imagine a condition "where legitimate government becomes impossible, a condition in which people are delivered over to a sort of gang rule." Will that really be the fate of Germany?

A FINANCIAL DICTATORSHIP unprecedented in recent world history will be set up in Austria if the parliament in Vienna accepts the terms upon which the League of Nations is willing to lend Austria the sum of $42,000,000. Under the loan agreement Dr. Rost Van Touningen, a Dutch financier, would go to Vienna with authority to examine into and pass upon the financial operations not only of the government, but of the leading business houses and banks as well. For example, not even private citizens or companies would be allowed to borrow more than $140,000 abroad without his consent. Dispatches describing the agreement, which was drawn up at Lausanne, say that Dr. Van Touningen "would be the real ruler in Austria for the next few years. . . . He would have greater powers than were given to Dr. Alfred Zimmerman, appointed Commissioner-General of the League for Austria when the country obtained its first stabilization loan in 1922." Equally distressing for many Austrians are the political pledges attached to the agreement, which would make it virtually impossible for Austria to entertain any thought of political or economic fusion with Germany for the next twenty years, or until the loan was repaid. Harsh as it may appear, ■ financial dictatorship may prove the only means of preventing complete economic collapse in Austria.

WE RECORD WITH REGRET Professor Felix Frankfurter's decision not to accept the position on the Supreme Court of Massachusetts offered to him by Governor Ely. Unfortunately Governor Ely withheld his letter of declination for some two weeks, so that when it was finally announced it created in certain quarters the impression that the reactionary opposition to Professor Frankfurter's appointment had had something to do with his declination. That is, of course, not the case; if there is in the United States a dauntless fighter for what he believes to be just and right it is Felix Frankfurter. His reason is that in his judgment the most important thing in his profession today is the training of men for the Bar who shall have ■ proper concept of their professional duties as well as the best professional training. We agree that these things are of the utmost importance. But surely equally important is the immediate improvement of the Bench, and as we keenly feel, the appointment of Professor Frankfurter would have meant so much for the improvement of the Supreme Court that we are downcast by his refusal. We shall have to wait a long time before the men that he and his associates of the Harvard Law School are training for the Bar will reach the Bench. But everyone to his taste and, in this case, to his sense of public duty. We can well imagine that his colleagues of the Harvard Law School rejoice at his decision.

WE ARE NOT SURPRISED, if considerably aroused, by the action of the New York State Executive Council of the American Legion in suspending the Willard Straight Post of New York City. This post has been distinguished from its foundation by its liberalism, its anti-militarism, and its refusal to be actuated by a desire to get all possible money out of the government. On April 6 last it came out against the bonus in a telegram to the national commander, Henry L. Stevens, Jr., at Indianapolis, urging the discontinuance of "all attempts" by representatives of the Legion and by the "Washington lobby" of the organization "to coerce Congress." It was for this offense, which in the eyes of most right-thinking Americans would seem ■ most praiseworthy and patriotic action that the Willard Straight Post has been excommunicated. Its final status has been referred to the New York State Convention which opens in Brooklyn on August 25. How the post will fare is pretty well indicated by the fact that the New York County group of posts numbering some 11,000 members has just unanimously voted to demand the immediate payment of the bonus. It is true that the action was not taken without some violent protests, but the vote was clear enough, and the matter now goes before the state convention. If that body approves we see no reason at all why the 11,000 New York City legionnaires should not join the Bonus Army in Washington in demanding this dole. The New York legionnaires were not even interested in denouncing the proven mismanagement and waste in the care of the veterans, which is already mulcting the country $1,100,000,000 a year.

ONE GENUINE PUBLIC BENEFIT due to the depression is the suspension of Bernarr Macfadden's New York tabloid, the Daily Graphic—quite the most conscienceless, degraded, and reckless of all the papers in its class. If there was any offense of which a newspaper could be guilty which the Graphic did not commit, we should be glad to have it pointed out to us. Indeed, it is interesting to note that one of the reasons why it was not possible to find a purchaser was the existence of a considerable number of libel suits pending in the courts against this gutter journal. That the newspaper business is profoundly affected by the tremendous falling off in advertising everybody must be aware. Unfortunately this hits the just and the unjust alike, those journals that have ■ sense of public responsibility as well ■ those who have no other motive than selling their wares by appeal to the basest of passions. If current gossip in newspaper circles is correct, there will be a number of other failures if the crisis lasts eight or nine months longer. Let us hope, if this is true, that fate will be discriminating and pick out its victims with the excellent taste it has shown in the case of the Graphic.

WHATEVER MERE ACADEMICIANS may say, we are convinced that Miss Gertrude Stein is not actually loony. If she were, then she would have her lucid intervals and she could not put so many words together without having them occasionally say something according to the rules of grammar and the processes of logic. Consider for example her latest composition "Scenery and George Washington: A Novel or a Play." A crazy person might call six pages of prose "a novel." She might, on the other hand, call it "a play." But only a kind of genius in nonsense would think of giving us our choice, "a novel or a play." Or consider, if you still can, a specimen of the text. "All who will love to peal nuts and even not mean to leave any one or rather in the autumn seeing nuts lie will stoop and get them or else not may be said to be resembling to George Washington in respect to their birthday being in the month of February." That is a beautiful and that is being a beautiful is becoming a wow. But we would feel more comfortable if we knew one thing. Is "Scenery and George Washington" a patriotic tribute or is it another one of those nasty de-bunking essays? The D. A. R. will want to know.

The President "Warns" Europe

WITH the election clearly before him, the President has written to Senator Borah that while "our people are, of course, gratified at the settlement of the strictly European problem of reparations," he wishes to make it clear that the United States "has not been consulted regarding any of the agreements reported by the press," and is in no way "a party to nor in any way committed to any such agreements." So far, so good. But the President goes a good deal farther than that in these words:

While I do not assume it to be the purpose of any of these agreements to effect combined action of our debtors, if it shall be so interpreted, then I do not propose that the American people shall be pressed into any line of action or that our policies shall be in any way influenced by such a combination, either open or implied.

Now this thundering in the index may seem to some people statesmanship; to the benighted in Congress it may even pass as a vigorous assertion of American independence of our European debtors, and of our refusal to be taken into camp by any alliance against us. To our minds this denial by us to the European nations of the right to collective bargaining is both premature and childish. Usually statesmen wait for the accomplished fact before they state what their action will be in a given contingency, particularly as in this case conflicting reports from Europe have not made it clear just what is in the wind. Moreover, if the Allies were to agree among themselves to stand or fall together in their negotiations with the United States, they could put up a united front whether the actual negotiations were carried on individually or jointly. Why should there be all this furor about the possibility that two or more of our debtors may decide to come to us jointly to try to work out the debt problem? They have shown commendable zeal in meeting together at Lausanne and making the most extraordinary sacrifices in order to end the question of reparations.

Thereby, as Mr. Hoover declares in his letter to Senator Borah, they have conferred a boon upon the entire world which happens to include the United States. One would think that the government in Washington would similarly be glad to meet all our debtors face to face and have them state their joint interest and joint proposal in a situation which is admittedly a grave stumbling block to the restoration of economic sanity, and to work out at once a solution satisfactory to all concerned, instead of assuming that there is on foot a diabolical and hostile move to combine against us in order to obtain terms contrary to those which the politicians in Washington think we ought to have. Everybody is praising Europe for the other conferences that are coming—those on currency questions and on the general economic status of the world—and for the life of us we cannot see what right we have to say to our debtors that they shall not agree on a common course of action before entering into new debt negotiations with us. We are very much afraid that a dispatch from Washington, which reports the Administration to be highly satisfied that the President's letter "has removed this issue from the campaign," is the real explanation for Mr. Hoover's precipitate action.

Now we do not deny that the Allies have handled their case badly; that the so-called gentlemen's agreement, which appears to have found its way into print by accident, has been unfortunately worded and unfortunately described in advance, and that the conflicting British and French explanations of what it is all about have given an unfavorable impression. It is highly regrettable, indeed, that when so great a success was arrived at at Lausanne it should have been marred by this complication, especially because of the effect upon Germany. We had hoped that the psychological result in that sorely tried country would have been such as notably to raise the morale of the whole people, restore faith, confidence, and hope to them, and mark the beginning of their retracing the road to prosperity. Instead of which Germany is cast down by the impression that the whole settlement is not definite and final, but contingent upon the Allies obtaining satisfactory terms from the United States. That undoubtedly was the hope of the negotiators with Germany. But the German public ought to realize that whatever the real meaning of the gentlemen's agreement, and however mistaken the making of it was, reparations are dead. There will be no more. This blundering may cause a delay, possibly even a reconsideration. That will make no eventual difference. The greatest stumbling block to the psychological restoration of Europe has been removed once for all.

With Walter Lippmann we cannot understand why anybody should wish to have the rivalry between Paris and London continue, or why the restoration of Franco-British understanding, in place of hostility, suspicion, and intrigue, should be else than acclaimed. As for their offering joint terms in connection with the other Allies, we cannot see why the sum total of what they will offer will differ a whit whether they come forward individually or jointly. The United States, we repeat for the thousandth time, is not going to receive the debts owed. As we pointed out last week, the continuance of the depression of which these debts are a contributory cause, is costing us just one hundred times the $270,000,000 which we are supposed to get annually from our debtors. Undoubtedly, giving up this sum of money will be hard in our present distress. But what has it not meant to England and to France to relinquish all hope of ever recovering anything more than $750,000,000 from Germany? Any settlement that they may offer will be cheap at the price if it helps to revive our lost world trade.

To this it will come sooner or later, whatever the mistakes of the Allied statesmen and whatever the ranting in our Congress. No making faces at Europe, no hasty, ungrammatical Presidential letters, will alter the obvious fact that, as things stand today, the Allies cannot continue to pay, especially in the face of our outrageous tariffs. Washington can then do what it pleases. It may denounce our debtors as welchers, as dishonest. But this will not alter the fact that, whether through cooperation or through individual action, the Allies will, jointly or severally, take the same position, that they cannot go on with payments especially in view of the Lausanne settlement. So why all this alarum and outcry in Washington?

Labor Racketeers

WE heartily welcome the recent pronouncement of President William Green of the American Federation of Labor on behalf of the Executive Council of the Federation, when he pledged the organization to purge itself of racketeering and to maintain "our voluntary labor movement on an honest basis." The Federation, he declared, will have no mercy upon the racketeering leeches. It was surely time that the Federation gave evidence of its determination to stamp out an evil which threatens the very existence of its movement. Graft and racketeering are by no means confined to the labor movement, of course; they spring out of conditions in our national life for which the labor movement has no special responsibility. It is safe to assert that no union business agent ever amassed any great amount of wealth from his corrupt activities unless he was in league with a contractors' association, for example, or a corrupt political machine whose henchmen were making a much bigger pile than he. Usually when these cases have come into court, however, some union grafter like Brindell of New York in an earlier day is convicted, while the contractors or politicians go scot free. Nor should it be forgotten, in these days when evils that have fastened themselves on the labor movement are being exposed, that there are many unions in this country which, however conservative they may be, are honestly conducted. And some of the "unions" held up as examples of racketeering, never were unions in any proper sense at all, but were from the outset "rackets" deliberately built up by such persons as Al Capone to put legitimate unions out of business or to prevent their establishment.

Nevertheless, corruption and graft have been permitted to flourish in many organizations within the A. F. of L. as well as in some unions independent of the A. F. of L. A typical case is that of Theodore M. Brandle, Czar Brandle of the New Jersey Building Trades, as he is called, whose activities are exposed in a searching and comprehensive study by Louis Francis Budenz, executive secretary of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action, published in a recent issue of Labor Age. Brandle figured in the public prints recently when he pleaded guilty to income tax frauds before Federal Judge Avis and with one or two associates was assessed penalties and fines amounting to $96,221. Brandle holds many important union positions. He is business agent of the powerful Local 45, Jersey City, of the International Association of Bridge, Structural, and Ornamental Iron Workers; president of the Hudson County Building Trades Council; president of the Building Trades Council of New Jersey; and vice-president of this international union. In 1928 and 1929 he actually became director-general of the New Jersey Iron League, the organization of the employers dealing with his own iron workers' union. The League made him presents of $10,000 in December of each of these years, "in the Christmas spirit" as he testified.

Recent months have witnessed revolts against such labor leadership in a surprising number of unions, including Brandle's own, the Sheet Metal Workers, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (notably in Local 3 in New York City), the Motion Picture Operators (the Kaplan case), and others. Collapse of racketeering in A. F. of L. unions may yet be one of the blessings in disguise which the Hoover depression will bring in its train. For undoubtedly the economic situation does have an important bearing on these developments. On the one hand, trade union members who were not disposed to be too critical of corrupt leadership when they were also "getting theirs" in the form of high wages and steady work, are not so tolerant when the business agent is no longer able "to produce the goods." Thus the more idealistic elements can now often count on the support, active or passive, of the general membership of the union. On the other hand, employers who in more prosperous days could pass on to the consumer the costs of racketeering on their own part and that of certain labor leaders, now find themselves unable to do this.

We hope, nevertheless, that the attack will be sustained and that a thorough job will be made of it. We note with satisfaction that several investigations have been initiated by the A. F. of L. President Green must not make the mistake so often made by reformers, of making scapegoats in dramatic fashion in a fit of righteous zeal of one or two individuals and then letting up while the system is still untouched. The present is furthermore a good time for the leadership of the A. F. of L. to ponder whether racketeering is not a logical, though unintended, outcome of their own labor philosophy. Their philosophy has been that of "pure and simple trade unionism." A labor political party, workers' cooperative enterprises, distinctly labor cultural institutions, they have felt are not needed, are, in fact, detrimental. The union exists to create a job monopoly, to get wages, hours, and conditions for a particular group of workers organized along craft lines and is mostly unconcerned about what happens to the fellow-workers in other crafts. It does not set itself any large and fundamental task of social reconstruction. Is not the descent from such narrow unionism to open and avowed racketeering altogether too easy?

An Appeal to Liberia

DURING the next few weeks the government of Liberia must decide whether or not to accept a reconstruction plan prepared by a League of Nations committee. Under this plan Liberia is asked to appoint eleven foreigners, recommended either by the League or by the United States, to administer native affairs, finance, and sanitation. Although these foreigners will be technically Liberian officials, the League of Nations is to be represented by a chief adviser. When the Liberian Government is unable to follow the advice of this official, the dispute is to be referred to the League Council. If no agreement can be reached the plan will lapse; otherwise it will be enforced for five years. The League committee has also proposed a moratorium on the Firestone loan of 1926 and a reduction in the extent of the great Firestone rubber concession of a million acres.

This plan for reconstruction is the outcome of the shocking revelations as to slavery and forced labor made by the Christy report in January, 1931. Subject to pressure from the United States and other governments following that report, Liberia asked the League for technical assistance in carrying out the social, sanitary, and financial reorganization of the country. Now, at the end of a year-and-a-half's labor at Geneva, the Liberian Government hesitates to accept the League proposals. We can well understand the natural reluctance of the Barclay Government—much more nationalist than the King regime which was under the thumb of Washington—to entrust administrative responsibilities to foreigners. Nevertheless, The Nation, which has always been a warm friend of the Negro race and which believes firmly in independence for Liberia, would respectfully urge President Barclay to accept the League plan. If Liberia does not do so, the alternative, we are afraid, is intervention by the State Department. Last May the Department protested that the League plan did not go far enough—that what Liberia needed was a white dictator. In a note of May 18 the Department reserved complete freedom of action in case the League negotiations failed. We have no doubt that, if certain officials have their way, the State Department would welcome an opportunity to initiate an intervention in Liberia similar to that which it has carried out in Haiti. It would base such an intervention on the historic relation of the United States to Liberia, the humanitarian necessity of preventing the hinterland natives from being exploited, and the need for protecting the Firestone investments. Unlike the League plan which would genuinely develop Liberian independence, an American intervention, imposed by brute force and placed in the hands of incompetent officials, would destroy the existing government structure in Liberia so as to make future independence impossible.

No more damning indictment of American imperialism will be found than in the report of the Brunot committee of experts sent by the League to Liberia in the summer of 1931. This report declared that "the distressing thing" is that, as a result of the "deplorable" recommendations of the American financial adviser, the proceeds of the 1926 Firestone loan earmarked for public works were "squandered." Instead of putting this money into needed roads, our representatives advised the construction of a worthless power plant, an unnecessary wireless station, and certain presidential pavilions. In 1926, our optimistic State Department declared that the Firestone loan and rubber undertaking would bring "prosperity" to Liberia. Today, the charges imposed by the Firestone contract absorb more than 50 per cent of the revenues, the government is in default, salaries are unpaid, and the country is in chaos. For these conditions the Liberian governing class is partly responsible; but the policy of the United States is also to blame.

In view of past experiences, the Liberians should realize that a new intervention by the United States in their affairs will spell further disaster. The Nation will oppose to the utmost the unilateral intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Liberia or any other country. There is, however, only one sure means by which Liberia can remove the danger of American intervention; that is by accepting in a spirit of good-will the League reconstruction program. A few years ago Austria and Hungary voluntarily accepted this type of assistance for a transitional period. We earnestly hope that Liberia will feel able to do so. Unless it accepts the League plan, there is grave danger that this republic, which should stand as a symbol to the Negro race everywhere, will disappear from the earth.

Food for a Penny

MR. Bernarr Macfadden is a man of varied interests. He is ex-proprietor of the late lamented Graphic, passionate advocate of physical culture, and publisher of a whole string of magazines which range from one devoted to exploiting the moral lessons deducible from the more picturesque forms of misconduct to another which advocates the physical benefits of raw vegetables. Yet Mr. Macfadden is sometimes treated by cynics with scant respect. Even The Nation was not inclined to consider his newspaper in the best traditions of American journalism, and Ballyhoo recently printed a mock advertisement picturing a robust torso which might possibly have been his and carrying below it the following legend which seemed to glance in many directions: "What a fool he is! Proud of his muscles, careless of his magazines! He has pink tabloids."

For the latest of his enterprises, a Penny Restaurant, we do not, however, see how anybody can have anything but admiration. Occupying two hastily remodeled floors in a building on Forty-third Street just east of Broadway in New York, it looks very much like any other cafeteria, but the prices are calculated to put new hope into those who may have a few cents or who may, at least, find it easier to get some such modest sum than to stand for hours in a bread line without receiving much for their pains. What is more, Mr. Macfadden maintains that with 7,000 patrons a day his "Foundation" can break even. And we see no reason why he should not attract an even larger clientele.

Outside is a Negro barker urging the curious to enter and when we visited the establishment during an off hour we found it well patronized. There is an upstairs room reserved for ladies into which we did not penetrate, but we noticed that the company in the main dining room was not composed exclusively of obvious down-and-outers. There was also, for instance, a letter carrier and several others who looked as though they were in a position to appreciate good values without being exactly destitute. Nor is the Penny sign a mere bait. Various kinds of soup, cod fish, hominy, beans, prunes, and bread are actually one cent each. Milk, apricots, and figs are two cents; meat-cakes, two for five. And for those who prefer to dine table d'hôte there is, for ten cents, a dinner consisting of soup, cod fish, meat balls, cabbage salad, bread and butter, prunes, and black coffee.

The price of only one item on the menu is likely to cause a different kind of surprise. Coffee, with milk and sugar, is three cents, but there is a reason for that. Mr. Macfadden does not approve of coffee. It is not a "vital food." Indeed, he is reported to have refused in the beginning to serve it at all and to have yielded only after a struggle to the suggestion that if people insisted upon having their poison he should provide it rather than tempt them to go elsewhere. We can only wish that someone in each of the other large cities would establish a similar institution. Detroit, the unhappy, is fortunate in also having a Penny Restaurant. The poor are used to having to accept anything from 100 per cent Americanism to a new religion as the price of a meal, and some of them would doubtless rather go without even coffee than have to be converted again.

The Bonus Army Scares Mr. Hoover

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Washington, July 17

WHEN Congress adjourned last midnight without having yielded to the demands of the more than 18,000 bonus-seekers assembled here many rumors that the veterans would resort to direct action were spread through the city. Earlier in the day the veterans had for a brief moment been in an ugly mood, and this led to the belief that they would get out of control as soon as they realized that Congress had quit without helping them. But apparently only the White House took these rumors seriously. Members of the House and Senate showed not the slightest concern as they left the capitol. Almost all the veterans had peacefully retired to their camps long before midnight. Only a handful remained to act upon the suggestion that the veterans transfer their picketing activities to the White House.

Hardly more than fifty of the veterans started for the White House, but the moment their approach was reported President Hoover issued orders to the police to close the gates of the grounds and to clear Pennsylvania Avenue and adjacent streets of all pedestrian and vehicular traffic. More than four hundred policemen were summoned to surround the Executive Mansion, all available police reserves were called to stations nearby, and officers who had just been relieved from duty were commanded to return to their posts. The demonstrators were quickly dispersed, three of their leaders being arrested. According to Inspector O. T. Davis of the metropolitan force, President Hoover had said that if the police could not clear the streets within a few minutes he would call out regular army troops. It would have been a rare spectacle indeed to see troops patrolling Pennsylvania Avenue to protect the life of the President of the United States against a possible attack by a handful of weary, footsore, and bedraggled war veterans. Perhaps there was some danger of minor disorders in front of the White House, but in my judgment there was not the slightest possibility of any really serious trouble developing, for there is in these bonus-seekers no revolt, no fire, not even smoldering resentment; at most they are but an inchoate aggregation of frustrated men nursing a common grievance. However, the anxiety of the White House accurately reflected the increasing alarm with which high officials of the government have been viewing the presence of the bonus army—a feeling, it must be added, that a vast majority of the residents of Washington do not share.

For several days I have watched the veterans go about their business of petitioning Congress for an additional payment on their adjusted compensation certificates. A few days ago the Communist group marched peacefully, even meekly, down Pennsylvania Avenue toward the capitol. For several days the California contingent, including five to six hundred men, has been picketing the capitol building—their endless marching ceased only when Congress adjourned without having submitted to their silent demands. On Saturday a column of about a thousand veterans sought to break through a police line on the capitol plaza, but were quickly pacified by the officers on hand and by the persuasive tongue of Brigadier-General Pelham D. Glassford, superintendent of police. However, the veterans somehow felt that their last opportunity to frighten Congress into approving the bonus was rapidly slipping from them, and they remained in an angry mood for a few minutes. But further oratory from Glassford and from the self-appointed leaders of the Bonus Expeditionary Forces quickly changed the attitude of the veterans and converted the atmosphere of protest into that of a college football rally. So superficial, one might say, is their apparent revolt. Out in their camps they show even less spirit. Squalid, miserable, and unhealthful as these camps certainly are, life there offers more security and comforts than many of these men have known for months.

Somehow many of the veterans have come to the conclusion that their chances of wheedling a few hundred dollars per man out of the government are virtually non-existent. Their enthusiasm for the bonus, though it is still whipped into life upon occasion by their leaders, has at bottom all but disappeared. These veterans appear to sense the inadequacy of their demands both actually and in principle. A few hundred dollars will not in any case go very far. Moreover, the veterans seem to know by instinct rather than by any process of ratiocination, that there is no promise of future economic security in the bonus. They feel that the goal they are seeking is a false one, but in their confusion of mind they can think of no other goal. Lastly, the veterans are all in or beyond middle age; every one of them has been thoroughly whipped by his individual economic circumstances. There is about the lot of them an atmosphere of hopelessness, of utter despair, though not of desperation. They have come to Washington for reasons beyond their understanding; they have no enthusiasms whatever, and no stomach for fighting. People who see in the bonus army the beginning of a fascist movement or the nucleus for a successful fascist "march on Washington" are in error. Such a movement may develop among the younger unemployed, but it will not, I am certain, start with the bonus army.

This is not to belittle the social significance of the bonus army, for its implications are vast and far-reaching. There is throughout the country a stirring among the unemployed such as we have not witnessed before, certainly not in the present period of depression. Individuals and families by the thousands have taken to migrating from community to community, not necessarily to seek greener pastures, better economic opportunities, but to escape from the misery and suffering at home. They are at last reaching the point where they can no longer endure the hardships of unemployment and haphazard charity. Only a few weeks ago I saw them by the scores walking singly or in groups along the highways of Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan. Many were carrying the last of their worldly possessions in old suitcases or tied up in bundles. Those I stopped and talked with said they did not know where they were going, they wanted only to get away from home. It was inevitable, although essentially accidental, that the men among them who feel that they have a claim against the government for their services should concentrate upon Washington. Thus the bonus march must be considered simply a minor manifestation of the unrest spreading through the country.

If conditions at home forced this mass movement of veterans upon Washington, other circumstances here are further developing the social transmutation. The veterans believe that only by appearing as loyal and sincere patriots can they persuade the government to pay them their bonuses. Hence they have endeavored in every way possible to demonstrate their firm faith in American institutions. They raucously proclaim, or their leaders for them, that they are unyielding supporters of law and order, that they are satisfied with the existing economic and political system; and they publicly demonstrate their devotion to the flag upon every conceivable occasion. But this blatant display of patriotism has got them, and is getting them, nowhere. Indeed, neither Congress nor the police seem at all impressed by their flag-waving. In the short-lived demonstrations before the White House a veteran carrying the Stars and Stripes was knocked to the sidewalk by one policeman while three others wrested the flag from his determined grasp, and the veteran, for all his loyalty, was carted away to a cell. If patriotism will not help them, what will?

In only a few places in the United States can be found human habitations as mean and uninviting as the bonus camps. The exceptions are the "Hoovervilles" which have sprung up on the river fronts of some of our cities, communities of homeless families which have erected shelters out of packing boxes and old tin cans. Here in the bonus camps every conceivable kind of building material has been pressed into service—discarded bricks, oil tins, lumber salvaged from buildings that are being wrecked to make room for new and palatial government offices, strips of canvas and even of clothing. A few of the veterans have tents or sections of tents in which to live; others sleep under wall-less, wooden shelters, or under the open skies, on the lawns of the Congressional Library or the capitol. One group has occupied several abandoned buildings near the Naval Hospital and not far from the White House; other contingents have taken over half-wrecked buildings on lower Pennsylvania Avenue near the capitol. Since they have no permanent water supply, cleanliness is hardly to be thought of, and in general the sanitary conditions are unspeakable. Nevertheless, each unit of the bonus army has attempted to enforce some sort of order and discipline; most of the camps and living quarters are fairly well "policed"; at Camp Marks regular military latrines have been dug. Thus otherwise impossible living conditions have been made more bearable.

The lack of food presents the most difficult problem. The larger group at Anacostia, comprising probably 15,000 men, has been fed with some regularity, though the leaders of the camp usually do not know from one meal to the next where the necessary food is to be obtained. Organized pan-handling on an extensive scale has helped a great deal in this respect. Several wealthy women residing in Washington have been prevailed upon to donate funds for the purchase of food. Some small merchants have voluntarily contributed provisions. Other donations both of food and of money have been received from other cities. The fare is none too appealing and not always sufficient, but these men until now at least have been getting something to eat. But there has been real hunger among some of the smaller groups, particularly among the Californians, who have been sleeping on the capitol lawns, and the Communists, who are quartered on New York Avenue near the White House. These latter groups have literally been living from hand to mouth. Last Friday noon, for example, Roy Robertson, leader of the California unit, had only $5 on which to feed his five to six hundred followers.

Female camp-followers, though still few in number, have been active. Twenty-five to thirty of them may be seen entering the camps after dusk every night. How many more may slip in unobserved it is not possible to say. These women must give themselves without charge, for very few of the veterans have any ready cash. The women are of the lowest sort, and there can be little question that thus far only the lack of proper medical inspection has concealed the spread of venereal disease. There is only one medical station in any of the bonus settlements, that at Camp Marks, and even there no provision has been made for prophylactic treatment. But these things must not be mentioned publicly in Washington.

Who are the bonus-seekers and where have they come from? They are mostly farm workers, fruit pickers, itinerant factory workers, and other unskilled or semi-skilled laborers, and they come from every section of the country. I do not believe that a single State or a single industry is unrepresented here. However, a large minority of the men are skilled mechanics, white-collar workers, and even professional people. I have met an office manager, a factory foreman, two real estate dealers, a dentist, and three newspapermen in the bonus army. These men I encountered only by chance. I was shown the rosters of some of the camps and there were the names of many other representatives of the middle class, an editor, a grocer, a trucking contractor, a traffic engineer, several lawyers. It is these people who have taken charge of the Washington show and who have given the bonus army what discipline it has. Thus the movement is essentially bourgeois and not proletarian, at least in outward form. This explains in large measure the patriotism and flag-waving of the bonus-seekers. These middle-class representatives have become the leaders of the movement, and in that capacity, although they have been most outspoken in their profession of loyalty to American institutions, they have had their past records painstakingly investigated by the Department of Justice and other government agencies. Such seems to be the inevitable fate of all rebels in this country, however mild or law-abiding they may be. Nevertheless, these leaders have had a profound effect upon the rank and file of the army. Uninspiring as the man is, Walter W. Walters, commander-in-chief of the B. E. F., has a large and devoted following among the Anacostia men. During the demonstration on the capitol plaza Saturday, although he talked the most hollow nonsense, the veterans greeted him with tremendous applause, cheered his every word as though he alone had the power to bring them the bonus. Roy Robertson in another way demonstrated the influence he has over his several hundred followers. He was able from the time that he arrived a week ago until Congress adjourned on Saturday to keep his men constantly marching around the capitol plaza. They could at any time have deserted his "death watch," for he had no way of disciplining them, but they elected to remain faithful to this man with a broken neck and persuasive personality. Yet Robertson frankly admitted to me that he had no plan, no program, no philosophy whatever; he was simply bent upon keeping his picket-line going until Congress had quit.

These middle-class leaders have been seeking to mold opinion also through publication of a well-edited and ably written weekly newspaper calling itself the B. E. F. News. The bonus question, of course, receives the most attention, and from the standpoint of propaganda the question is very cleverly discussed. Along with this discussion, there is editorial criticism of Mr. Hoover, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and Wall Street; all are blamed, in the order named, for the failure of the bonus drive. Moderate in tone at the start, the News has lately become more violent in its language. For example, in the most recent issue was published an editorial entitled Are You Curs and Cowards? This article, indeed, comes very close to calling for direct action. "Where," it asks, "is this American manhood we boast about? A dog in the gutter will fight to feed its pups. Yet millions of Americans are standing idly on street corners, or slinking up back alleys, afraid to demand what God intended them to have. . . . For three years you have been worse than the serfs and slaves of old. For three years you have cringed and fawned and begged for crumbs. And all the time you had the power within yourselves, if you only had the intelligence and courage. . . . Why stand you thus, when all is within your power? Are you truly curs and cowards? Or are you men?"

The News sells for five cents a copy, and there are very few veterans here who can spare that much money. But the residents of Washington, particularly the government employees, must be reading the paper and its Curs and Cowards editorials. More than 75,000 copies of a recent number were sold on the street corners of the city.

There is no doubt that Washington officialdom from Mr. Hoover down is badly frightened by the presence of these former soldiers. The President revealed his feelings last midnight. Vice-President Curtis earlier in the week called for a company of sixty marines to guard the Senate. They were dispatched to the capitol only to be ordered back to their barracks as soon as General Glassford, the chief of police, learned of their arrival. A few weeks ago the District of Columbia commissioners sought to maneuver Glassford into the position of having to oust the veterans from the city and to assume responsibility for that action, but the orders were withdrawn when Glassford demanded that the orders be given him in writing. More recently the Capitol Police Board publicly charged that the pickets on the capitol plaza were violating the law and suggested that it was Glassford's duty to prevent such law-breaking. The officials have tried in many ways to rid the city of these "Bums of 1932," as they call themselves. They have pleaded with them, argued with them, and threatened them; jobs have been promised to a few of the leaders and "free" transportation has been offered to the entire army by act of Congress, the fare to be repaid by the veterans out of future bonus payments. But all to no avail. General Glassford quickly gave up his initial attempts to persuade the men to leave, and has since been giving virtually all his time to the men and their needs. Though not a wealthy man, he has donated several hundred dollars toward feeding the army.

But while most of the higher officials are obviously frightened, the government employees, who make up the bulk of Washington's population, are frankly in sympathy with the veterans. The reason for this is not readily apparent. It may be that the relatively lower standard of living obtaining among the government clerks has given them some understanding of the anxiety attending unemployment and loss of income. It may be that the residents of Washington, hearing every day as they do of new monster "relief" projects running into the billions of dollars for the benefit of the banks and the railroads, feel that an injustice is being done the veterans. Or it may be that their attitude is simply a natural expression of sympathy for people of their own kind and class. This sympathy reveals itself in many ways, in the comments one hears in government offices and among spectators at the various parades and demonstrations of the veterans, in letters to the daily press and to the B. E. F. News, in the numerous small donations of food and money received at the bonus camps from Washington residents. The other day about 150 of the veterans marched down Pennsylvania Avenue. A few of the marchers were shouting: "Congress must not adjourn!" A clerk in a clothing store stepped out to view the parade. He heard the shouts and in a sneering voice called out: "Oh, the damn fools; they think they can stop Congress from quitting." He retired very hurriedly under the barrage of biting comments from the crowd along the curb. The ordinary people of Washington may not be able to help the veterans, but they are ready to defend their cause.

Despite rumors floating about town that the Hoover Administration intends to oust the bonus-seekers, by force if need be, now that Congress has adjourned, I very much doubt that this will be attempted. A major part of the Republican Presidential campaign was to be based on the myth that under Mr. Hoover's able guidance the country has been free from violent disturbances and that the constituted authorities have not needed to call out troops to keep the unemployed loyal and obedient. This line of attack has been seriously compromised by Vice-President Curtis's error in calling out the marines and by Mr. Hoover's panic-stricken demand for police protection. If bayonets were now to be used against jobless men, even ex-service men bearing petitions, the political result would certainly be disastrous for Mr. Hoover. Nevertheless, the rumors persist, and upon high authority in the War Department it is said that the army, "though not looking for trouble, is ready for this or any other emergency."

It may be that the bonus forces will disintegrate of their own accord. The Washington summer months are long and hot; the Anacostia flats are notorious for their mosquitos, and the high cost of feeding such a large group of men may ultimately make it impossible for the residents of the city to continue to carry that burden. On the other hand, a majority of the men have no homes to which to return, and if they had there would be no assurance that they would be better off there than here. In all likelihood a large number of them will remain on through the summer, starving if necessary, yet clinging hopefully to the belief that in Washington, capital of the nation and source of munificent relief for the banks and railroads, they will find the help they need. But whatever happens this summer, there is every reason to believe that the veterans and other unemployed will be here in greatly increased numbers before Congress reconvenes in December.

The Ottawa Conference and World Trade

By ROBERT A. MACKAY

Ottawa, July 19

THE hopes of the British Empire are centered this month on Ottawa. The Imperial Conference summoned to meet here on July 21 is the goal toward which empire "free traders" have looked for generations. It is no less the means whereby empire governments hope to revive the flow of trade and business men to enlarge their markets, and farmers and other producers of primary products hope to raise disastrous price levels. Nor is Ottawa without interest to the non-British world. If trade is revived within the empire, or if it is diverted from present channels by removing internal tariff barriers or erecting new barriers against the outside world, the consequences of Ottawa may be far-reaching.

Hitherto trade within the empire has been shackled by the conflicting tariff policies of Great Britain and the dominions, the dominions being as devoted to protection as Great Britain formerly to free trade. While slight breaches in favor of British products have been made in dominion tariff walls by means of preferential tariffs the net increase in empire trade has not been very great. Until this year Great Britain has been unable to aid dominion trade by tariffs, except in a few minor cases under the "safeguarding" policies initiated after the war to protect certain new industries such as the motor trades. On the two earlier occasions when the Conservative Party attempted to introduce tariffs and preferences for empire products, that is in 1905 and 1923, the electorate drove the party from office. The issue was revived dramatically by Mr. Bennett, Canadian Prime Minister, at the Imperial Conference of 1930 when he bluntly demanded preference for preference from the British Government. Though his offer was unacceptable to a Labor Government elected on a free-trade platform it stirred English politics to their foundations. The financial crisis of last summer which drove Labor from office and brought into power a government predominantly protectionist has induced Great Britain to pick up the gage thrown down by Mr. Bennett. The new government as everyone knows has committed Great Britain to protection. The new tariff act exempts empire products until next November, that is until after the Ottawa Conference. For the first time, therefore, a British Government comes to the conference table ready to do business with the dominions on the basis of preferential tariffs. Whether a bargain can be struck is the question which the various governments are asking themselves as they gather at Ottawa.

Even enthusiasts in the cause of empire trade are compelled to admit that there are unpleasant obstacles still in the way. First and foremost is the tremendous stake which the empire as a whole has in trade with the outside world. This is especially true of Great Britain which in the years 1929 to 1931 sold on the average more than 55 per cent of her exports outside the empire. Its special interests in two areas are worth noting. With the Argentine it does more than 5 per cent of its total external trade. British investments there are reputed to run from five to six-hundred million pounds, which is at least 10 per cent more than those investments in Canada. Over half the ships that enter Argentine ports are British ships, and British capital controls Argentine railway and water transportation. Combined with these material foundations for an expanding market Britain possesses the good-will of the Argentine people as perhaps no other nation does. With the exception of the Irish Free State no self-governing dominion is as vital to British foreign trade as is the Argentine but scarcely less important is the Scandinavian bloc. With the three countries, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, Great Britain does more than 7½ per cent of her total external trade. Though its investments in these countries are not great, their proximity as a source of supply, their comparative prosperity, and their growing importance as a market for manufactures make them a vital factor in the recovery of British foreign trade. Nor can it be overlooked that the products of both the Argentine and the Scandinavian group compete in British markets with dominion products, particularly wheat and meats from the Argentine, and wood products and butter, eggs, and bacon, from Scandinavia.

Canada, no less than Great Britain, is dependent on foreign markets and sources of supply. In 1931, for example, more than 63 per cent of Canadian exports went outside the empire, and despite the American tariff wall, more than 42 per cent to the United States. Moreover about half of Canada's trade outside the empire is with the United States. No other empire country, indeed, is so economically dependent on a single foreign country as is Canada, though all the dominions are vitally concerned with holding and extending existing foreign markets.

Under these conditions any attempt to confine empire trade to empire channels is out of the question. It is equally clear that any policy which would impair foreign markets though it held out the promise of an alternative market within the empire would be highly dangerous. It would be merely swapping horses in midstream during the present depression. Since the economic interests of the various units of the empire differ greatly it is scarcely possible to fit all to a single fiscal pattern. As things stand today an imperial Zollverein is quite impossible and it is little likely to receive any consideration at Ottawa. At the most, all that can be hoped for at Ottawa is a series of agreements to fit the different needs of the different member states of the empire. In view of the vital interests of certain members, especially Great Britain, in foreign trade, it is scarcely likely that such agreements will be completely exclusive. Great Britain at any rate has intimated that it hopes to make Ottawa merely the starting-point for a wider series of tariff agreements, and if so it is scarcely likely to enter into any agreements which would completely exclude foreign nations as long as bargains are possible.

A second stumbling-block to success at Ottawa is the clash between the market interests of Great Britain and the economic policies of the dominions. Apart from coal, the products for which Great Britain seeks a market are manufactured articles. On the other hand, the dominions, and especially Canada and Australia, are committed to building up their secondary industries by means of tariffs. In the past they have been reluctant to open their markets by means of preferences to goods which would compete with home manufactures. "Canada first," "Australia first," "South Africa first," and now "Ireland first," indicate the dominant note in tariff-making and there is little evidence that any of the dominions has suffered a change of heart. Preferential tariffs under these circumstances are often of little value to manufacturers. To Mr. Bennett's offer at London in 1930 to raise tariffs 10 per cent higher against the outside world, Mr. Thomas aptly replied "Humbug!" So high were Canadian tariffs that the 10 per cent difference in the case of non-empire goods made little difference to the British manufacturer. The difficulty has been further illustrated within the past few weeks by the complete failure of a conference between British and Canadian cotton manufacturers called to agree upon a policy to be laid before the Imperial Conference. The British representatives reported back to the British Government that the demands of the Canadian manufacturers made the entrance of British goods into Canada virtually impossible, to which the Canadian delegates retorted that the British manufacturers were trying to dictate Canadian tariff policies and that any lowering of the Canadian tariff would ruin the Canadian industry. And there are many manufacturers on both sides of the Atlantic who think likewise.

As for the dominions, though they are becoming increasingly industrialized, their chief aim at Ottawa is to obtain sheltered markets in Great Britain for their primary products. Of these wheat and wool bulk largest, and wheat especially is likely to come in for a great deal of attention at Ottawa. Yet the promise of better prices in a sheltered British market for these products is largely an illusion. In both cases, the quantity produced in the dominions is much greater than the needs of the empire and the surplus would have to go at world prices. Moreover, unless the dominion producers were able to hold back their offerings on British markets, the very pressure of quantity would drive prices down to the level of world prices. Other methods are being investigated, notably bulk purchases by the British Government and compulsory quotas of empire products for British millers and woolen manufacturers, but the advantages of either seem highly questionable.

There remains a large number of products of which the empire produces less than its needs, as for example: soft woods; such agricultural products as bacon, butter, eggs, fruits, cotton, tea, coffee, and cocoa; and such non-ferrous metals as copper. It is in such products that preferences are likely to be forthcoming, if at all, from Great Britain. Yet Great Britain must ever keep in mind its foreign trade. It must beware of antagonizing foreign customers or making it difficult for them to sell its goods, or of erecting tariff barriers which would drive up manufacturers' costs. Preferences even in these commodities are likely to be extended only with caution and the net effect on dominion trade may not be very great.

Next to tariffs, currency questions promise to occupy the attention of Ottawa. There has been much talk of creating an empire currency bloc with a view to encouraging trade. Indeed the Canadian Government is committed to initiating discussions on the matter. Proposals are numerous. Silver has its votaries even in political circles on both sides of the Atlantic, but it is doubtful if it has many supporters or will gain a serious hearing. Other schemes propose a single bank of issue for the empire or a central bank to serve as a clearing house or even to control credit throughout the empire as the Federal Reserve Bank is supposed to do for the United States. The obvious location for such a bank would be London. Yet such schemes overlook the patent fact that certain of the dominions at least are in no mood to surrender financial autonomy any more than they are political autonomy.

Other schemes propose that the dominions should tie their respective currencies to the pound sterling. But the problem is by no means simple. Not the least difficulty is the present wide variation in the value of empire currencies. The Canadian dollar is above sterling in relation to the American dollar and of course in relation to gold; the Australian pound is far below. South Africa is still on gold. Only the Free State's currency has followed closely the ups and downs of the pound sterling. Moreover, none of the empire governments which are now off gold have quite made up their minds what to do about it, whether to remain off indefinitely, or whether to stabilize on the gold standard and if so at what rate. Canada, moreover, is particularly interested in the case of any change because of its heavy borrowings at New York and its extensive commercial relations with the United States. Canada might desert the dollar at its peril.

The prospects of success at Ottawa are not great, but it would be a mistake to think they are negligible. Great Britain, it must be remembered, has taken the plunge for protection and is undoubtedly prepared to grant preferences to the dominions, in a considerable variety of minor products at least, for a definite quid pro quo. Moreover, political reputations are at stake, particularly that of Mr. Bennett, who may be regarded as the father of the conference. Mr. Bennett has been known to take the bit in his teeth, and he may do it again with respect to tariffs, despite Canadian manufacturers. There is also the possibility of extensions in the existing preferential agreements between the dominions. But whether it succeeds or fails the conference can scarcely be ignored by the outside world, let alone the empire. The United States in particular is likely to be affected. Substantial preferences in favor of British and Canadian automobile industries are not improbable. Canada might perhaps agree to erect a stiff tariff on coal, particularly anthracite, in favor of British coal. British tariffs on minor foodstuffs such as fruits and cured meats with preferences for the dominions are not impossible. Such steps would certainly affect American exports. Yet Ottawa must not be looked upon merely as a menace to the trade of other countries. If by reducing barriers within the empire the trade of British nations can be increased and not merely diverted, and their prosperity thereby promoted, the effect upon world trade and world prosperity should be beneficial. The welfare of a quarter of the globe is of advantage to the other three quarters. If the conference adopts the short-sighted policy of restricting trade for temporary advantages by erecting worse tariff barriers then the consequences will be harmful and Ottawa may prove to be another nail in the coffin of world trade. But it may equally as well mark an advance toward recovery, not only for the British empire, but for the world as a whole.

Wilson Was for War in March, 1916

By C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

AMERICANS who raise their hands in self-righteous horror when some new atrocity in pre-war European diplomacy is revealed usually have small knowledge of the history of American diplomacy during the same period. They do not realize that the State Department is the most autocratic Foreign Office in the world and, potentially at least, one of the most irresponsible. Furthermore, the President of the United States has large powers in the direction of foreign affairs, extending to the use of confidential agents responsible to no one within the government but himself. He can conduct negotiations about which even the State Department may be ignorant.

The most famous confidential agent of a President in American history was Colonel E. M. House, adviser to President Woodrow Wilson. These two men had a pretty firm control of American foreign policy during the crucial period, 1914-17, when we were seeking to maintain our neutrality in the World War. They were responsible for the lapses from impartiality characteristic of the diplomacy of that difficult period. They had the power to keep us out of war or put us into it. Since it still is generally admitted that the American people did not want to participate in the World War, their every act should be scrutinized in the light of that fact. Their remissness in handling their heavy responsibility is notorious. One of the most striking examples of flagrant disregard for frequently expressed American opinion occurred during the early spring of 1916, long before Wilson sought and won reelection on the ground that he had kept the American people out of war.

In late December of 1915 Colonel House started on one of his periodical trips to Europe at President Wilson's behest. His ostensible object was to sound the Powers on the prospects of peace. Never very friendly toward Germany, House at this time was so thoroughly prejudiced that he entertained the idea of not visiting Germany at all. Ambassador Gerard had communicated messages that seemed to indicate that Germany was in no mood to talk peace. Ambassador Page at London felt that there should be no temporizing; that we should at least acquiesce in the Allied desire for the complete military defeat of Germany. Eventually House did visit Germany, though his prejudices prevented him from assessing the situation objectively, and whatever he might have accomplished, given greater patience and insight, was made impossible in advance by his attitude. He was entertained in London by Ambassador Page, who gave a dinner with Lloyd George, Reginald McKenna, Austen Chamberlain, and Lord Reading present. In Colonel House's diary we read:

Page started the conversation by saying that Mr. Chamberlain and others had asked him "what the United States wished Great Britain to do," and he requested me

[Colonel House] to give an answer. I replied, "The United States would like Great Britain to do those things which would enable the United States to help Great Britain to win the war." ["Intimate Papers of Colonel House," Vol. II, p. 124. My italics.]

This was in January, 1916, before he visited Germany. When shortly thereafter House made his trip to Germany he naturally enough found little to his taste. When he told Jules Cambon how he had parried the German remarks, he recorded in his diary that Cambon "was pleased with the answers I had made, and seemed to accept them as interpreting the position of the Allies" ("Intimate Papers," Vol. II, p. 158). He told Cambon that "the lower the fortunes of the Allies ebbed, the closer the United States would stand by them" ("Intimate Papers," Vol. II, p. 163). House was supposedly representing a neutral Power, the United States.

The visit to Germany was a mere gesture, empty of meaning. It was vastly more important to House that he be well received in England and France, for it was necessary to set the stage for his real mission. Before he sailed, President Wilson had agreed with him that it was the duty of the United States to prevent a German victory. The great question was how this was to be done. House had given the matter a great deal of thought and he had corresponded a bit with Sir Edward Grey on the matter. He had eventually evolved a formula to cover the case and it had been indorsed in its tentative form by President Wilson. It was this formula that he now was in a position to urge upon the Allied governments. He chose to present it to Sir Edward Grey.

The essence of the formula was that it guaranteed to the Allies the assistance of the United States in defeating Germany. It fell into two parts: (1) it envisaged the possibility of joining the Allies in forcing terms on Germany in a peace conference; and (2) it envisaged the possibility of the United States entering the war on the side of the Allies to bring Germany to terms by force of arms. House phrased the matter roughly in a letter to Grey, dated October 17, 1915:

In my opinion, it would be a world-wide calamity if the war should continue to a point where the Allies could not, with the aid of the United States, bring about a peace along the lines you and I have so often discussed. What I want you to know is that, whenever you consider the time is propitious for this intervention, I will propose it to the President. He may then desire me to go to Europe in order that a more intimate understanding as to procedure may be had.

It is in my mind that, after conferring with your government, I should proceed to Berlin and tell them that it was the President's purpose to intervene and stop this destructive war, provided the weight of the United States, thrown on the side that accepted our proposal, could do it.

I would not let Berlin know, of course, of any understanding had with the Allies, but would rather lead them to think our proposal would be rejected by the Allies. This might induce Berlin to accept the proposal, but if they did not do so, it would nevertheless be the purpose to intervene. If the Central Powers were still obdurate, it would probably be necessary for us to join the Allies and force the issue. ["Intimate Papers," Vol. II, pp. 90-91.]

The formula was evolved without knowledge of, or even consideration of, the Allied secret treaties. Colonel House had moved through Europe without catching more than a vague intimation of the existence of those treaties. He apparently did not want to know about the matters they comprehended. On December 22, 1915, he wrote to President Wilson: "The Allies will take care of the territorial and indemnity questions, and we need not go into that at this time. If we start with such discussions, it would involve us in controversies that might be endless and footless" ("Intimate Papers," Vol. II, p. 107). All this is true, but it strikes us now as rather high irony! And that House and Wilson were ready to proceed to the most extreme commitments ignoring such crucial matters bespeaks appalling naivete. House and Wilson, knowing nothing about the true aspirations of the Allies, were prepared to throw the whole strength of the United States behind them to defeat Germany and insure an Allied victory. And they were prepared to carry matters to this pitch when the sentiment of the country they were supposed to be representing was against war! President Wilson was prepared to concur in the following agreement, modifying it only by the italicized words in the following transcript. This copy was made by Sir Edward Grey for the records of the British Foreign Office and printed in his memoirs, "Twenty-Five Years," Volume II, pages 127-28. It is also printed in House's "Intimate Papers," Volume II, pages 201-2. On the British side it was made with the knowledge and consent of Asquith, Prime Minister; Grey, Foreign Minister; Balfour, First Lord of the Admiralty; and Lloyd George, Minister of Munitions. On the American side we find House, Wilson, and, apparently, after it was all over, Lansing. Lloyd George for one did not know that Wilson could not make war without the consent of Congress. Colonel House (letter to G. S. Viereck, February 13, 1932) says the point was clear to Grey. But how about Balfour and Asquith? And what stand would they have taken if the matter had come to an open issue and Wilson had failed to deliver "the goods"? The agreement reads as follows (the italicized words were inserted by President Wilson):

MEMORANDUM

(Confidential)

Colonel House told me that President Wilson was ready, on hearing from France and England that the moment was opportune, to propose that a conference should be summoned to put an end to the war. Should the Allies accept this proposal, and should Germany refuse it, the United States would probably enter the war against Germany.

Colonel House expressed the opinion that if such a conference met, it would secure peace on terms not unfavorable to the Allies; and if it failed to secure peace, the United States would probably leave the conference as a belligerent on the side of the Allies, if Germany was unreasonable. Colonel House expressed an opinion decidedly favorable to the restoration of Belgium, the transfer of Alsace and Lorraine to France, and the acquisition by Russia of an outlet to the sea, though he thought that the loss of territory incurred by Germany in one place would have to be compensated to her by concessions to her in other places outside Europe. If the Allies delayed accepting the offer of President Wilson, and if, later on, the course of the war was unfavorable to them that the intervention of the United States would not be effective, the United States would probably disinterest themselves in Europe and look to their own protection in their own way.

I said that I felt the statement, coming from the President of the United States, to be a matter of such importance that I must inform the Prime Minister and my colleagues; but that I could say nothing until it had received their consideration. The British Government could, under no circumstances, accept or make any proposal except in consultation and agreement with the Allies. I thought that the Cabinet would probably feel that the present situation would not justify them in approaching their Allies on this subject at the present moment; but as Colonel House had had an intimate conversation with M. Briand and M. Jules Cambon in Paris, I should think it right to tell M. Briand privately, through the French Ambassador in London, what Colonel House had said to us; and I should, of course, whenever there was an opportunity, be ready to talk the matter over with M. Briand, if he desired it.

(Initialed) E. G.

Foreign Office, February 22, 1916

This is one of the most extraordinary documents to be found in the annals of American diplomacy. Its negotiation is an example of secret diplomacy of the purest water. It was negotiated by a man who had no official standing in the government, who was merely the President's secret agent. The document was ratified on March 7, 1916, by a President who, only a very few months later, went before the American public and won an election on the ground that he had kept the country out of war! The word he inserted, "probably," was the only loophole he allowed himself in case he should fail to persuade Congress to follow the course he had marked out. And even that word was not entirely designed to protect him from the wrath of the American people should they ever realize how irresponsibly they had been committed to the Allied cause; it was partly designed to protect him from the wrath of the Allies should he be unable to deliver American men, money, and materials to the Allies at their demand.

How are we to describe this astonishing document? George Sylvester Viereck, writing in Liberty for March 19, 1932, calls it a "secret treaty, made without the knowledge and consent of the United States Senate. . . . I beg the reader's pardon. It was not a 'treaty' but a 'gentleman's agreement.'" He then, very correctly, compares it to the agreements between England and France in force at the beginning of the war. Under these documents Sir Edward Grey was able to deny that England had any treaty obligations to France. They implied only a moral obligation. Yet whatever one may take to be the proper method of stating the obligation, it was sufficiently strong to carry England into the war, as all critical students of the problem now admit. To make it easier for true-born Britons to meet an obligation which they were assured many times did not exist, the Belgian issue was raised and played up. It is highly likely that if the House-Grey agreement had been evoked, its forthright and unmistakable meaning would not have been presented to the people as a reason for their participation in the war. Some more emotionally and morally exciting reason would have been discovered, particularly since the American public had to be heavily propagandized to accept war at all.

But the Allies never found occasion to use the scheme. It is interesting to speculate why. In the first place, there are the obstacles cited by Grey in the memorandum itself. Apparently it never became worth while for the British to try to overcome them. Secondly, it is obvious that with this revealing glimpse of the true state of mind of the American leaders, it was better to gamble on their entering the war anyhow than to invite them in and consequently incur a definitely implied obligation. The Allies were willing to gamble on Germany provoking America to war. They won on this bet, as we all know. In the intervening months they were able to play a game that was rather one-sided; they knew that the Americans were prejudiced in their favor and that they could go a long way without provoking them to war. In spite of this they very nearly overplayed their hand in the fall of 1916. It would be interesting to know how often their obviously offensive courses, such as the black list, were justified in their inner counsels by appeal to the evidence of the agreement between Colonel House and Sir Edward Grey.

If on their side the Allies made no use of the agreement other than as a psychological revelation, it was not because of any reluctance of Wilson and House to carry out their part in it. In writing of the negotiations House noted in his diary:

The . . . point that came up was how the British Government could let us know they considered the time propitious for us to intervene, without first submitting the question to the Allies, and if they did not submit it to the Allies, how to avoid the charge of double dealing.

The solution I suggested for this was that at regular intervals I would cable Sir Edward Grey, in our private code, offering intervention. He could ignore the messages until the time was propitious, and then he could bring it to the attention of the Allies as coming from us and not as coming from Great Britain. ["Intimate Papers," Vol. II, p. 175.]

This procedure was followed. House cabled Grey on three occasions. On March 10, 1916, immediately after the Gore-McLemore resolutions advising that Americans be warned off armed merchantmen were defeated at Wilson's desire, the first cable was dispatched ("Intimate Papers," Vol. II, pp. 220-21). This was not acted upon by Grey because of the attitude of the French, who were hostile to peace suggestions. On April 6, 1916, a second message was sent, drafted by President Wilson himself. This was at the height of the Sussex crisis when relations with Germany were very strained anyhow. Wilson's message read: "Since it seems probable that this country must break with Germany on the submarines question unless the unexpected happens, and since, if this country should once become a belligerent, the war would undoubtedly be prolonged, I beg to suggest that if you had any thought of acting at an early date on the plan we agreed upon, you might wish now to consult with your allies with a view to acting immediately" ("Intimate Papers," Vol. 11, p. 231). Of course Grey took no action. In 1925, on thinking it over, House saw how foolish it had been to expect action at this time. The last effort was made on May 10, 1916. This was after the American victory in the Sussex difficulties. It now seemed proper to tax the British with violations of international law, or to make an attempt to bring about peace. This effort also came to nothing and the agreement was considered dead by House and Wilson ("Intimate Papers," Vol. II, pp. 278-79).

President Wilson was deeply annoyed by the seemingly cavalier attitude of the Allies and felt that the time had come to make some move outside the agreement. His feeling against the Allies became more and more hostile and reached its highest pitch in the fall of 1916 around election time. If the Germans had not deeply affronted Wilson in the early months of 1917 by insisting on immediately resuming submarine warfare, there is every likelihood that he would have forced the Allies to pull in their horns and even to make peace. The election of November had made it clear that the American people would support him in any peace-making venture, even if not in war. He was unable to retain his strategic hold on the situation long enough to carry out this program, but he did carry the country into war!

The actual outcome, motivated in so complicated a manner, is of secondary importance here. The fact remains that it was not the fault of either House or Wilson that the American people were not carried into the war on the basis of a secret document negotiated by Wilson's personal agent, modified in a trifling fashion by the President, and then agreed to by him, which had no legal standing whatever. President Wilson was willing to put the American people into a war in which they had no interests at stake by means of that secret diplomacy which he was later so fulsomely to denounce. He was willing to dispose of the people he was leading with all the disregard of their true interests characteristic of any Czar or Imperial Majesty in history.

Such a power has always been within the reach of the American President. President Roosevelt utilized it to make us virtually a party to the Anglo-Japanese alliance. There is no reason on earth why the power could not be used again. There is no legal barrier to a President committing the men and money and materials of this country to any scheme that might engage his personal suffrage. For example, it is within the bounds of possibility that an American President might commit this country to a definite course of action in the Far East and in any situation growing out of the difficulties in the Far East, without the knowledge and consent of his Secretary of State, his Cabinet, Congress, or the people at large. When the time came to invoke such an agreement it would be "put across" to the accompaniment of a great deal of hollow talk about our moral obligations and the sacred word of the American people. We might, for instance, find ourselves committed in advance to an imperialists' war against Russia in company with Japan, France, and Poland. The people would be told that they were embarking on a war in "defense of civilization against Russian barbarism." Years later they would discover that they had really fought because they had previously been committed to such a course by a President who took full advantage of the terrifying powers available to him. These powers should be investigated and immediately curtailed.

What I Believe*

By CONRAD AIKEN

TO ask a man what he believes is perhaps tantamount to asking him why he lives; and to expect from him an answer even approximately complete is like serving him with a writ of habeas corpus. Explanation would not be complete short of extinction; it would involve a kind of suicide. For a more relative and tentative answer it would be convenient, certainly, to have a creed, to belong to a sect, to be a member of a political party, to subscribe to one or another system of morals, or merely to prefer one kind of civilization to another. In the absence of any such useful short-cuts, and faced by an interior and exterior world which appears to be a confusion of relationships and relativities, and of which the values are constantly changing, one first of all, instinctively, takes refuge in what Mr. Santayana has called "animal faith." One is "here," simply, involved in a scene and sustained by it. We are born of a system, and into it, and our birth is our first act of acceptance. If we are helpless in that first of all acceptances, we are not demonstrably much less helpless in our later ones. Not being myself a metaphysician, or skilled in dialectics, or expert in epistemology, I gladly leave to others the task of estimating what margin we have, if any, as free agents in this institution—as also the question whether, in accepting or refusing, believing or disbelieving, choosing to live or to die, we are not compelled to our choice by forces beyond our control. Will it be safe to say that it is the function of the sane, or healthy, to live, or believe, and of the insane, or unhealthy, to disbelieve and die? And in this respect can we say that belief is perhaps merely a measure of energy, as courage is perhaps a measure of desire?

I am speaking, of course, for the moment, of belief only on the plane of animal acceptance, or animal faith—we might simply call it the desire to live. This is the fundamental act of faith, and for many people I see no reason why it should not be sufficient. Merely to be alive, even on the simplest plane of consciousness, is a tremendous business. That this act of faith varies in quantity or quality needs no saying—and that it varies even in the individual, from day to day, all of us know who are at all in the habit of observing our own behavior. In accordance as our energies are raised or lowered, and external and internal stimuli presented or removed, increased or diminished, we form, break, or alter our habits and appetites. If this is true in general, it is particularly true in the absence of any major beliefs—or Beliefs—whether religious, moral, aesthetic, social, or intellectual. But whether with or without any such fixed "direction," the man who becomes a failure in his work or personal affairs is not the same man as when he was successful. At such times there is a rapid selective shedding of many of our more purely "automatic" acceptances—lowered energies call for a lowering of the budget; habits which had before seemed useful or delightful now seem burdensome; we may abandon a whole system of social observances and substitute another; change our scene; or, in short, cease to believe in the efficacy of a clean collar or good manners or pleasant surroundings or clear-headedness. The animal faith, weakened, tends to concentrate itself more and more in the primary instincts—it wants merely to eat, to be warm, and to sleep. In short, with an impaired belief, or desire to live, it retreats, in such degree as it feels necessary, from consciousness. Since consciousness has entailed suffering, it wants to move down the scale toward unconsciousness, or death, unless arrested at some intermediate stage by a group of lower or simpler appetites which will enable it still, in a fashion, to exist.

To many, this state of things must appear very disagreeable. It is perhaps not pleasant to think of one's behavior as so automatic, or thermostatic, or to conceive of consciousness as in any degree a kind of function of biological success. Nor do I claim to know that consciousness is merely a function of biological success—one would have to define success, and I prefer to evade that, merely observing that there are many degrees of consciousness. The predicament, however, is a real one; and appears to become worse as the individual moves up the scale of civilization. In direct ratio as this occurs, and as he becomes more conscious, not only is he farther and farther removed from the level of simple animal faith, or the level on which he can quite simply accept it, but also his credulity is itself weakened. More and more his faiths must recommend themselves to reason; with each successive plane of awareness new terms for faith must be found—less concrete, more abstract, more comprehensive. From religion he perhaps moves to philosophy, from philosophy to science—and from science to what? In recent years we have seen that even when he has reached the realm of pure observation, he is still sometimes not content—here we have the extraordinary spectacle of the scientist endeavoring to force a shotgun marriage between science and mysticism. This is interesting, if only because it so conveniently proves how strong is our inherited will-to-believe in something vaguely "divine." The morning walk to the laboratory almost inevitably takes us past a church.

But this is very probably only a momentary regression, a moment of atavistic despair. It is only a racial habit that makes us—in a romantic and nostalgic sense—demand more of science than it can give. Granted that we must become aware of the limits of possible knowledge, that we can never look a First Cause in the face, and that the infinite everywhere precedes and succeeds the finite which is our little field of observation, nevertheless the fact remains that the limits of knowledge are ultimate, not immediate, and that we can never reach them. We have, literally, all the room in the world. The conscious life of man becomes therefore an absolutely unanswerable, but relatively answerable "Why?" In short, I can see no reason why man will not presently give up all major beliefs, including a belief in his own importance and destiny, and simply surrender himself to what is perhaps the first principle of his own present state as a conscious creature—an inexhaustible curiosity.

It will be gathered, from this brief résumé, for which I claim no originality whatever, for it is much-trodden ground, that I myself do not believe—or, at any rate, very much!—even in that last resort of belief, Man. I mean, in any ultimate sense. He is an ephemerid. In what direction he chooses collectively to evolve, biologically or mentally or socially, is of little or no instant concern to me—I do not vote for one course rather than another, for I do not care sufficiently to assume any responsibility. To such immediate and practical questions, for example, as his election of a communistic or capitalistic organization of society, I do not consider myself wise enough or farseeing enough to have an answer. If I chose to use my influence one way or the other, it would be for personal reasons rather than theoretic.

*The seventh of a series of articles on this subject by well-known men and women. Others will appear in subsequent issues. EDITOR, THE NATION.

This does not mean that I am not interested, and keenly, in that problem, as in all other problems involved in man's evolution. In fact, this brings me naturally to a statement of the one sort of belief which it seems to me possible for the emancipated man to cherish—namely, as I hinted above, a belief in consciousness. Consciousness is our supreme gift. Not only does it contain—in every sense—all that we value, but also it is the fundamental and indeed the only means by which we are able to value. To see, to remember, to know, to feel, to understand, as much as possible—isn't this perhaps the most obviously indicated of motives or beliefs, the noblest and most all-comprehending of ideas which it is relatively possible for us to realize? To understand all is not merely to forgive all—it is also to accept all, and on whatever plane one wishes. If to be a genius is to be, as someone has said, an extender of man's consciousness, then there can be no monopoly of genius by the few; it is the common inheritance of all mankind—a property, or possible property, in which we all share. Weininger made some admirable remarks about this. "The great man," he said, "is not only the truest to himself, the most unforgetful, the one to whom errors and lies are most hateful and intolerable; he is also the most social, at the same time the most self-contained, and the most open man. The genius is altogether a higher form, not merely intellectually, but also morally." And then he proceeds to identify genius with consciousness. "Consciousness and consciousness alone is in itself moral; all unconsciousness is immoral, and all immorality is unconscious. . . . Universal comprehension, full consciousness, and perfect timelessness are an ideal condition, ideal even for gifted men; genius is an innate imperative, which never becomes a fully accomplished fact in human beings. . . . Genius is, in its essence, nothing but the full completion of the idea of man, and therefore every man ought to have some quality of it, and it should be regarded as a possible principle for every one. . . . A man may become a genius if he wishes to."

Weininger is here speaking for the race. Consciousness is the highest, the only morality: it is the morality which contains all other moralities, the aesthetic which contains all other aesthetics—to achieve it in the maximum degree is not only to solve most incidental problems, it is also in itself the supreme delight of which we are capable. If we begin by understanding ourselves, as far as we can, we progress thus toward an understanding of man and his potentialities.

This seems to me a sufficient field for belief and will. Let us be as conscious as possible.

A Program for Revolt

By DEVERE ALLEN

THAT the mood of political rebellion is widespread and is reaching proportions which exceed the customary preelection grumbling of agrarian elements, must be clear to everyone. That it is taking a more radical turn, with a definite trend away from the laissez-faire liberalism of previous election years, was indicated by the Cleveland conference of the League for Independent Political Action held on July 9 and 10. Here was no flirtation with Rooseveltian progressivism, vintage of 1932; here was no program of boring from within; here instead was a positive program of assault from outside the ranks of the Republican and Democratic parties. Those who "wish to arrest the cause of inevitable change," said Dr. John Dewey to the gathering, "will support the Republicans, while a union with the Democrats is the logical course for those who wish the appearance of progress without its reality."

The conference adopted a platform of its own, intending to urge it upon the various candidates for Congress to whom it expects to give substantial aid in the fall campaign. While this was based in a large measure on the Four-Year Presidential Plan which the League published last January as an educational document, it departed from the longer plan at a few points and was considerably more thoroughgoing. Its cogent six hundred words stood out in sharp contrast to the declarations of other political groups, not reaching quite half the length of the deliberately short platform of the Democratic Party. The League's platform affirms the solidarity of the League with the worker and farmer and declares for direct federal unemployment relief; a thirty-hour week to increase employment; unemployment insurance; old-age pensions; drastic taxation of large incomes, inheritances, and speculative land values; public ownership of "such public utilities as water power, gas and electricity, coal, oil, and railroads;" tax relief for farm property; aid to cooperatives; generous farm credit through refinancing by the government of small farm owners under the amortization plan; creation of a federal marketing agency; lowered tariffs. It favors the reorganization of the entire banking system, with full publicity for all transactions; establishment of the postal savings system as a people's bank to cover all departments of the banking business; stabilization of prices at a higher level but with due protection to real wages; free speech legislation; abolition of the injunction in labor disputes; calling of a national constitutional convention to modernize the government; drastic disarmament; abolition of compulsory military training. In foreign affairs it calls for revision of the Versailles Treaty; fullest cooperation with the League of Nations and entry into the World Court; recognition of Soviet Russia; cancelation of war debts in return for European cooperation in disarmament; abandonment of our military interventions in Latin America and elsewhere; and the initiation of world economic conferences to reduce tariff barriers and promote world trade and monetary cooperation. The question of prohibition, because of a desire to emphasize its comparative unimportance, was definitely relegated to a minor role, the conference stating that "on democratic principles we recognize the right of the people to vote effectively on the abolition or the modification of the Eighteenth Amendment," but going on to state that "We condemn the Republican and Democratic Parties for subordinating urgent economic issues to the liquor question."

The opposition to any indorsement of Norman Thomas and James Maurer, anticipated by some observers inside and outside the League, did not materialize. There were a few who voiced their belief that such an indorsement would be unwise from the viewpoint of strategy, but most of these confessed their intent to vote for the Socialist national ticket on election day. Not only was the League's support proffered to the Presidential and Vice-Presidential candidates of the Socialist Party, but, following a clause safeguarding the League's partial difference from the Socialists in its long view of political development, the Socialist platform was described as the best of those offered by the various parties. The precise wording of the preamble on the Thomas indorsement was as follows:

While we do not necessarily support every feature in the ultimate program of the Socialist Party, we do believe that in the present election the candidacy and platform of Norman Thomas and James Maurer are infinitely preferable to those of other parties, and we therefore urge all our members and friends to work and vote for them.

One of the most significant portions of the platform is that section of the preamble dealing with a call for local organization. This has been the League's central conception of its immediate usefulness, beyond the constant education of the electorate in the need of a new political alignment. This paragraph says:

The creation of strong local and State parties committed to a program of protecting the interests of farmers, manual workers, and white-collar folk is, however, absolutely basic, and no national movement can develop without them. We urge, therefore, that all our members and friends use their full efforts to assist in organizing their wards, their cities, and their States, and thus build the new party from the bottom up. In many localities this will mean active cooperation with the Socialist Party; in others, such as Minnesota and Chicago, with the Farmer-Labor Party; while in other localities our members should help in forming new groups for this purpose.

The specific reference to the white-collar worker was elaborated later in an address given by Professor Paul H. Douglas of the University of Chicago, one of the founders and a vice-president of the League. Numerically, he pointed out, the white-collar workers are the most important class in society, and it is up to them to decide whether they are to line up with the farmers and manual workers or with the owners of industry. In Europe, he said, they have often been found on the side of reaction, and their general tendency in the United States has been the same. There was every reason, Dr. Douglas held, why the white-collar workers should join in the movement for a new social and economic order. Even in boom times, they have not been well paid; they have found during the depression that they have a genuine stake in the stability of industry because they have suffered loss of jobs or pay cuts just as have the manual workers; and the investments they labored for and pinched to save have been wiped out.

Despite sweltering heat the meetings were held with an excellent attendance and a keen interest on the part of the local press and public. Cleveland was carried for La Follette in 1924, and although the pseudo-liberalism of Franklin D. Roosevelt has attracted many Cleveland progressives to his colors already, and influenced others to swallow him under protest, by no means have all the liberals in the city thus yielded. The Saturday afternoon meeting held at the Women's City Club was crowded, and when Howard Williams and John W. Herring, the League's secretaries, excoriated the spurious liberalism of Roosevelt and called for a change of tactics toward the old parties, there was instant and enthusiastic applause. Through the following sessions both the heat and the interest were maintained at the same high level. Oswald Garrison Villard analyzed the collapse of leadership at Washington, and Professor Dewey, speaking on "Democracy Joins the Unemployed," asserted:

We have permitted business and financial autocracy to reach such a point that its logical political counterpart is a Mussolini unless a violent revolution brings forth a Lenin. The business of forming a new party is the business of educating the people until the dullest and the most partisan see the connection between economic life and politics.

Representative Paul John Kvale of Minnesota, the lone Farmer-Labor congressman, discussed convincingly the problems facing an independent in Congress and laid particular stress upon the grave conflict between the Executive and Congress, which has been at the bottom of the entire fight during the present session.

The conference was closed on Sunday evening by Walter J. Millard, the expert on proportional representation and the problems of municipal government, who warned the gathering that the mere organization of a new party would not take us to the promised land, that there must be a complete making-over of certain forms of our government. A. J. Muste, head of Brookwood College, won the gathering's approval with a frank address contending that labor must be the basis of any worthwhile new party, and James Dick, a textile worker from New England, deeply stirred the audience with his story of the plight of the textile workers who have come to such a pass that many girls are actually earning, he stated, only one dollar and sixty-five cents per week.

Although the conference was not large, politically considered, members of the League came to attend it from almost every State of the East and Middle West—from Utah, Colorado, Connecticut, Minnesota, and Florida. The national committee of the League now consists of sixty-seven members representing twenty-six States. Possibly the most important single outcome of the conference may be a more representative congress of various political groups which, it is hoped by the League, will be summoned early next year.

From the beginning, the League itself has not been a political party, nor has it ever intended to become one. It has steadily believed that its work of education could, however, bring nearer the day when a large mass political movement of the workers and farmers might emerge and either take power or at least establish itself as a substantial opposition. Whether that can be rationally hoped for in the near future depends, probably, less upon any organization whatsoever than upon the turn of events over which there is no control. But if such a movement becomes a genuine possibility, the League means to be ready as a unifying factor.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter should not like to be classed with those well-fed clergymen and warmly clothed public speakers who proclaim the spiritual blessings of depression. But it has been responsible for one material blessing for which he cannot help shouting, namely the fact that there are fewer and slower automobiles on the highways on summer Sundays. Before October, 1929, a week-end in the country took on the sinister aspect of a training period for the ordeal on Sunday evening which could be counted on to wipe out the effect and even the memory of relaxation and a fresh breeze, particularly if one happened to be riding with a driver who felt obliged to pass every car in sight and considered all roads one-way thoroughfares.

* * * *

HOW the roads have changed. The long lines of traffic, two and three cars wide, that once led up to the bottle necks of cities have almost disappeared. The air space from exhaust to exhaust is appreciably longer and sweeter. Our great roads are in a way to become paths of pleasantness instead of noisy, malodorous streams of machines full of speed-stricken human beings. For speed, too, has lessened. Keeping up with the Joneses does not require as much speed as it used to, for the Joneses haven't a new car either. To be sure, one still meets the driver in his new car who passes other cars on blind curves, and the Drifter still feels that those little signs should read more often than not: Slow Down—Fool Ahead. But one has only to look at the figures from Detroit to see how much scarcer is the man who buys a new car every year. The two-car garage these days is likely to contain one 1928 motor-car and Johnny's scooter.

* * * *

WITHIN six months, in fact, the Drifter has seen more relics of the machine age on the public roads than he thought existed. A new top from Sears Roebuck put on at home does wonders for a 1925 Buick, and though the hills must be negotiated more slowly, still it does get to the top and there's no instalment to pay next month. For the first time in years one is able to see what the models of three years back looked like and the Drifter suspects that the garage, that useful refuge which in the new-car-every-year days retreated into alleys and didn't even bother to have a mechanic available on Sunday, is experiencing a boom. As for the Model T, the species seems to be increasing in number as the vintage grows progressively more ancient. The Drifter is looking forward with great anticipation to the day when he will meet upon some magnificent four-span highway one of those ancient motor-cars in which four people sat back to back and father in a white linen duster did the cranking on the side.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Roosevelt and Water Power

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your editorial on Governor Roosevelt this week you have probably inadvertently run into a serious error in fact. You state, in effect, that while Governor Roosevelt's power policy in New York has been satisfactory to you, he has not yet made any suggestion as to the embodiment of this policy in national terms. In his speech delivered at St. Paul, Minnesota, on April 18, 1932, he dealt with two subjects in what seems to me perfectly specific terms. The first was the tariff and the second was water power. With regard to water power he stated his New York State policy and following that said:

It is neither radical, nor a violation of any principles of sound business, for me to state in definite terms that public servants with a proper regard for the interests of the people themselves must exert every effort to restore the fundamentals of public control. And this applies not only in every State capitol but also in the control by the national government over those great sources of power which fall under the jurisdiction of the national government.

Those who have read the papers these past few days have seen an example of the vast national scope of the public-utility structure. Interrelated companies stretch into literally dozens of States. Investors, customers, and management constitute a national community of interest of enormous importance. I wonder if it is not true that even those far in the upper reaches of such a structure would not themselves recognize the soundness of national public protection of all of the associated factors in this structure.

A very deep study over many years makes it clearer to me with every passing day that where a public service like the transmission of electricity passes beyond State lines and becomes interstate in its actual operation, in such a case the control cannot effectively be maintained by States alone or through agreements between neighboring States. That problem is national in its scope and can be solved only by the firm establishment of national control.

Electricity is a great unifying interest doing more to make us a united nation than any other material factor. To control it for the common good requires national thinking by a national party.

New York, July 13

RAYMOND MOLEY

I Teach Socialism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A business man recently asked me if the high school carried a course in socialism. And when I replied in the negative, he asked why and if I did not think it would be a wise thing. Undoubtedly it would be exceedingly wise—from the standpoint of society.

I teach socialism, for I believe it is the only effective break-water—if we are not already too far out to sea—for that ever-growing wave of revolution bearing on its crest the chaotic driftwood of a completely new order, the new regime, which, from all appearances, could be ushered in in the United States only with a liberal baptism of blood.

I teach socialism because I am, I fondly hope, fairly sane. How any teacher of high-school history and sociology, pretending to think at all, can still mouth piously the old fetishes relative to the two good old parties is beyond my comprehension. I therefore teach socialism deliberately, because the ideal of that doctrine seems to me more nearly in accord with the modern scientific approach to a problem—used everywhere but in politics and business.

I teach it because at least a large minority of high-school students is ready for a badly needed change. That minority is thoughtfully, if somewhat gropingly, aghast at the mess of our imperialistic capitalism and at every turn is asking "Why?" and "What?" and asking it of its teachers. And what are the teachers answering? Almost invariably nothing.

In short, as a teacher, I am trying earnestly to teach the Golden Rule, and I hope the life of Eugene V. Debs will continue to be my inspiration.

Dearborn, Mich., May 25

ANNE TEMPLAR

The De Reszkes

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am collecting material for a biography of Jean and Edouard de Reszke and I am anxious to obtain first-hand accounts, in letters or otherwise, of incidents and anecdotes, in which they figured. No bit of information or recollection will be without importance to me.

Material sent to me at 26 Grove Street will be respectfully treated and promptly returned.

New York, July 10

CLARA M. LEISER

In an Indian Prison

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your readers will be interested in the following letter written by Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya on the train while she was being removed from the Bombay prison to a prison in Belgaum. The letter, addressed to some of her friends in India, has been just received in this country. The text follows:

Aboard the train, April 19, 1932

MY DEAR FRIENDS: I am writing this on my way to Belgaum, where I am being removed. I suppose you know I am in "C" class. It is good. It is the only way one gets to know what prison life really is. The treatment of political prisoners, I think, must be taken up immediately by all English people. It is a perfect disgrace. Fancy government openly saying that no difference is to be made between ordinary convicts and political prisoners! This raises a big international question that cannot be ignored. We are now deprived of all writing materials and the women are allowed no underclothes. Each sari that we wear weighs five pounds and we are supplied two of these and two blouses. Our bedding consists of one coir mat and a very rough blanket. So we have to use our spare clean sari as a bedsheet and cover both. Then, the abusing of prisoners in foul and filthy language by every official from the superintendent to the warders is dreadful.

Within four days of my incarceration I saw enough to determine me to place this matter before the jail committee when it came round. So Miss Slade and I put all this before the committee, which made some strong remarks in their book. It so upset the jail officials that Miss Slade and I were immediately shifted to another part of the prison and completely isolated from the others as a punishment, and now I am being finally removed to Belgaum.

It is interesting being in "C" class and sharing the general life. I have been losing about one pound a day. But I expect I shall get used to it in course of time. I don't know when I shall be able to write again as I can only send one letter once in three months.

[Signed] KAMALA

New York, June 22

HARIDAS T. MUZUMDAR

The Balance Sheet

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The inclosed "budget" for 1932-33 of my brother, managing 160 acres of good, unencumbered Indiana land for his father's heirs and 200 acres under a $2,000 mortgage for his mother, is an interesting commentary upon the seriousness of the agricultural situation in the corn belt. Considering that this document typifies the situation of millions of other farmers of the Middle West, it is obvious that neglect of it by our political and financial leaders is a certain road to national disaster.

Here is the budget:

Mother's farm
Fertilizer .....	$40.00	1,400 bushels corn at 20¢..	$280
Ma's tax .....	234.27	900 bushels oats at 15¢...	135
Interest .....	137.50	Cash rent .....	35
Home tax .....	37.00
Home interest...	120.00		$450
	$568.77
Estate Farm
Fertilizer .....	$35.00	1,000 bushels corn at 20¢..	$200
Tax .....	300.94	800 bushels oats at 15¢...	120
		Cash rent .....	35
	$335.94		$355

This budget includes the 10 per cent penalty, as the first instalment will be due Monday. (Cost of labor added and subtracted does not alter the figures.)

Berkeley, Cal., July 1

E. C.

The Cause and Cure of Crises

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Ray Vance says in his article, Has the Crisis Run Its Course? that a "combination of physical and financial conditions brought on the panic." So far, so good; but it seems that a more definite explanation is in order. Before me lies a graph covering 141 years of our history, based on authentic data. It was prepared by the Cleveland Trust Company, and has been, at least in part, widely copied. On the seventeen depressions therein noted (during 117 years, from 1812 through 1929) eleven were consequent upon or connected with the three major wars. In connection with each war three depressions are pictured and named—one at the beginning of the war, followed by the "primary post-war," then the "secondary post-war" depressions. The "debt repudiation" depression of the early 40's and the depression of 1884 are each near enough to the first two of these major wars to be fairly counted as part and parcel of the dislocation. This list omits four depressions attendant upon the French-English-Indian warfare, the French hostilities so-called, and the Peace (sic!) of Amiens. No account is taken of the Mexican imbroglio, the accompanying depression of which was slight. The remaining six depressions were of short duration—four named as "panics," two not named at all, such was their unimportance. Generally speaking, the three primary war depressions were deeper but less protracted than the secondary depressions; the exception being the 1929 depression, which saw the line running a bit lower than that which began in 1920, touching, that is, a new low. To sum up, this graph shows approximately 24 years—exactly one-fifth of the 120 years that have elapsed since the outbreak of the war of 1812—as having been given over to financial depressions varying in duration and severity. If it is true that the present one is the worst we have ever experienced, the more need there is for assessing the blame.

In this comment the writer is far less concerned with the possible duration of depressions than with showing how they are hitched up to the stupidity, the futility, and the crime of war, but nevertheless comparisons are intriguing. We are nearly through the third year of the "secondary" depression—in point of fact, the third depression consequent upon the world war.

The secondary depression of the war of 1812 lasted four years and that of the Civil War six years; and Mr. Vance tells us today that recovery is "more than a year away." Even that prediction will be welcomed by many who are deeply submerged in the mental depression that always accompanies financial trouble. I would be more definite and say a year and six months away, counting from the first of July, which will bring us into 1934, a period in the gamut of depressions that (in seven out of eight I have been studying) has lifted the lowered line of the graph in its journey toward the norm; the one exception came in 1826 when the line of the graph approached but did not quite succeed in reaching the normal level. And the fortunes of the ninth war depression since 1812 are still in the lap of the gods.

Aside from the light that this graph sheds upon the character and the duration of recurring cycles as they affect human activity, its pictographic record presents the most damaging and convincing case against war that could be desired by even the most skeptical militarist or the most timid and cautious pacifist. Here we have undeniable proof of what war connotes in the matter of a country's financial stability—a practical argument telling us why this business of settling disputes by mass murder should stop. Not the duration of depressions but the major cause of them ought to occupy the thoughts of Americans right now.

New York, June 27

BLANCHE WATSON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You publish an elaborate article by Ray Vance purporting to prove that the crisis has run its course and that before long we are going to start on another boom.

It seems to me that Mr. Vance's article is based on one fundamental misconception. He tells us how "current debts have been sharply decreased" and "debts and open book accounts and instalment purchases reduced even more sharply." "The supply of goods available for consumption has been sharply reduced" and so on. All this is based on the theory that our present depression is caused by overproduction of consumption goods. But it is not. It is caused by overproduction of the means of production. Mr. Vance does not attempt to prove to us that the ability of the United States to produce steel has been in any way reduced since 1929. We can produce as much or more of every metal; as much or more electric power; we have as many railroads and car factories, automobile and truck factories, cement plants, cotton mills, coal mines—everything, all the way down the line.

There appears to have been very little overproduction of consumers' goods in 1929. Much of the distribution was in the hands of big concerns, which could look ahead and adjust their orders according to their future needs. The whole system, from producer to ultimate consumer, had been speeded up and goods went right down the chute. But with production goods it was different. It was considered a crime to suggest that we could have too many steel mills or automobile factories. Now we have them, and there is no possibility of running them at more than half time; so we are in for a long period of chronic depression.

Pasadena, Cal., July 1

UPTON SINCLAIR

Finance

Ottawa Seeks a Formula

LAUSANNE settled reparations with a proviso, and at Ottawa the representatives of the British nations are grappling with the problem of expediting trade within the empire. If they succeed in doing so the outside world will almost certainly benefit; for while every effort will be made to stimulate commerce between Great Britain and her possessions and dominions, the most far-sighted leaders of British opinion recognize that a policy of trying to reserve the British markets exclusively for the British would be foredoomed to failure. Great Britain, though she must import one-half to two-thirds of her total supply of foodstuffs, cannot eat all that the dominions produce, while the dominions, though they import huge amounts of finished goods, cannot absorb all that the mother country manufactures.

So, on the eve of the conference, we find the London Economist maintaining that the only wise policy for Ottawa to pursue is to attempt a lowering of tariffs all around, instead of raising them against third parties. That fine free-trade journal points out that if the purpose of international trade is to obtain the greatest advantage for all concerned tariffs are scarcely necessary to achieve this result. It will be best achieved where no barriers exist. But while the protectionists of South Africa and Canada might never be able to find a logical answer to that proposition, they are far from accepting it. Statements of the dominion representatives, prior to the conference, have quite generally indicated a determination to look out for the local infant industries and to give them the measure of protection they need in order to reach maturity.

The middle ground is occupied by groups like the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, which assert that British industries should enjoy a larger measure of tariff preference against foreigners in the dominion markets, and that even the preferential tariff should be low enough to give the British a fair competitive chance with the local manufacturer. At the same time, care should be taken (in a manner not specified) not to alienate those great markets which both the old country and the dominions enjoy in the outside world. One of the few concrete suggestions made thus far has to do with "complementary production," meaning, apparently, that the dominions and possessions shall refrain from developing industries which can be better developed in Great Britain. Why, to cite an imaginary case, should Canada strive to outdo Sheffield in cutlery, or Australia to equal Manchester in cotton textiles, when the two dominions can obtain better goods and cheaper goods by purchasing them with wheat, wool, and crude copper?

The answer to that question is to be found in the simple statement that the territorial division of labor—each region producing those commodities which soil, climate, available materials, and human aptitudes best fit it to produce—does not work according to theory. One reason why it does not is the impossibility of keeping the output of foods and crude materials in balance, throughout the world markets, with the manufactured products for which they are exchanged. It is a significant fact that the raw-materials countries are debtor countries; the money they borrow disguises the fact that they are piling up a deficit in the international balance sheet until the crash comes and they find that they must produce two tons of materials to pay a debt which one ton would formerly pay. The remedy, as they see it, is to free themselves of the foreign creditor by doing their manufacturing at home. Will the Ottawa conference find a better remedy?

S. PALMER HARMAN

Books

Strict Acre

By JOSEPH AUSLANDER

Who dares dispute Apollo's golden speed
Or grip the lathered harness in his fist?
Let him presume upon a lesser reed;
Let him accomplish a more tranquil tryst.
Ah risk no trespass on that cloudy acre
Where those ethereal hooves in thunder gleam:
Content you with one spark the Lightning-Shaker
Sheds on your broken, brief Icarian dream.

Rather pursue the pungent yoke and furrow
And drop the barley seed and spread the oat
Than tempt the peril of the sudden arrow,
The shaggy god and the capricious goat:
The Samnite in his little field may bruise
His heel on some gold head of Syracuse.

Prelude

By CONRAD AIKEN

Thus boasting thus grandiloquent he stood thus eloquent thus orotund he spoke thus posing like an acrobat he paused thus like an actor loosed his syllable the bright, the brief, the brave, the seeming certain, and smirked

upon that stage of his own making
There in the dirty wings on dirty sawdust against the trumpets of a vivid world.

The Artist as a Youngish Man

The Journal of Arnold Bennett. 1896-1910. The Viking Press. $4.

SEVERAL romantic young persons of my acquaintance have taken stern exception to Mr. Bennett's diary. He is so mercenary, they say; he not only counts his words as he writes them, but in the first week of January of every year he totes up the number of words he has produced the year before and carefully writes down just how much, in hard cash, his work has brought in. If Mr. Bennett had been a house-builder, and had noted the price of the materials he bought and the profit he had made on them, it would be perfectly permissible. For house-building is a trade. But writing novels and magazine articles is, bless all our little hearts, an art! An artist mustn't think about money or words; he must, every time he sits down to write, go into a trance, summon his muse, allow her to manipulate his typewriter, and with the greatest amazement finally read what she has written. After a while it turns out that the novel is finished; the compositor, who sets it in type, knows how long it is, but of course he does not discuss such vulgar matters with the author; the publisher, who issues the book, pays the royalty checks, but the author tosses these mundane mementos into the waste-basket or into the lap of his wife, who manages his affairs. No artist, so the legend runs, can properly conduct himself in any less casual manner.

Arnold Bennett was not that kind of artist. About half his working day, so his diary informs us, he spent writing magazine articles for money. The other half was spent usually in writing a novel—for which also he received money in rather sizable sums. No artisan ever worked harder or more faithfully at his trade; few English novelists have written novels which surpass those of Mr. Bennett at his best. That all the while he was writing he should have been conscious of just how far he had got, and that he should have asked in advance the price that an editor was to pay him for an article, does not make him any less a fine writer, any less an artist, any less a born novelist who could not help writing because writing was his trade, his profession, his art, and his first passion.

The other count against Mr. Bennett, as revealed in his diary, is that he was not an interesting person. His was, it is said, a dull, middle-class mind in a complaining, vulgar body. And that, also, I should deny. He was surely middle-class, and he wrote mainly about middle-class people. His love of luxury, when he finally had money to buy it, was middle-class, too. But he was not dull, and his vulgarities were the result of his curiosity, which never ceased to motivate him, about people, about things, about life. In his diary he writes about himself; about how he felt, what he ate, whom he talked to, the women he made love to, the books he read, and about how he valued what he wrote. His estimates of music, plays, and books are always interesting and often just. His description of places is no less so. He is reasonably aware of what sort of man he is: "My leading sentiment is my own real superiority, not the inferiority of others." "I am so wrapped up in myself that I, if anyone, ought to succeed in a relative self-perfection." "I do not like to think that I am dependent spiritually, to even a slight degree, on anyone. I do not like to think that I am not absolutely complete and sufficient in myself to myself." "I went to bed with influenza, but found that I hadn't got it." Of "Clayhanger" he said, with considerable modesty, "I really doubt whether, as a whole, this book is good. It assuredly isn't within ten miles of Dostoevski." And he had another sort of modesty: "H. W. Massingham wrote me yesterday inviting me to contribute to the Nation. No editorial invitation has ever flattered me as much as this." He wrote quickly and steadily, but that he did not write carelessly is indicated when he says: "Having finished a novel I could not cut it down, because I should have satisfied myself that it contained nothing inessential. . . . The notion that anything can be taken from a finished work of art without leaving a gap seems to me monstrous."

Finally Mr. Bennett has been described as a man without feeling. Although he declares himself entirely self-sufficient, he made two significant entries in his diary which might prove the contrary. On Friday, June 15, 1906, he wrote: "At 5 p. m. on this day, in the forest of Fontainebleau, I became engaged to marry Eleanora." The next item, dated Friday, August 3, is as follows: "At 11 a. m. on this day, at Caniel, my engagement to Eleanora was broken off." If he had thought less of the breach, surely he would have written more. But where on other occasions he is not above boasting of his triumphs with women, here he recorded the bare facts only. No boasting of his success; no explanation of his failure. Eleanora Green's name is not mentioned subsequently in this volume of the diary. And his next entry was dated July 19, 1907, nearly a year later, incidentally two weeks after his marriage to Marguerite Soulié.

It is enough to say of Mr. Bennett that he is in his diary nearly as interesting as his most interesting character, Edwin Clayhanger. He is a good deal like several of his characters.

They were curious as he is, they were a little solemn about themselves, they were observing, fond of money, hard-working, reserved. He told more about them than he does about himself. That perhaps is the diary's most serious limitation.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Westermarck on Ethics

Ethical Relativity. By Edward Westermarck. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

WE commonly say that a certain dish is "good," that a certain poem is "beautiful," and that a certain action is "right." The forms of the three statements are identical, but in the case of the first nearly everyone would admit that we do not, when we use it, actually mean to affirm what is literally implied. It is merely a figure of speech, a way of saying that we "like" the dish in question, and we do not intend to assert that the latter possesses an objective gustatorial "goodness" independent of ourselves. In the case of the "beautiful" poem the world is, on the other hand, pretty evenly divided between those who maintain that the statement which affirms its "beauty" is a statement of exactly the same kind as the statement that the dish is "good" and those who would declare that "beauty" is an objective quality which certain persons may and certain persons may not have the ability to perceive, but which exists quite independent of the fact that any individual does or does not "like" the poem in question. And when we come to the "rightness" of an action, most writers on ethics, at least, would affirm that it assuredly is essentially different from the "goodness" of a dish, and that such "rightness" most certainly is an objective quality.

The fact remains, nevertheless, that it is perfectly possible to deny that the objective "beauty" of a poem and the objective "rightness" of an action are any more demonstrable than the "goodness" of a dish, and the result of such a denial is, of course, to proclaim a thorough going relativity. If "beauty" and "rightness" are objective qualities, then aesthetics and ethics are, potentially at least, normative sciences. If, on the other hand, the conceptions of "beauty" and "rightness" are, like the conception of gustatorial "goodness," merely examples of the fallacy of misplaced concreteness, then it is logically as absurd to attempt to erect a normative science of aesthetics or of ethics as it would be to attempt to prove that escargots à la Bordelaise (or corned beef and cabbage) either is or is not "good."

Though Professor Westermarck does not use precisely this illustration it will serve, I think, to suggest in as brief a form as is possible the subject of his discussion, and it is hardly necessary to add that he argues in favor of an uncompromising relativity. In "The Origin and Development of Moral Ideas" he studied moral opinion genetically; here he attempts to defend philosophically and psychologically the position which he was formerly led to take up. Moral judgments are, he maintains, the result of a specific class of emotions which he calls "moral emotions," and the apparent objectivity of these judgments is merely the result of an illusion. "The main contentions in this book" are "that the moral consciousness is ultimately based on emotions, that the moral judgment lacks validity, that the moral values are not absolute but relative to the emotions they express." In other words we regard as "moral" those things of which we approve, and we approve of those things which are in accord with our individual taste even though—as Professor Westermarck would insist—taste in such matters is a thing infinitely more complex than taste in food and, unlike this latter, is capable of being very profoundly influenced, not merely by custom and habit, but also by intellectual considerations which give form and consistency to a group of tastes.

A monograph of this sort cannot, of course, exercise an influence comparable to that exercised by the same author's earlier genetic studies. Its general effect is of something largely academic while "The Origin and Development of Moral Ideas" belongs with, for example, Sumner's "Folk Ways" and Havelock Ellis's "Studies" among the books which, in determining the intellectual atmosphere of the earlier twentieth century, played a part perhaps disproportionate to their purely philosophic importance. Nevertheless, "Ethical Relativity" is an essay which ought to be read by everyone interested in the attempt to analyze the intellectual implications of the widespread willingness on the part of the general public to accept some such formula as that which states the identity between mores and morals. And in this connection perhaps the most interesting of Professor Westermarck's contentions is that which he opposes to the objection that "moral relativity" leads to moral anarchy. We are, he says in effect, no less guided by our tastes because we know that they are merely tastes, and there is no reason why our moral preferences should be any less effective because we recognize them as nothing more than preferences. Our ethics, in a word, may be relative, but they are relative to a total situation of which we are a part and therefore have as much stability and as much urgency as it is desirable that moral principles should have.

There are, I think, certain objections which might be raised to this convenient way out of the dilemma into which we seem to be led by an acceptance of the belief that morality is a relative matter. So far, however, no one seems to have suggested a better one.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Revolution as a Fine Art

Coup d'Etat: The Technique of Revolution. By Curzio Malaparte. Translated by Sylvia Saunders. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

REVOLUTIONS, coups d'état, general strikes, terrorism, sabotage, barricades, skirmishes, massacres, executions—these are among the most fascinating episodes of the great human tragi-comedy. Torn from the intimate connection with the main propelling force of class and group interests, however, their descriptions are no more helpful to understanding social history than would be the mere photograph of a dynamo to an understanding of the nature of electromagnetism. "Coup d'Etat" fails primarily because it provides such descriptions without revealing those intimate connections which would give them genuine meaning.

"Coup d'Etat" is written vividly, with flashes of wit here and there, and this explains the succès de scandale the book has achieved in Europe. The author, the Italian Fascist Curzio Malaparte, candidly confesses:

... the object of the book is not ... to discuss the political, economic, and social programs of the conspirators, but to show that the problem of conquest and defense of the state is not a political one, that it is a technical problem ... that the circumstances favorable to a coup d'état are not necessarily of a political and social order and do not depend on the general condition of the country.

In another passage he points out that the technical problem consists in getting hold of the most vital arteries of the nation's economic life—the railway stations, postal and telegraph services, ports, power plants, gas works, and water mains.

History is thus made very easy. The disintegration of the Czarist army, the misery and destitution of the masses, the desire for peace, the land hunger of the peasantry, the growing disappointment of the industrial workers, as expressed by the growth of Bolshevik influence in the Soviets, the struggle for power between rival groups of the revolutionary intelligentsia—all these factors can be summarily dismissed. The coup d'état of November, 1917, succeeded because Trotzky knew how to apply the right technique. The author stresses his argument with numerous "quotations" for which he gives no sources. During his struggle against the opposition, Stalin, according to Malaparte, referred to Trotzky as "a wretched Jew," and Trotzky, nothing daunted, called his rival "a miserable Christian." Just like that.

In the light of the fact that Trotzky's technique of the coup d'état is so easy to understand, and, according to Malaparte, so easy to apply anywhere, one wonders why those tactics were not employed successfully by the Italian and Polish Communists in 1920, or by the German Communists between 1919 and 1923, and finally by Trotzky himself in 1926-27? Since Signore Malaparte dismisses political and economic circumstances as determining factors, he is forced to find other explanations. The Germans and Italians—well, they simply were "ignorant of the methods, the tactics, and the modern technique of the coup d'état of which Trotzky had given a new and classic example." The Polish Communists understood Trotzky, but being mostly Jews, they did not have the guts. This applied also to Trotzky's followers during his struggle against Stalin.

Only Mussolini knew how to apply Trotzky's tactics. But there is a little hitch in Malaparte's epic picture of Benito's rise to power—that is, aside from his always too obvious embellishment of historical facts. The author says modestly that "it is not known" why the King refused to sign an order establishing a state of siege when the March on Rome was started. Malaparte knows that Madame Kollontai loved the sailor Dybenko "for his transparent eyes and for his cruelty"; but he does not know, that is, he affects not to know, what every historian knows, that the Italian Army Command, which hoped to establish a military dictatorship, was conspiring with, and giving all the necessary assistance to Mussolini, who, of course, later double-crossed his allies, as he double-crossed all his other associates. All of which was not exactly identical with Trotzky's "technique."

Despite his often grotesque distortions of the Russian events, the author is actually much less severe with the Bolsheviks than with the heroes of the counter-revolutionary coups d'état outside of Italy. But he is much too cautious to give more than a faint hint of the actual class origin of his contempt for Kapp, Primo de Rivera, Pilsudski, and Hitler.

The fact of the matter is that the so-called "fascist" coups d'état in the other countries can hardly be said to have revealed very much in common with the Italian brand. Mussolini and his original following of adventurous dissenters from the various radical and revolutionary groups, mostly déclassé intellectuals, ex-workers, and war veterans, had placed themselves at the disposal of the manufacturers, financiers, and land-holders for the double purpose of cowing the workers and destroying all the organizations headed by their former rivals in the radical camp. Having finished the job, they had no inclination to step aside as dismissed bullies who were no longer needed. They established a dictatorship of the fascist section of the intelligentsia over both workers and capitalists (and the rest of the population, for that matter)—ready to seize their former backers rudely by the throat whenever such a gesture was necessary for the maintenance of their own power. Neither the Kapp nor the Rivera dictatorships had anything in common with this essential feature of a fascist regime. Both the German and the Spanish coup meant simply the reestablishment or the strengthening of the old Junker and militarist rule—with the famished intellectual "outs" altogether removed from the picture. Pilsudski's coup of 1926 was likewise a purely military and quite "respectable" affair, while Hitler, in the opinion of Malaparte, is merely a hired agent in the service of the German manufacturers and Junkers—with no actual intention of reaching out for an exclusive fascist dictatorship, Italian style.

Malaparte's chapter on Hitler contains some very caustic and challenging remarks about dictators in general. It is a reasonable conjecture that the bitter sarcasm of some of these passages was aimed not exclusively at the eloquent Austrian yokel. The author no doubt was out to vent his spleen at the incomparable Master, Mussolini himself, who is apparently more feared than loved by his immediate entourage.

Malaparte has been known in Italy as an author of a volume of fascist lyrics. If in this line of his endeavor he has shown as much imagination as in his treatment of historical facts, he has done his country a great wrong by deserting the muses.

MAX NOMAD

"Faust" a Hundred Years After

Faust: Parts One and Two. by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. Translated by George Madison Priest. Covici-Friede. $5.

OUTSIDE of Germany Goethe is known chiefly as a human figure; the art disappears behind the man. So it is with Leonardo, outside of Italy. But in the latter's case it is time that has withered and destroyed the Florentine's works of art. In the case of Goethe, it is not time but the translators that have withered and destroyed them.

Germans have had Shakespeare in the thoroughly adequate translations of Wieland and the Schlegels; but English and American readers have had "Faust" only through Bayard Taylor's funereal version or the equally stilted and lifeless attempts of half a dozen other scholars. It was the misfortune of "Faust" to become from the very start a prey to the dust-grubbing professoriat; the peculiar complexity and the philosophical breadth of the whole called into existence an exclusive "Faust" cult which has continued for a century to approach this Teuton Bible with fear, trembling, and footnotes. From the beginning the work was embalmed and enshrined; and today in all countries but Germany it is almost as sublimely unpopular as Joyce's "Ulysses."

George Madison Priest is a professor of German; but that fact has not prevented his writing perhaps the one really readable translation of "Faust" available today. He has not tried, indeed, to break with the tradition of meticulous and scholarly interpretation; nor has he modernized or jazzed up the text; but at the same time he has won a frequent freedom in his English equivalents to Goethe's packed lines which sets him well apart from his predecessors. He follows the German meters, as Taylor did; but he has far more understanding of the free Knittelverse of the opening passages, and his rendering of Goethe's difficult dimeters and trimeters has a true musical and verbal effect. He handles Gretchen as the fresh and eloquently simple small-town girl that Goethe made her; not as the mincing Boston debutante of Taylor's version. The translation of such great descriptive passages as "Vom Eise befreit" is vivid and sensitive; the rendering of many difficult philosophical stanzas in Part Two is safely grounded on the interpretations of the best analysts of Goethe's thought.

But even with these general excellences of rendering, much of the vitality of the original work is lost in the translation. In the first place, Professor Priest sees fit to translate the German du and Ihr, which are intimate and direct, into the English "thou" and "ye," which are stilted and obsolete. From Goethe's typically undecorated and everyday human vocabulary we pass into a realm of elaborate literary circumlocution. The strong and immediate emotions of "Faust" are translated into a cloaked Quaker language. Immediately the drama loses half of its vitality. And Professor Priest continues this emasculating process by using endless grammatical inversions to equalize the length of his lines exactly with the German, or by stuffing them up with such rhetorical garbage as "e'en," "forsooth," "ere," "o'er," "fain," "fore," "ne'er," and the schoolboy constructions which use "did see" when they mean to say "saw."

Professor Priest's version will be a joy to those American readers who have despaired of ever getting through Taylor, and who still suspect that "Faust" is not entirely dust. But it will not make Goethe's drama a compelling reality to those many people who lack an elaborate preparation in classroom methods of interpreting and devitalizing the masterpieces of the world. Until a translator can do for Goethe what Scott-Moncrieff did for Proust or what Constance Garnett did for Dostoevski, the English "Faust" will remain a mere solemn exercise in cultural history—a thing difficult to defend when bright young Communist critics try to throw it in the ashcan.

WILLIAM HARLAN HALE

Amber-Tinted Elegance

The Chinaberry Tree. By Jessie Fauset. Introduction by Zona Gale. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.

FOR once, a book has been advertised too modestly. "The Chinaberry Tree" has been recommended by its publishers, and by Miss Gale, its sponsor, as a revelation of the life led by educated Negroes. But it is considerably more than that. Though faulty, it is the work of a remarkable psychologist who can be congratulated not simply because her material is interesting but because she has understood so well the human factors involved in it.

The greater portion of "The Chinaberry Tree" is devoted to the love affair of two colored high-school students who do not know that they are brother and sister. This dramatic theme, singularly enough, is the least exciting part of the story. We learn most about Miss Fauset's book as a whole not through Melissa and Malory, or their narrowly averted incestuous marriage; but through Laurentine, the beautiful apricot-colored dressmaker who is the book's real heroine and symbol of the world it depicts; Laurentine, who sat as a child under the Chinaberry Tree and wondered why other children, either white or black, wouldn't play with her.

The best part of the story lies in the background. Colonel Holloway, a wealthy white factory-owner, while still a college student falls in love with his mother's Negro maid. He marries a white woman, but his real love is given to the colored girl, whom he handsomely establishes in a white house with green shutters, a well-kept garden, and the Chinaberry Tree. His daily visits to her are concealed from no one. Their love is a scandal to both black and white inhabitants of the Jersey town. And Laurentine is their child. She is brought up in comparative luxury, but is a double outcast. And the passion which animates her is closely allied to the passion which animates the book. What does the illegitimate mulatto grow up to want? Respectability. Once she cries: "Oh God, you know all I want is a chance to show them how decent I am." This might serve as the motto for "The Chinaberry Tree." It is so much the book's real theme that once recognized it helps to explain the striking gentility of certain passages, as well as the exceptional importance attached to small material comforts that most white people would take for granted. The sympathetic white reader, once he appreciates the difficult position of this refined colored girl, by transferring an allied psychology to the book itself will perceive the drama beneath even such a line as "The food was wholesome, well cooked, and attractively garnished." It is a world in which such little things mean much: a touching world, its humility displayed through its pride. The book attempts to idealize this polite colored world in terms of the white standards that it has adopted. And here lies the root of Miss Fauset's artistic errors. When she parades the possessions of her upper classes and when she puts her lovers through their Fauntleroy courtesies, she is not only stressing the white standards that they have adopted; she is definitely minimizing the colored blood in them. This is a decided weakness, for it steals truth and life from the book. Is not the most precious part of a Negro work of art that which is specifically Negroid, which none but a Negro could contribute?

We need not look far for the reason for Miss Fauset's idealization. It is pride, the pride of a genuine aristocrat. And it is pride also that makes her such a remarkable psychologist. However many her artistic errors, Miss Fauset has a rare understanding of people and their motives. I suppose there is no better way to come to understand others than to be extraordinarily sensitive one's self. Every great psychologist has been a thin-skinned aristocrat. Considering the position of a sensitive, educated Negro in America, it is no wonder then that an aristocrat like Miss Fauset has idealized her little world, has made it over-elegant! Inspired by the religious motive which so many Negro writers seem to feel, she has simply been trying to justify her world to the world at large. Her mistake has consisted in trying to do this in terms of the white standard.

"To be a Negro in America posits a dramatic situation." Yes, and to be one of Miss Fauset's amber-tinted, well-to-do, refined Negroes—not having to deal much with whites, but surrounded on all sides by the white standard—posits a delicate psychological situation. It is for this reason that few white novels have anything like the shades of feeling to be found in "The Chinaberry Tree." Every moment speaks of yearning. That is why, once it is seen as a whole, even its faults are charming, for the story they tell is poignant and beautiful, too.

GERALD SYKES

Our Economic Muddle

Is Capitalism Doomed? By Lawrence Dennis. Harper and Brothers. $3.

Money for Tomorrow. By W. E. Woodward. Liveright. $2.

NO American writer has dealt more brilliantly or provocatively with the flaws and absurdities of our economic order than Lawrence Dennis. While most economists are busying themselves with the question of maintaining the volume of credit and preventing a repetition of the speculative orgy of 1928-29, or are seeking to correlate production and consumption, Mr. Dennis challenges the fundamental assumptions upon which modern capitalism rests—the possibility of obtaining speculative profits by "judicious investment" and the practicability of compound interest over an extended period of time. We have all been hoodwinked, he assures us, by "the fallacy that money can be made by investment selection or stock trading"; a truly scientific investment policy would seek to approximate the average return on all invested capital—about 3 per cent.

Sooner or later, Mr. Dennis believes, the combination of credit inflation and compound interest is bound to bring capitalism to its knees. As long as credit does not outrun real wealth, no particular hazard is confronted; but as the economic structure ages, the burden of indebtedness begins to weigh more and more heavily upon the productive forces in society. The deflection of too large a portion of the national income into the pockets of the well-to-do classes leads to overexpansion of factories and other productive units, while the relative decline in purchasing power of the working class reduces the demand for the aggregate output. The fate of agriculture during the past decade may be taken as a case in point. The farmer's misfortunes have not come, as is often asserted, because he has not been business-like enough, but rather because he has attempted to transform agriculture into a "business" by capitalizing it upon the basis of potential profits.

The section on foreign investments is in itself worth more than the price of the book. Written prior to the investigation of the Senate Finance Committee, it levels a withering fire not only upon the international bankers who foisted tremendous quantities of worthless paper upon a gullible public, but also upon American commercial policy in general, which sought to build prosperity on foreign trade which was supported solely by paper credit. As a substitute the author suggests widespread social expenditures financed by increased taxation. Even waste, in this sense, is held to be far sounder as an economic principle than savings accumulated in the hands of the few through public "economies."

Traditional critics will undoubtedly find many points at which they will disagree violently with Mr. Dennis. Nevertheless, they will find themselves very much on the defensive as regards his fundamental thesis, which after all is merely a twentieth-century version of Karl Marx. The book deserves a wide reading, and would probably have one if it were not for its unfortunate style. Written to provoke controversy, it is likely merely to antagonize less robust souls.

"Money for Tomorrow" is also Marxian in many of its broad criticisms of the capitalist order. Popularly written, it seeks to reveal the esoteric mysteries of economics to the man on the street. This approach may account for, although it scarcely excuses, a disregard for exact economic terminology, and the naive acceptance of some very dubious proposals for remedying the existing situation.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Prisoner of War

Time Stood Still. By Paul Cohen-Portheim. E. P. Dutton Company. $3.

I DO not pretend to know anything about the mental processes of a general. I have never met one except in print and there the processes resembled an actor's post-mortem on a play that has just closed its run. "It would have been a good show if I had had the lead. The rest were a bunch of hams." Nevertheless, I can imagine a general's feelings as he reads, reads about, or at least hears about the pacifist war books with their printings as big as army divisions. I can imagine him saying: "The trouble with this war—there were too many damned civilians in it."

In their greed for big armies, in their demand for conscription, the generals spoiled the good old trade. Citizens had no stomach for military glory when they starved on rations and cowered under the sky, deadly now with raiding airplanes. Either the civilians will stop the next war, if we can assume that common sense is really common enough; or they will be too much involved to support the general's army.

All civilians suffered in the last war, those at home along with those in the trenches. But the civilians who suffered most were perhaps those whom the outbreak of the war trapped in a hostile country. The war spirit, of course, is never very discriminating. Among the many thousands of Germans, Austrians, and Turks-by-statistics who were confined in the internment pens in England, were many who had settled in the country, had married English wives, and had English children; many, too, who were there through mere clerical errors which the authorities were too busy, too suspicious, or too patriotic to rectify.

In "Time Stood Still," we are given a remarkably sane, judicious, and interesting report of what happened to the civilian war prisoners of England, by a writer who is restrained, tolerant, and sensitive. In fact, if the book fails in any respect, it is perhaps in being too tolerant. In the effort to keep it from being an indictment of the English people, his admiration for whom has survived his evil experience, he represses his emotions and mutes the horrors. He remembers that the same sadism and hysterics characterized the treatment of interned prisoners in his own country. But the few instances in the book where we can regret this repression show up as the defects of an undeniable virtue.

Mr. Cohen-Portheim was in London at the outbreak of the war designing costumes for the opera. A cultivated Viennese artist, at home in France and England, he had many English friends, among them people of influence. The latter did what they could to guard him from discomfort and humiliation but the propaganda against the "uns and biby killers" had done its work. His friends could not protect him and he was herded into an encampment in the Isle of Man. From here, when he had become acclimated and, by relative standards, comfortable, he was transferred to what was called a "gentleman's" camp, gentility being determined by the amount of money at the inmate's disposal.

The gentlemen included some few fourteen-carat aristocrats, but the mass were petty business men. The ineradicable love for distinctions worked itself out here and the three camps into which the three thousand men were divided soon established an aristocracy, a middle class, and a proletariat, or rather a Bohemia. What is even more astonishing, the barbed wire between them became as potent as international frontiers in developing within each group a definite nationalist psychology with patriotic illusions and hatreds. Deprived of any practical opportunities to hate a nation de jure they hated the nations de facto that lived in the neighboring barbed-wire inclosures.

The greatest miseries were the congestion which made privacy impossible; the celibacy enforced for four years; the idleness which induced a morbid search for hobbies and distractions; the constant supervision; and the destruction of the sense of responsibility. Each of these in turn elaborated other types of suffering. The congestion and want of privacy, for instance, resulted in psychopathic irritations with one's neighbors; celibacy resulted in peculiar neurotic friendships, although there was no overt, physical homosexuality. And to the general suffering each man added the morbidity of his personal tragedy. The English wives, for instance, turned one by one from their interned husbands. Patriotism made betrayal honorable. There were suicides and lunacies, and this dreadful level of misery was not even stable. It was disturbed by crises in the persecution, by regulations and the usual guard tyranny. Reverses brought revenges in the form of additional restrictions. The new rules were usually called reprisals against German atrocities. English public opinion was convinced that the Germans were torturing interned Englishmen, while they were coddling their interned Germans. Toward the end, the food stringency led to what was nothing less than gradual starvation for these prisoners.

By a high quality of interpretative insight, by philosophical detachment, and by the many resources of his sensitive and cultivated mind, Mr. Cohen-Portheim makes this terrible story continuously absorbing. These qualities, which he has already shown in his volume, "England, The Unknown Isle," give the incidents of the book extensions into every corner of our civilization. While it is not a work of genius like Cummings's "The Enormous Room," which gave an account of a French war prison, it goes far beyond that masterpiece in making clear the psychological corrosions worked by war upon every element of western humanity.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

Shorter Notices

Your Mexican Holiday. A Modern Guide. By Anita Brenner. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

The American tourist is beginning to find Mexico, following the trail blazed a decade or more ago by writers, painters, and poets, who wanted, if not permanent escape, at least relief from the drab dullness of Coolidge prosperity, Volsteadism, and our machine-made civilization. An up-to-date guide book to supplement the recent prolific literature concerning our Southern neighbor has been needed. Terry's "Mexico," which was not without merit, has long since become obsolete and the "revised" edition was a transparent bit of publisher's racketeering. Now Anita Brenner, an American born in Mexico, who has lived there a large part of her young life, has written a superb traveler's vade mecum. Apart from its wealth of indispensable up-to-the-minute information concerning what to see, wear, eat, and drink, and how, it is packed with pertinent background material which within its limits helps to make the complexities of the Indo-Hispanic culture vivid and more intelligible. Virtually everything that any voyager to Mexico may seek—be it archeology, architecture, art, beer, crafts, fishing, hunting, mountain-climbing, music, primitive cultures, sea- or sun-bathing, tamales or tequila—is to be found in its well-ordered three hundred pages, supplemented by excellent maps and diagrams. Veteran and novice alike will be the better equipped for the Mexican adventure by the possession of this admirable little volume.

The Faraway Bride. By Stella Benson. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

The author of "The Faraway Bride" insists upon the parallelism of her book and the story of Tobit in the Apocrypha to the point of including the latter in an appendix. The acknowledgment was not, perhaps, strictly necessary; but knowledge of the source only adds to the distinction of the retelling. This time Tobit and the subsidiary characters are not Jews in a foreign land, but white Russians living the life of exiles in Manchuria and Korea. And out of this the author has constructed a comedy of extraordinary warmth and reality. The novel more than deserves the prizes that have honored its unusual distinction.

Tom of Bedlam's Song. With Introduction and Notes by David Greenhood. San Francisco: Helen Gentry.

There is no more amazing poetry than the almost divine poetry of madness, for as Mr. Greenhood says, "in imagination we go with them, whose whole selves are our half selves." And the best of the poetry of madness, as has long been known, is the prized but too little read Tom of Bedlam's song. There were many of these songs, most of them, of course, of little literary value.

For many years previous to the Restoration [writes Mr. Greenhood], Bethlehem Hospital was obliged from time to time to release certain patients who had no private income and who were not too dangerously insane to fare as they might in the world. These were the Toms of Bedlam, and, of course, they led strange careers. The common attitude toward madness being one of amused wonder, these roving lunatics gathered alms by being the song-and-dance men of their time.

The edition printed in this beautiful little book is a combination of the famous stanzas chosen by Alice Meynell along with certain others having the full flavor of beggars' slang and poetry. Here is the best possible grouping of the stanzas and a complete bibliography of all references to this prized song, several passages of variorum, Francis Thompson's favorite stanzas, and many very illuminating notes on the text. The introduction by David Greenhood is a charming piece of critical prose. The illustrations have caught the full flavor of the poem, a difficult achievement. The illustrator exhibits a fine taste and subtle imagination. The book itself, hand-printed by Helen Gentry, is an artistic piece of work; it will be mentioned, probably, among the best of such books. As for the poem, it speaks for itself in such lines as these:

With a thought I took for Maudlin,
And a cruse of cokle pottage,
With a thing thus tall,
Sky bless you all,
I befell into this dotage.

I slept not since the Conquest.
Till then I never waked,
Till the roguish boy
Of love where I lay
Me found and stript me naked.

The Golden Mountain. Marvellous Tales of Rabbi Israel Baal Shem and of his Great-Grandson, Rabbi Nachman, Retold from Hebrew, Yiddish, and German sources by Meyer Levin. Illustrated by Marek Szwarc. Cape and Ballou. $3.

Mr. Levin has cleverly linked together a handful of stories to furnish a legendary biography of the Baal Shem Tov, a pious and genial sage who was the founder of the Chassidic sect. To these folk-tales the author has appended several more literary narratives reputed to have been written by Rabbi Nachman, the great-grandson of the Baal Shem. The latter, weighed down as they are with a rather complicated symbolism, are less attractive than the legends which cluster around the elder saint, but they serve to emphasize some points in his teachings. The writing is generally simple and agreeable, the author attempting, not always successfully, to retain the folk character of the original. A helpful preface offers an introduction to Chassidism and its founder which should stimulate the reader to further explorations. The stoutest rationalist, if he can respond to poetry at all, must find a charm in these tales, each of which holds in its fantastic wrappings a kernel of spiritual truth.

The Indian Peasant Uprooted. A Study of the Human Machine. By Margaret Read. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

Last year (1931) a Royal Commission on Labor in India issued an eighteen-volume report of an investigation which had lasted about two years. This presented more material than any but the most specialized student would care to explore in full, and Miss Read has therefore summarized it in a small book, endeavoring to liven it up for the general reader. Industrial workers in India are persons squeezed out of village life by economic pressure rather than attracted by the profits of a new kind of labor, and their center of interest tends to remain in the villages. Although India is one of the eight great industrial countries of the world, her workers suffer all the evils of a young industrialism. No more striking fact could be mentioned in that connection than the infant-mortality rate in the city of Bombay, where cotton mills are numerous: during the year 1927 it was 319.12 per thousand (in 1921 it was 672.12). Some careless errors appear in the book, as on page 6, where cotton weaving and spinning are said to employ a total of 337,000 persons, of whom 118,000 are in Bombay City, 70,000 in Ahmedabad, and 232,000 elsewhere in the Bombay Presidency! To say nothing of those employed in other parts of India! The different industries are studied separately. The book is useful and will go a long way toward satisfying everyone but the sociological specialist.

Rural Russia under the Old Regime: A History of the Land-lord-Peasant World and a Prologue to the Peasant Revolution of 1917. By Geroid Tanquary Robinson. Longmans, Green and Company. $4.

Rural Russia before 1917 was substantially all Russia. This book may be considered, therefore, a history of Russia up to the recent revolution, though it pays scant attention to the succession in the dynasty and the stumbling to greatness of the Russian Empire. It is a very valuable book, but unfortunately not a readable one. Mr. Robinson shows by instances throughout the book that he can write with distinction and charm. But the scholar too often interrupts the writer. Conclusions are obscured by qualifications; the narrative is halted by a constant discussion of sources and evidence. The rhythm approximates, not deliberately of course, that of the slow effort of the peasant to free himself from oppression. Mr. Robinson demonstrates convincingly how Czardom took for granted that it must live by oppression, always allying itself with a class that conceived its situation in the same terms. The abolition of serfdom in the 1860's was an attempt to help the landowning class, which suffered in international competition by the inefficiency of its slave economy. After the revolution of 1905 Czardom sought to strengthen itself by fostering a class of capitalist peasants. In this record of consistent class favoritism by the old regime is to be found the explanation for the vengeful class consciousness of the Russian people after the revolution of 1917.

The Paradox of Plenty. By Harper Leech. Whittlesey House. $2.50.

One of the bright young newspapermen who, as the Federal Trade Commission's investigation revealed, helped along the propaganda work of the power trust, has written a book on the thesis that "this is not a depression, it is a mishandling of the greatest era of plenty the world has ever known." This realization synchronizes fittingly with the collapse of the Insull outfit which supplied this Chicago Tribune writer with some of the information which he then passed on to the public as his own. The book which, incidentally, is dedicated to one of the well-known high-pressure Insull publicity men, is a curious medley of shrewd observations and banalities. It shows the influence of the electrical environment and yet exhibits sufficient detachment to assert that "The Man of Prey is the authentic sire of capitalistic civilization. . . ." The author clearly has first-hand information on the subject. He concludes with a plea for "a simpler world." Anyone who has attempted to explore the mazes of modern public utility structures will second the motion.

Contributors to This Issue

ROBERT A. MACKAY, professor of Political Science at Dalhousie University, Halifax, is the author of "The Unreformed Senate of Canada."

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN is the author of "Why We Fought."

CONRAD AIKEN was awarded the Pulitzer prize in 1930 for his "Selected Poems."

JOSEPH AUSLANDER is the translator of "The Sonnets of Petrarch."

MAX NOMAD is the author of "Rebels and Renegades."

WILLIAM HARLAN HALE is the author of "Challenge to Defeat: Modern Man in Goethe's World and Spengler's Century."

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

PLAYS

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN With GLENN ANDERS
DOROTHY STICKNEY, MARGARET WYCHERLY, JOHN BEAL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."
—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

BOOTH THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

Another Language—Booth—45 St., W. of B'way.

Bridal Wise—Cort—W. 48 St.

Of Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.

Show Boat—Casino—7 Ave. at 50 St.

That's Gratitude—Waldorf—50th St. E. of B'way.

The Cat and the Fiddle—Cohan—43 St. & B'way.

The Nation Radio Hour

is now every Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock over WEVD, New York.

Oswald Garrison Villard speaks on Wednesday, July 26. Joseph W. Krutch, Henry Hazlitt and Mauritz Hallgren during August.

SCHOOLS

THE LITTLE RED SCHOOL HOUSE
A PROGRESSIVE ELEMENTARY SCHOOL
196 BLEECKER ST., N. Y. CITY
Tuition $125 a Year
For Circular apply to ELISABETH IRWIN,
Director

THE NEW STATESMAN AND NATION

ENGLAND'S LEADING WEEKLY REVIEW

Editor—KINGSLEY MARTIN,
Lately on "Manchester Guardian"

Postal Subscription: 30s yearly to any address

Specimen copy on application and mention of this paper

10 GREAT QUEEN STREET,
LONDON, W. C. 2

□ TO RENT □

FOR RENT—furnished Colonial Virginia house, 6 large rooms and bath, 5 fireplaces, 165 acres, half mile from station, store and nearest neighbor, no telephone or electricity, unimproved roads, in Blue Ridge foothills, 10 miles from Lynchburg, near James River. House, 110 years old, recently reconditioned, available September 1, for writer who wants isolation at very low living cost—rent nominal to proper party. Box 721, c/o The Nation.

FOR SALE OR RENT

CHARMING summer house and 8 acres of land in Watchung Mountains, 560 feet above sea. Six miles from Plainfield, N. J. Stone fireplace, electricity, running water, all improvements. Box 722, c/o The Nation.

THREE room bungalow with kitchenette in Mohegan Colony, Peekskill, N. Y. Two acres of beautiful land. Private. Running water. Lake nearby. Transportation facilities. Lillian Tartakowsky, 2205 Walton Ave., Bronx, N. Y. Apt. B 5. Sedgwick 3-0983.

HOME—year round. CROTON-ON-HUDSON, N. Y. Complete comfort, 5 rooms, tile bath, heated garage attached. Lawn and garden space. Village water. Electricity. Pyroflux gas, one third acre. Box 726, c/o The Nation.

FOR SALE

SMALL summer house in Watchung Mountains, fully furnished, all conveniences, one-half acre wooded ground, interesting community. Swimming, tennis. Commuting distance. Price $1,500.00. B. Blau, Free Acres, R. D. 1, Scotch Plains, N. J., or Pennsylvania 6-3500.

SUMMER RENTAL

LIMA BEANS IN THE KITCHEN GARDEN, NANTUCKET MOORS, OCEAN BEACH ¼ MILE. FROM SLEEPING PORCH YOU SEE MOONRISE OUT OF OCEAN. WILD BERRIES IN ABUNDANCE; FISHING. FOUR ROOM COTTAGE $75. TELEPHONE KATONAH 231.

HELP WANTED

LITERARY-INCLINED stenographer-reporter, female, who will take a fifty-fifty chance on possible cashing in, extended light work in the country; maintenance supplied. Box 723, c/o The Nation.

POSITION WANTED

MIDDLE aged man of twenty-five years experience in private school work would like to accompany young man on trip this fall and winter. Address Box 724, c/o The Nation.

PERSONAL

CRAZY PEOPLE: the world is full of them. Contacts, only correspondence club for the isolated few intellectuals connects you with debunked, original, independent thinkers, who remained sane in a bughouse civilization. Send 3c stamp for details. Contacts, 211 East 11th Street, N. Y. C.

THE American Gymnosophical Association offers membership to intellectual men and women of cultivated taste. Our facilities are a private gymnasium and swimming pool in New York City; a lovely 60 acre farm in New Jersey; calisthenics and games under expert teachers. Kindly send 4c postage for further particulars. Address Box 705, c/o The Nation.

A WOMAN who has worked for 42 years at 61 years of age finds herself without a dollar through no fault of her own but a victim of circumstances. Her part time position barely pays living expenses. Her life has been a living sacrifice for others. She is trying to get two hundred dollars to take over a small business which would give her a little more than a living. If you wish to help her full particulars will be sent by addressing Box 725, c/o The Nation.

□ RESORTS □

ReSTUPERATION CREATION
at THE CRYSTAL VILLA
Woodcliff Lake, N. J.

38 miles from N. Y. Fare 90c. Weekends—$1.00 return. Combines country pleasure with city conveniences. Ideal for convalescents. Cater to diets. Bracing walks. Bathing on premises. Wholesome Jewish-American table. Refinement. Congeniality. Rates considerably reduced. Phone Park Ridge 404.

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone: 300

Formerly a millionaire's estate. Most beautifully landscaped. A spot of rare beauty in the Ramapo hills. Finest accommodations.

Tennis, Basket and Hand Ball. Boating, Swimming on premises. Horses and Golf nearby.

1½ hours Erie R. R. Bus or route 17.

OPEN ALL YEAR

HAMBURGER'S EVERGREEN

Farmingdale, N. J. Tel. 113

Near Asbury Park and Belmar

Vegetarian Resort in Beautiful Rural Setting
Sun Baths, Sports, Bathing

Excellent Vegetarian and Dairy Meals

Rates Considerably Reduced

RIVERSIDE INN, Seymour, Conn., on Lake Housatonic. Picturesque country. Woods. Hills. Only 70 miles from New York. Swimming, boating, fishing, tennis, basket ball, ping pong. Horses. $21 per week. $3.50 per day. Telephone Derby 231-2.

FOR delightful vacations — or week-ends TOPSTONE FARM, in the Connecticut hills, restful, secluded. We keep our own saddle horses, and provide instruction. Address: R. F. D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn. Phone Ridgefield 648.

COME to the seashore for delightful weekends and vacations. The finest surf bathing on Long Island; beautiful beach and boardwalk. And at Reiber's Cottage you get most comfortable accommodations and choicest food. Reasonable rates. Belle Harbor 5-0089.

SEA GATE—Accommodations available for several guests in quiet, refined boarding home. Home cooking, special dietetic attention to children. Private boat runs to Battery daily. Moderate rates. Mrs. Blum, 4120 Manhattan Ave. ESplanade 2-8550.

CALVEYS EVERGREEN FARM
Modern Country Home — Isolated — Restful
Excellent cuisine, vegetables and dairy products from our own farm. High altitude. Beautiful Pines surroundings—bathing—fishing. 35 miles from New York on D. L. & W. $15—$17 per week. Ironia, N. J. Dover R. F. D. 2. Phone Succasunna 9 F 11.

THE FAYLAND, HUDSON, N. Y.
ALL-YEAR TOURIST stop-over. Albany Post Road U. S. 9. Four miles south of Hudson. Garage, electricity, baths, steam heat, radio, farm products. Home-cooking. Special weekly rate. Brooklyn phone, Dewey 9-1059 after 4 P.M. Mr. Dacks.

CAMP DAVIS—"The Week-End Rendezvous"
Budd Lake, N. J. $1.95 round trip.
Mountain air. Sleep in tents—gain health—vegetarian food. Jolly crowd. Sports. Nature lovers. $3. a day. $16 weekly. Weekends $4.50. R. Davis, Stanhope, N. J. Call Riverside 9-4080.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS

Mail your classified ads so they reach us Friday, to insure their appearance in the issue of THE NATION on the stands the following Thursday.

Rates: Minimum ½ inch (30 words)...$3.08
Each additional 6 words......62
Please accompany order with remittance.

THE NATION
20 VESEY ST., N. Y. C.
CORTlandt 7-3330

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

□ RESORTS □

The VEGETARIAN HOTEL

of the Catskill Mountains

fulfills your vacation requirements. Whole some natural foods, which include home baked whole wheat bread; modern conveniences; recreational facilities; fresh mountain air and sun baths. Rates are moderate. Send for detailed information—address Mrs. F. SHAFER.

The VEGETARIAN HOTEL, Woodridge, N. Y.

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship, wholesome food. Tennis.

THE HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y. Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 953

CAMP DOR-CEL for Nature lovers. Bathing, sports. Food from our own farm. Reduced rates $14 per week. Write Doris Ariewitz, Norwich, Conn., R. D. No. 7, or Phone Kingsbridge 6-9907.

ENGLISH Hospitality offered few discriminating guests. 100 lovely acres. Delightful hiking. Weekend rates $4 and $5 (Public Holidays) daily. Return fare $2.00. Trains met. Arthur Morse, Erewhon, Monroe, N. Y.

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, Warrensburg, in the Adirondacks. One minute from Echo Lake with splendid bathing. Canoes and boats for guests. Tennis court. Cabins if desired. Beautifully located. We meet all guests at Lake George. Rates $18 and $20. R. J. Venton.

VINEYARD LODGE, Ulster Park, N. Y. (near Kingston). Modern hotel amidst gorgeous 200 acre fruit farm, sunbaths, saddle horses, tennis court, social activities, refinement, congeniality. Kosher. Reduced rates $18.00-$20.00 weekly. Joseph Rosenthal. Phone Kingston 3430.

NATURE PATH MOUNTAIN FARM
Original Vegetarian dairy meals. Modern improvements, sports, sun baths. Bathing. Boating nearby. $18 week. $3 day. Excellent service. Mt. Bethel Rd., Plainfield, N. J. Plainfield 6-1474 J 1.

COLONY HOUSE PEEKSKILL, N. Y. (near Crompond Road)
Commuting distance. Vacation and week-end accommodations. Lake bathing. Deasonable rates. Directions: Mohegan Colony bus to premises. Phone Peekskill 2733.

EDUCATIONAL

CONVERSATIONAL FRENCH

Spanish - Italian - German

Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES 1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

FRENCH Spanish, Italian, German Russian, Conversational. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c. Daily 9-9. Fisher School of Languages, 1264 Lexington Av. (bet. 85-86 Sts.) East. 1905. ATwater 9-6075

□ OPEN SHELF □

Henry Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men

None may call himself George's — sent free educated in social thought (says Books Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.

ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
15 Park Place, New York City

SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

Washington Merry Go Round, formerly.	($3.00)	$1.00
Works of Ibsen (complete)		1.00
America's Primer—Morris L. Ernst		.75
Virgin Spain—Waldo Frank, III		1.50
Jefferson Davis—Allen Tate, III		1.50
Primitive Negro Sculpture—Guillaume, III		3.50
President's Daughter—Nan Britton, III		1.10
Confessions—Arthur Symons (signed)		3.50
Primitive Races of Mankind—Schmidt		3.00
Catalogs issued		Postage 10c per volume

BLACKFRIARS PRESS, 323 Fifth Ave., New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 3, 1932

No. 3500

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	93
EDITORIALS:
A Great Ambassador	95
Is It to Be Murder, Mr. Hoover?	96
The Militarists Take Prussia	98
CARTOON. By Edmund Duffy	97
GRAVE DANGER IN DETROIT. By Mauritz A. Hallgren	99
SOME SWEET-SMELLING POLITICS. By Paul Y. Anderson	102
SOVIET RUSSIA—LAND OF YOUTH. By Harry F. Ward	103
SOCIALISM AND NORMAN THOMAS	105
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	106
FINANCE: SOME NOVELTIES IN REGULATION. By S. Palmer Harman	106
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Misted Memories. By Clifton Fadiman	107
Keeper of Men. By William Seagle	107
Three Civilizations in Manchuria. By Youghill Kang	108
Socialism or Drift. By Devere Allen	109
Shorter Notices	109
Films: Nonsense and Satire. By Alexander Bakshy	111
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	111

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

DOROTHY VAN DOREN MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DEVERE ALLEN

Dramatic Editor

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Literary Editor

HENRY HAZLITT

Contributing Editors

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

MURIEL C. GRAY, Advertising Manager

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE has adjourned for six months. How little progress! What a faint response to the desires of the great masses of the nations of the earth! It is no wonder that Mussolini had read to the conference a message announcing that Italy would refuse to vote on the resolution setting forth the agreements arrived at, on the ground that voting it was a "vain effort," "entirely inadequate when compared to the wishes and hopes of the world." "It is not enough," the message read, "to lay down principles," when "no marked progress is made toward effective disarmament." To this the other nations have an effective retort if the charge made by Hector C. Bywater, in the London Telegraph, is true—that Italy is secretly building two cruisers of 6,742 tons, two 615-ton destroyers, and ten small craft, including a new type of submarine. Although seven other nations dissented, and Russia and Germany refused to vote, the resolution was none the less carried by a vote of forty-one to two. The adjournment, so the reports read, took place in an "atmosphere of good humor," accompanied by the feeling that the conference has really accomplished a good deal. The basis for this we shall treat at length in our next issue. Meanwhile it suffices to add that the new German nationalist government has served notice that, unless that nation's armament equality is recognized before the conference reassembles, Germany will not take further part in the proceedings. This brought forth a proper rebuke from the Soviet representative, M. Litvinoff, who rightly declared that the only equality to be sought was equality of disarmament and not that of armament.

"AT THE CONFERENCE I would exclude all experts. . . . They would sterilize the humanitarian impulses of angels." These sound words we take from Senator Borah's latest speech, in which he properly praised the achievements of the Lausanne Conference and favored a new international conference "to deal with any economic and financial question which would have any legitimate bearing upon the economic recovery of the world," with full and complete American participation. As The Nation has been urging this for months past, we naturally rejoice to have the Senator advocating it at last. But Mr. Borah, true to his Republican tradition, feels that the sacred tariff must not be touched by this conference, though it has the most vital bearing on the economic recovery of the world; he feels that it should be treated separately by the respective governments after everything else is disposed of—a nice way of putting the cart directly before the horse. But we are disposed to forgive the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations for this because he is bold enough to raise anew the question of further cuts or cancelation of the debts owed to us, on the ground that if it would pay us to do so we should at least carefully study the matter anew. He himself, of course, believes that further debt readjustments would open foreign markets to us, raise our price levels, decrease unemployment, and thaw out the frozen credits of the banks. This is delightful sanity after all the nonsense talked in Congress lately. We are also deeply grateful to the Senator for this solemn warning:

The stakes are tremendous. Delay is hazardous. . . .

If the upward trend does not start before the cold winds of December, conditions will be nothing less than appalling.

WHEN PRESIDENT HOOVER on July 18 signed the St. Lawrence waterway agreement with Canada, he launched not only a project of tremendous economic import to a large part of the country, but he threw into the political arena a veritable bombshell—or perhaps we should say a boomerang. The dilatory negotiations have resulted in a treaty which vitally affects New York State and at least eighteen States of the Middle West. For, after the expenditure of approximately $800,000,000, if the work already done is included, to make a passage for deep-sea vessels all the way into the Great Lakes, several cities which have hitherto been only inland shipping points will virtually become ocean ports. Naturally, New York is anxious to know whether it loses or gains. But for the lake cities affected, and the region around them, the waterway ought to be a definite asset. There is involved, however, a question not only of commerce but of water power. Governor Roosevelt has been quick to see the importance of the choice between State-produced current and private exploitation, though he has been no more nimble than usual in explaining how, without public distribution, low rates can be guaranteed to the consumer. President Hoover has now promptly claimed all the credit for himself. The treaty will certainly be an issue in the next session of the Senate if not in the campaign. Most illuminating with respect to the political sincerity of the Republican and Democratic vote-woolers has been the frantic scurrying of both national committees to rush into the platforms a belated waterway plank, after the adoption of these platforms by the conventions.

THE OTTAWA CONFERENCE has opened with a disheartening demand by Australia, Canada, and New Zealand that Great Britain at once put an embargo on Soviet lumber and wheat. The members of the conference generally believe that England will grant this. Why not, when the government is now so completely dominated by the Conservatives who, under the leadership of the same Stanley Baldwin now heading the empire delegation at Ottawa, broke off relations with Russia in May, 1927. It is now plainly to be a long drawn out question of bargaining. London, it appears, is not satisfied with the terms offered by Canada, and desires larger markets for textiles, electrical goods, and machinery for the lighter industries. Australia also demands that the mother country exclude all competitive imports from Denmark and the Argentine. Failing this, Australia "may exclude from the benefits of preference the whole of Great Britain's great staple industries"—which is mother love with a vengeance. South Africa, too, has stated its terms. Primarily, it opposes any reduction of tariffs. Indeed, the whole trend of the debate is to put on new or higher tariffs and to lower none, and thus to rivet securely upon Great Britain her newly founded protective system.

THE SUSPENSION of the Chicago Board of Trade, the principal grain-marketing agency in the United States, by a federal commission composed of the Secretaries of Commerce and Agriculture and the Attorney General is sensational enough to please the most captious. To us it seems as if the three Cabinet members had used a shotgun when they should have used a rifle, if it was necessary to discipline the officials of the Board of Trade for improper practices. As it stands, this action will tend to punish the whole country rather than the individuals responsible for the wrongdoing. The effects will be much more serious than the judges would seem to appreciate, unless we are to interpret the commission's notice that it will entertain an application for mitigation of the penalty imposed after proper hearing and proof that the Board of Trade has mended its ways as a strong hint that the penalty will not be imposed at the end of the fifteen days grace awarded. What makes the situation the more uncomfortable is the fact that there has been, from the beginning of the Farm Board, antagonism on the part of the Board of Trade against the former and its policy. Moreover, the Chicago Board of Trade is the chief market in futures the importance of which has not been diminished by the present credit stringency.

THE PUBLIC WILL FIND it difficult to understand the involved questions relating to the approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the concentration of four Eastern rail systems around the Pennsylvania, the New York Central, the Baltimore and Ohio, and the Van Sweringen railroads. As Commissioner Eastman remarks, the public is at present only interested in keeping the wolf from coming through the door. He himself, in his dissenting opinion, is very severe upon the new plan. Congress, he points out, asked the commission to prepare a plan, and then he adds that "events suggest that it would have been simpler to have asked a few of the larger railroads to agree upon a plan for the distribution of the lesser railroads among them." The majority of the commission urges the scheme because it is "practical." Mr. Eastman points out that it has largely been put into effect without waiting for the commission's decision, often illegally and, in the case of the Pennsylvania, arrogantly, without regard for the commission, the law, or public opinion. He also condemns it as an Eastern scheme, when it should have been part of a united plan for the entire country. Meanwhile, one smiles as one remembers the Clayton Act, the Northern Securities case, and the repeated efforts, decade after decade, to prevent railroads from coming together to limit or do away with competition.

LONG UNDER ATTACK by its enemies, the power trust now appears to be losing its friends. The latest blow comes from the Federal Power Commission. Desiring to adopt a more stable policy in issuing licenses for water-power projects, the commission set out a year ago to study the many questions raised in this connection by the Federal Power Act. It had no intention of investigating the financial relationships of the utility companies, for that was "beyond the scope of this inquiry." But it found holding companies playing such a large part in the power industry and the financial arrangements within the industry so involved that it had perforce to look into these relationships in order to get the information it was seeking. In a preliminary report just issued the commission said that it had found ten "top companies" in the industry controlling ninety-one subsidiaries operating in 12,487 communities, these communities having a total population exceeding 42,000,000. The "top companies" were connected by interlocking directorates and by other means. So amazed were the commissioners by these and similar discoveries that in their report they recommended "public control" over holding companies, supervision of all contracts between holding and operating companies, and other measures "providing specifically for the filing of financial and other reports on prescribed forms for full publicity."

AN ESPECIALLY ATROCIOUS "third degree" murder by policemen in Nassau County, Long Island, has aroused public opinion to a high pitch in New York City. Already five policemen have been indicted for first-degree manslaughter, and eight for second-degree assault. The victim was Hyman Stark, who was charged with robbing and assaulting the mother of a detective. He and his two associates were horribly maltreated, policeman after policeman pounding them without the slightest regard for their shrieks of mercy. Finally one man who weighed over 250 pounds "rocked" on the body of Stark with one foot on the throat of the victim and one on his body with the result that the victim died soon after being taken to a hospital. Fortunately, there were honest and upright prosecuting officers, and a justice, Steinbrink, who rightly declared that this sort of criminality "reduces law-enforcement agencies to the same low level as the criminal element." Precisely, but that did not prevent a committee of the New York County Criminal Courts Bar Association from taking this opportunity to bring in a report declaring that "instances of such abuses are few" in New York and adding the usual remark that it would be dangerous to limit police activities for "they must not be hampered" in dealing with criminals. Year after year The Nation has appealed to the bar associations in New York to do something to stop this horrible evil, but in vain; the Bar will not clear itself of its share of the guilt. This latest action is the more discreditable to the profession because in the Wickersham report it was stated that "the third degree is widely and brutally employed in New York City."

A GREAT AND INSPIRED TEACHER, a scientist of international renown, a diligent, enthusiastic searcher after the truth—this was Dr. Graham Lusk, for twenty-three years professor of physiology in Cornell Medical College, who has just died at the age of sixty-six. Here was an American who really was a world authority in his field of nutrition; whose scholarship was recognized as notably in Vienna, Berlin, Munich, London, Glasgow, and Edinburgh as in his own country; whose presence on an international commission made that body at once distinguished and forceful. But no one who knew him in such a capacity could possibly measure his influence upon his students. He had not only much knowledge to bestow, he had the rare gift of personality and a charm which were never to be forgotten by those who came into contact with him. To these he added, to the very end of his life, an unquenchable enthusiasm, an absolute mental integrity, and a devotion to his work surpassed only by the unselfishness and—in the manliest sense—sweetness of his nature. These may seem extravagant words. They are true and just. We give place to them all the more gladly, in this hour of the complete moral and intellectual bankruptcy of our political leaders and our captains of industry, so that our readers may not forget that there are still great men and noble men among us, and still some teachers at whose feet it is a priceless privilege to sit.

ACCORDING TO A DISPATCH duly printed in the daily press this great country of ours is about to be rescued from its present desperate plight by the benevolent activities of an insect. We are not, dear reader, being flip-pant about our President or any of his aids, for we allude quite literally to a certain hexapod, commonly known as the boll weevil, which is reported to be destroying in a highly gratifying fashion the cotton now growing in Southern fields and thus satisfactorily supplying the lack of that drouth or other natural calamity for which all economists are so devoutly praying. We hope, of course, that he will do his work as thoroughly as need be, but it is evident nevertheless that our national government has again been detected in gross incompetence. Why has it spent thousands upon thousands of dollars in destroying this benevolent insect, and in destroying it so effectively that the poor farmer has to depend upon mere chance to provide it for him when necessity arises? In the future, we hope that no boll weevils will be killed. Let them be confined, segregated, and fed at the public expense. Then the next time we are threatened with ruin because we have too much of everything, the remedy will be in our hands, so far, at least, as this particular commodity, cotton, is concerned. Washington will simply have to release boll weevils in correctly controlled numbers and Dixie will be happy again.

A Great Ambassador

IN one of his speeches after the United States entered the war Ambassador Jusserand quoted approvingly a saying of Marcus Aurelius which read, in part: "Never value anything as profitable to thyself which shall compel thee . . . to hate any man. . . ." It was a sentiment which his government and that of the United States should have made their own during the war. They refused, but the Ambassador lived up to it. From the beginning to the end of that struggle M. Jusserand never made a provocative or an imperialistic or a bitter, hate-creating speech. What higher praise could be given to him, save to add that, ■ we pointed out when he retired, he never struck ■ single false note and never undertook to tell the United States how to run its own affairs in all the crowded years in which he served the French Republic in Washington? To this wisdom and self-restraint, he added in his person, modesty, ■ simple bearing, and the charm of the witty scholar.

It was not merely to his own fine qualities and his tact that he owed his success, but to his complete understanding of the Americans, in which he was surpassed only by Lord Bryce, and to his mastery of English—to that his numerous contributions to The Nation prior to its present editorship testify eloquently. His whole conduct of his difficult office in the war years shone by contrast with the egregious blundering of the German Embassy which first evidenced the usual German failure to understand the psychology of other peoples, then struck one wrong note after the other, and finally became the headquarters of a group of miscreants whose leader, Heaven save the mark, is now Chancellor of Germany and dictator of Prussia. Jusserand was always the gentleman, the sorrowing patriot, who placed dignity and discretion above all else and therefore nobly served his country. It was not his fault that his country's policies became what they were, and certainly it was no responsibility of his that the high tide of American admiration and friendship—never wholly justified by the facts—has ebbed so quickly.

That the recession pained him to the quick admits of no doubt; his last public utterance to be printed in this country proves that. But he was philosopher enough to understand and be patient. It is to be hoped that he was not too ill to know of the new and finer French attitude at Lausanne, the statesmanlike recession from impossible and hate-creating reparations demands. His satisfaction over that could not in the least bit have been diminished by the fact that the Prime Minister to initiate this wise course was the same Herriot who, in 1924, retired M. Jusserand.

Was his success in considerable part due to his being ■ man of letters? We have often wondered. Certainly Bryce and some of our own literary diplomats, such as John Lothrop Motley, James Russell Lowell, and John Hay, played their parts well when called upon to represent their countries abroad. But the question arises whether that was not rather due more to the largeness of the men themselves, and their freedom from political ambition, than to their polish, their literary skill, or the deep draughts they had drunk at the fountain of letters. At least that country is fortunate, indeed, which produces ■ Jusserand to speak for it in its hour of need.

Is It to Be Murder, Mr. Hoover?

IS it to be mass murder, Herbert Hoover? Murder by starvation, murder by disease, murder by killing all hope—and the soul? We ask, Mr. President, because this terrible fate is now staring multitudes in the face in the sight of plenty and because the responsibility now rests entirely upon you. Congress has adjourned after voting only $300,000,000 for direct relief—and that only for the States. No one can call it together again for five months except you. Day by day more cities approach the line of bankruptcy; day by day the plight of the individual States of the Union gets worse. In community after community the authorities and the leading citizens can see no hope whatever of heading off the starvation of innocents. And that is murder, Mr. President, cold-blooded and utterly unnecessary murder, far worse than if the victims were to be stood up against a wall and shot down by firing squads. Every death by starvation today—and there are men, women, and children perishing daily because of plain lack of food and undernourishment—must be charged up against the government of the United States, and in the last analysis against you. That is not merely because you are President, but because you as an individual have from the first set your face against direct federal relief to those who through no fault of their own are without work and food. You are deeply and sincerely convinced that if necessary it is better that some should starve than that multitudes should have their characters wrecked, and their initiative killed by a dole.

But Mr. President, are you living in the United States? Do you know what is happening? Do you know that it is no longer the starvation of a few which is at hand? We ask these questions because your statement to the press on July 17 indicates that you are living entirely detached from the actual situation, that you do not know what is happening under the flag of which you are the chief guardian. You stated on that day that you would sign the so-called relief bill granting $300,000,000 for temporary loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation "to such States as are absolutely unable to finance the relief of distress." You then went on to say that, through this provision, "We have a solid back log of assurance that there need be no hunger and cold in the United States." You added that these loans were to be based only upon "absolute need and evidence of financial exhaustion," and concluded with the statement: "I do not expect any State to resort to it except as a last extremity." Even before you had signed the bill, no less than thirty States, in the face of your language, announced their intention to apply for this money in testimony to their absolute need, financial exhaustion, and their being at the last extremity. Some of the largest States in the Union were among those on the list, and they will ask for all they can get. Only eighteen of the forty-eight States were still to be heard from when you made the bill a law, and some of these are going to apply just as soon as they know exactly what the law contains. Is it any wonder that we ask you if you know what is happening in the United States today?

Again, we ask you this question because your assurance in saying that these $300,000,000, to be loaned to the States for "direct" assistance to the unemployed, will save the cities leads us to believe that you do not read a single daily newspaper, and that your entourage is concealing the facts from you. Have you not heard that city authorities in St. Louis and the charitable agencies have just turned adrift 13,000 families which they can no longer support, while the city of Detroit has dropped 18,000 who now have nowhere to turn, no assurance that even a single crust of bread will be forthcoming for their support? Have you not learned that the city of Bridgeport, and other cities and towns in Connecticut have let it be known that if the State does not come to their aid at once they have no hope whatever of caring further for their unemployed, their own resources being entirely exhausted? Did you read that eight hundred men marched into the Indiana State Capitol last week demanding food, declaring that if they were not given help they would return 300,000 strong? Have you learned that the police in St. Louis have already fired on a mob demanding bread? Have you not read of the town of Clinton, Mass., where on July 7 "more than three hundred men, women, and crying children crowded the corridors of the Town Hall appealing for food"—only to learn that the town treasury has been exhausted, that it is unable to borrow a cent from any bank, and that it has been, and still is, trying to support one out of every six residents of the town who are destitute? These are not exceptional cases; they can be multiplied a hundredfold and from almost every section of the country. Is it any wonder, Mr. President, that thirty States moved at once? And how long do you think the $300,000,000 is going to last in the face of this? Do you not yourself read, Mr. President, of the horrible cases of self-destruction of parents who can no longer feed their children? Did you not read of the man in New York who jumped from a bridge because he could not stand the agony of coming home to seven starving children for whom he could not get one cent of relief from city or charity? Has no one told you of Anthony Prasol of Northampton, Mass., father of eight children who killed himself because he had no hope of work or aid, or of the children of the Sandoval family of Oakland, Cal., who died of poisoning because they sought to live on decayed food picked up in the streets? Again, these are not exceptional cases; they can be duplicated every hour of the day all over the land.

The eight hundred Indianians who marched on their legislature declared that they were facing "mass starvation or suicide." That is what the whole country is facing, Mr. President. You have boasted of the absence of bloodshed and rioting in this depression. Beware! Be guided by the signs of the approaching despair of multitudes. We know that the regular troops are ready, and that the National Guard has been specially coached in riot drill. But their guns are no remedy, Mr. President. They will merely add to the horror of the situation. What is to come? Must Americans perish miserably because of your fear that their characters may be sullied by a dole? Is it to be mass murder, Mr. President? The answer rests with you and you alone.

"—WE HAVE A SOLID
BACKLOG OF ASSURANCE THAT THERE NEED BE NO HUNGER OR COLD
IN THE UNITED STATES."

STATEMENT BY HERBERT HOOVER
(FROM THE WHITE HOUSE)
CYCLONE CELLAR

The Militarists Take Prussia

CHANCELLOR von Papen did not hesitate long in seizing power in Prussia. Whether he did so with the connivance of Adolf Hitler and the fascists matters little. The republicans of Germany are now confronted with an accomplished fact. The Republic itself survives—but only on paper. More than two-thirds of its people and territory are now under a military dictatorship. The shell of the Weimar Constitution remains, of course, but apparently only to serve the purposes of the militarists. They are emphatically declaring that they acted wholly in accordance with the rules laid down in that document. But precisely the same position was taken by Luttwitz, Ehrhardt, and the other reactionary leaders during the Kapp Putsch in March, 1920. They captured the central government by a surprise march on Berlin, established what they called a "Government of Labor," and then sought to justify their coup d'état by declaring that they were merely seeking "to restore the essence and spirit of the Weimar Constitution, which had been shamefully mishandled by the legitimate government." Now the very same groups have seized power, using the very same excuses; but this time the militarists, junkers, industrialists, and other extreme nationalists appear likely to succeed. But it would be the success of machine-gun rule, not of honest government.

In 1920 the reaction was defeated by the discipline of the organized workers. The Berlin Government had been forewarned, but sought to ignore the warnings. It was not prepared to offer resistance when the reactionary troops came through the Brandenburger Tor and marched up Wilhelmstrasse to take over the government offices. The Cabinet fled to Dresden. But the working class was ready to fight and die for the Republic, which was then less than two years old. The leaders of the trades unions and Social Democratic Party promptly published a manifesto calling upon their members to strike. "Everything is at stake," the appeal read. "No business must be run so long as Ludendorff's military dictatorship prevails. Therefore cease work. Strike! Cut off the resources of this reactionary clique. Fight with all means for the maintenance of the Republic. Let there be a general strike all along the line. Proletarians, unite! Down with the counter-revolution!" So successful was the general strike that the industry and business of the entire country was tied up within a few hours, and five days later the militarists and nationalists admitted defeat.

That was twelve years ago. Despite the hardships of the war, the German labor movement, for years the best-disciplined and best-organized in Europe, remained the only stable force in the country. Since then the strength of the labor movement has been eaten away by inflation, continued unemployment, the economic disintegration of recent years, and the wavering policies of its own leaders. Today as never before the workers of Germany are beaten, without hope. A working class cannot subsist on starvation rations for years and expect to retain enough strength and spirit to combat an offensive such as that launched against the German workers and lower middle class by Hindenburg, Von Schleicher, and Von Papen. Therefore, if we except the editorial outcry of the Rote Fahne, the Communist organ, there has been no demand whatever for a general strike to crush the latest attempt to set up a military dictatorship. The workers are taking their whipping lying down. For this reason, and for this reason alone, is the dictatorship likely to remain in power for some time to come.

However, there is still real danger that the new regime may precipitate bloodshed, perhaps civil war. We do not yet know what part Hitler has played in the maneuverings of Von Schleicher and Von Papen. If the militarists come to terms with the fascists, these two groups together can probably dominate Germany without fear of serious or important opposition from the Socialists and Communists. In that event we may see a coalition government in which Hitler and his lieutenants would be given some portfolios, but with the actual power remaining in the hands of the Reichswehr generals. Such a government, though resting in the final analysis upon the bayonets of the army, would have the unquestionably valuable support of the increasingly popular fascist movement. On the other hand, if Hitler should win a majority in the Reichstag elections of July 31 and decide thereupon that he wants all or nothing, there may be trouble ahead. It is hardly to be supposed that the militarists would have taken such energetic measures in Prussia had they any idea that they would soon have to yield their newly-gained authority to Hitler.

Having captured Prussia, will the militarists now move against the other German states? And if they do, what will be the result thereof? A dictatorship for the whole of Germany, or a dissolution of the federation created by Bismarck in 1871? It is worth noting that Von Papen is moving with great caution in his relations with the other states. He must be aware of the deep-seated antagonisms that divide Munich, Stuttgart, and Karlsruhe from Berlin. He must know that there is strong sentiment, particularly in Bavaria, for separation from Prussia. He has his hands full in governing the latter state, and more than full in trying to solve the German economic puzzle. It is likely that he will not seek to make his task altogether impossible by proceeding against the other states, especially when he does not know to what lengths they are prepared to go in resisting an extension of the dictatorship to their territories.

But the sight of a military regime in Prussia is terrible enough. Whatever may be the outcome of this dread-inspiring development, is it not fresh proof of the utter folly of believing that good may come out of the crime of war? Even Mr. Wilson, we believe, were he alive, would have to admit that, with the old guard again in charge in Berlin only fourteen years after the armistice, with democracy collapsing everywhere in favor of dictatorship, with armaments greatly grown since 1914 and the League of Nations weak and ineffective, and with our own country deep in economic disaster, it would be impossible today to claim a single solid gain as a result of our determination to enter the World War in order to make over the world by wholesale murder in favor of the Fourteen Points and the establishment of permanent peace.

Grave Danger in Detroit

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Detroit, July 21

DETROIT'S bankers and business men are more than thankful that Mayor Murphy's police still have the whiphand in this city. Genuine rebellion is smoldering here. It is constantly manifesting itself in numerous ways. Wherever one goes through the working-class districts one hears positive, angry expressions of dissent, unafraid expressions of sympathy for the radicals. It is not that the Communist movement is spreading, for there is no sure evidence that it is, but the sympathies of the workers and the lower middle class, which a year ago were all for law and order, have now swung around to the unemployed and their leaders. When relief for the unemployed is reduced or cut off for a day or two, feeling among the disappointed and hungry applicants rises to fever pitch. There have been minor riots and threats of worse disturbances. Petty thievery is increasing. Windows of small retail shops are smashed at night and relieved of their goods. Children from the poorer districts have taken to snatching bundles from customers coming out of grocery stores. They run off to barren homes with their booty, or eat it themselves in out-of-the-way alleys. More frequently, grown men, usually in twos and threes, enter chain stores, order all the food they can possibly carry, and then walk quietly out without paying. Every newspaper in town knows of this practice and knows that it is spreading, but none mentions it in print. The press excuses itself on the ground that these occurrences are not a matter of public record. And the chain-store managers refuse to report such incidents to the police lest the resultant publicity encourage the practice.

While the city is quiet for the moment, the bankers, industrialists, and municipal authorities are taking no chances. Henry Ford and other automobile makers are building up private police forces recruited in large measure from the underworld. When for the sake of municipal economy city policemen have to be laid off, the best of them are immediately hired by the automobile companies. It would never do to have trained men who can shoot straight join the ranks of the unemployed. Police Commissioner Watkins has shown that he also means business. He has flooded the city, especially the factory districts, with police spies. At the Briggs plant a few weeks ago he gave the workers a foretaste of the sort of treatment they might expect if in their hunger and misery they should ever forget that they are loyal, well-behaved Americans. The workers' demonstration on Mack Avenue was put down with a show of brutality virtually unprecedented in this depression. Permission to hold the meeting, which attracted 10,000 persons, had been granted by a subordinate police official. A committee of six was elected to seek a conference with the managers of the factory. When the committee started to cross the street the factory gates opened and more than a hundred uniformed policemen swarmed out. At the same moment a score of mounted policemen, who had been waiting around the corner, galloped into the crowd, mercilessly swinging their heavy wooden clubs, and not for a moment heeding the outcries of the persons whose heads they cracked or who were trampled down by their horses. Incidentally, along with a number of demonstrators, innocent bystanders, and two newspapermen, scores of whom were severely injured, two police spies in the crowd, unable to make known their identity in time, were beaten up by the mounted police.

More significant are the preparations being made for an anti-radical drive scheduled for autumn if the unemployment situation gets no better. The Chicago Tribune's new slogan, "Now Beat the Reds," is much favored here in certain quarters. The Board of Education has already started by refusing to let the Communists use the public schools for their political meetings, although other parties are permitted to use the school halls for similar purposes. Department of Labor agents are helping by their campaign against "undesirable aliens." One hundred were arrested today; four hundred more are listed for deportation. The police, too, have of late been increasingly active. They have been picking up suspected radicals in the streets, beating them up in the police stations, and then turning them loose without bringing charges against them. The real stimulus for the anti-red campaign will probably come from the Union League of Michigan, which has asked for and received an official opinion "outlining constitutional freedom of speech." According to the opinion given by Attorney-General Voorhies, if it is applied, the right of free speech will hereafter be denied to the Communists. He declared that "the advocacy of communism is an abuse of the right of freedom of speech, and is, therefore, not protected by either the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States, or section 4 of Article 2 of the Michigan Constitution."

But the symptoms of rebellion are not confined to the workers. Among the better-paid mechanics, shopkeepers, school teachers, middle-class intellectuals, and municipal employees there are also signs of growing unrest. For one thing, there is bitterness and contempt among these people for Frank Murphy, the liberal Mayor, who is generally accused of having sold out to the bankers. Some of the men and women of these groups with whom I talked are frankly seeking a new leader through whom they can express their profound disgust with existing economic and political conditions; others are joining the Socialist Party, or at least have signified their willingness to support that party. There is a very definite revolt among the taxpayers. Some of the more influential property-owners, many of them real-estate speculators, have forced the city to call a special referendum election for August 9. At that time the voters will decide whether they wish to amend the city charter so as to limit the budget for the current fiscal year to $61,000,000, and to reduce the budget by the sum of $1,000,000 in each of the succeeding years until a final limit of $57,000,000 is reached. Last April the city council approved a budget of $72,600,000 for the current year. The municipal authorities oppose the amendment. The Common Council has already called upon the voters to defeat it, while Corporation Counsel Wilcox said he will appeal to the courts if the amendment wins.

Detroit, one of the first cities to be seriously affected by the depression, showed signs of restlessness as early as the fall of 1930. In September of that year, largely with the help of a group of liberals and with the votes of the skilled workers, school teachers, and city employees, Mayor Bowles was recalled and Frank Murphy elected in his place. The Murphy administration promptly launched an unemployment relief program which has since been criticized as extravagant and poorly administered. Whatever the justification for this charge, it can hardly be denied that the city has been compelled to cut its relief expenditures literally to a starvation basis. When I was in Detroit in the spring of 1931, more than 45,000 families were receiving welfare aid. This spring, although unemployment had increased, fewer than 25,000 families were being helped. It is asserted that many families who still possessed some small means of private support had been weeded out, and that others were dropped because "they were clearly not entitled to relief." But surely not all the 20,000 or more families who were stricken from the rolls had been obtaining relief under false pretenses. There must have been a few at least, perhaps many, who were in dire want and had nowhere else to turn for help when they were dropped. The Welfare Department's funds, which seemed so plentiful in the winter of 1930-31, were exhausted last November. The Mayor appointed an emergency relief committee to raise $2,250,000 by public subscription. The committee thought it could probably raise $1,250,000, but not more than that. Ultimately it turned only $645,000 over to the Welfare Department. Obviously the number of families receiving help had to be cut down.

But the outlook for the year which began July 1 is infinitely darker. Detroit is rapidly approaching the point where it can no longer help any of its unemployed, where it cannot even pay its employees. The new budget provides only $1,200,000 for welfare aid—winter before last the relief administration was spending twice that much in a single month. Guy A. Durgan, president of the welfare commission, announced a few days ago that 18,000 families would have to be dropped from the relief rolls. Under this arrangement a thousand were to be dropped every day with a week's food allowance, until the number of families being helped reached 6,000. The others would have to look to the county or elsewhere for help. It was planned to dismiss 370 emergency welfare workers and to close seven of the city's thirteen relief stations. In cold print this plan, which Mayor Murphy had approved, looked so alarming that the Mayor felt it necessary to repudiate the arrangement and to declare that the needed money would be found somewhere. Since then, however, another 5,000 families have been dropped from the rolls. More and more people are likely to go hungry this autumn and winter. Can it be held that there is no cause for unrest in Detroit?

Among the mistakes Mayor Murphy made at the beginning of his administration, as I pointed out in The Nation of May 13, 1931, was his appointment of James K. Watkins to be police commissioner of the city. It was extremely unwise to place a man of his background and instincts at the head of a police department in an industrial community like Detroit. Frank Murphy is an ardent and doubtless sincere advocate of free speech, but he lacks the courage to restrain his police commissioner, whose activities are destroying what is left of his reputation as a liberal.

Another mistake was his selection of G. Hall Roosevelt to manage the municipal finances. Roosevelt is banker-minded by training and sympathy. He attaches much more importance to the necessity of maintaining the city's credit—so that the city can borrow more money and thus increase its indebtedness to the banks—than he does to the simple needs of the unemployed. When he has to choose between paying the school teachers and the bankers, though he has money on hand to which the former are legally entitled, he uses that money to meet charges against notes and bonds due July 1. The teachers would have to go without, he explained, because he could "not afford to take a chance with the financial integrity of the city. We expect to have money enough to pay both teachers and other employees, as well as meet interest payments, but we haven't got it yet, and it would be taking a chance on default to use $480,000 for salaries." However sound this may be financially, it has not rid the teachers and other city employees of the notion that Roosevelt has been deliberately and consistently playing into the hands of the bankers. The teachers believe, and with some justice, that they have been cheated. In any case the city is today at the mercy of the banks. Frank Murphy is now taking orders not from the voters he represents, but from Ralph Stone, a Detroit banker representing a group of New York financial houses. At Stone's direction the Mayor has reduced relief expenditures and municipal salaries, and has sought to economize in other directions—invariably at the expense of the workers or unemployed. It may very well be that the city in this respect cannot help itself. But many Detroit residents with whom I talked blame Murphy for not having fought hard enough against the dictatorship of the bankers.

That the Mayor feels uncomfortable in his present predicament is evident. Not long ago there was held in his office a secret meeting attended by Stone, Roosevelt, other city officials, and three members of the common council. Murphy presented to this meeting a draft ordinance calling for a one-third reduction in municipal salaries—he had been reelected only a few months before on the promise that he would not cut salaries. Roosevelt indicated that he was the author of the draft ordinance. Stone, replying to a question from the Mayor, said the proposed salary cut met with his wishes. Councilman John Lodge, asked to introduce the ordinance at a special meeting of the council, said he would do so, but added that he would not support the measure. At the council session the next day it was quickly seen that the ordinance would be defeated. Councilman John Smith, former mayor, delivered a long speech bitterly assailing the bankers and denouncing the municipal administration for meekly submitting to orders from Stone. The galleries, packed with municipal employees, most of them former supporters of the Mayor, lustily applauded the speech. Murphy, admittedly a better orator than Smith, arose immediately and lashed the bankers with even more vigor. But his pitiful effort to work both sides of the street fell flat. The galleries stared down upon him in cold silence.

The ordinance was defeated, but the bankers bided their time. Two months ago a group of industrialists and bankers began a secret study of the city's finances. The other day the results of this study were announced in the form of a new financial plan, authorship of which was credited to Mayor Murphy. Yesterday the Common Council approved the Murphy plan by establishing a five-day week for municipal employees and cutting salaries  $14\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The budget will be reduced accordingly. In return the industrialists and department-store owners agreed to pay at once the sum of \$7,000,000 in taxes normally not due until December. They will draw 6 per cent interest on their money. The bankers agreed to extend short-term notes, amounting to \$53,000,000, which are held against the city. The plan will take care of Detroit until January 1. Then the city must borrow again. The industrialists have said they will then lend the city \$20,000,000, but they have not yet named their terms.

Unemployment, police terrorism, the dictatorship of the bankers, and Mayor Murphy's weak and vacillating rule have all contributed to the unrest apparent here. Detroit has already witnessed several major manifestations of the growing rebellion. There was first the Ford massacre, followed by a great public funeral for the victims which was attended by thirty to fifty thousand workers. The Ford incident was a signal for a drive against all radicals, but the roundup of the agitators and Communist Party leaders stopped almost as soon as it began. The authorities hesitated to proceed in the face of an aroused public opinion which all too clearly sympathized with the workers who had taken part in the Ford demonstration. However, the plans for an anti-red drive were only suspended until they could be more perfectly drawn. There have been other demonstrations such as that at the Briggs plant. I interviewed a number of persons, shopkeepers, professional people, and others, who had witnessed this affair. Without exception they all spoke well of the workers and denounced the police brutality they had seen. One, a chemist, had even gone to police headquarters to complain, only to be told there that if he did not like the manner in which the police conducted themselves he "ought to join the Reds; you probably belong there anyhow."

The workers and lower middle class would doubtless find other and more striking ways in which to express their reaction to present conditions were it not for the confusion of counsel and division of leadership among the proletarian and bourgeois radicals. There are in Detroit more than a dozen liberal and working-class "movements," all working at cross purposes. They include besides the independent middle-class intellectuals such organizations as the Socialist Party, Socialist Labor Party, Proletarian Party, General Labor Union, Industrial Workers of the World, International Brotherhood Welfare Association, and the Communist Party. The liberals, now clearly disgusted with Murphy, are leaderless. They want to turn to someone else for guidance and direction, but they will not have another man like Frank Murphy. The Socialist Party, though it appears to be making notable gains, is torn here as elsewhere by factionalism, with the non-Marxian faction the stronger numerically. One of the party workers, who because of his position will have to play an important role in the coming Presidential campaign in Michigan, frankly declared in my presence that he considered Norman Thomas a social fascist. Such internal dissension is bound to prevent the Socialists from taking the lead in the working-class movement here. A Socialist leader told me that his party had no criticism to make of the police, a most revealing confession, for it shows that the Socialists are taking no active part in the working-class fight and thus have not had to contend with the opposition of the police department. Most of the new members of the party are middle-class liberals and white-collar workers. "There are," said a member of the Social Democratic Party of Germany who was visiting Detroit, "too many school teachers coming into the party to do it any good." Nevertheless, this middle-class trend toward a mildly radical party is in itself a significant sign of the times. If nothing else, it means votes for Socialist candidates. I met a number of Detroit voters who, notwithstanding that they had never cast their ballots for any but Republican or Democratic candidates and had never talked with or been approached by a Socialist Party worker, have decided to vote for Norman Thomas in November. A few are accepting Thomas as "the least of three evils"; others have become convinced that a new social order is needed and that the necessary reconstruction cannot be achieved through either the Republican or Democratic machine. If there is no turn in the economic situation before November, Norman Thomas will get a surprisingly large vote here, even larger perhaps than he anticipates.

It is the Communist Party which is making the strongest appeal to the workers. However foolish or futile the tactics of this party may appear to some observers—and that they have often been stupid can hardly be denied—it must be conceded that the party has won the sympathy of a large section of Detroit's laboring population. This does not mean that the party membership is expanding at any phenomenal rate, or that the activities of the Communist leaders are creating votes for William Z. Foster. The sympathy I mention is almost entirely passive; it simply reflects an awakening class consciousness. Were the Communists to depend less upon orders from Moscow, were they to forget some of their doctrine and learn more of the American labor problem and American psychology, and were they by some miracle or other to improve the quality of their leadership, they could, in my judgment, very quickly dominate Detroit, politically at least. As it is, their propaganda has made deep inroads among the workers here. In particular the workers have been impressed by the vigor and promptness with which the Communists are disposed to organize and lead demonstrations against wage-cuts, reductions in relief expenditures, and the dictatorship of the bankers.

The municipal employees may hold their indignation meetings and denounce Mayor Murphy as they have been doing. The school teachers may flock to the Socialist Party. The unemployed may growl and grumble as they stand in the relief lines all night long waiting for the grocery orders that do not come. The Communists may damn Henry Ford and the bankers to the applause of hundreds of spectators in Grand Circus Park and to the discomfiture of the scores of uniformed policemen waiting in areaways and cellars nearby to suppress the slightest sign of a disturbance. But these things in themselves do not greatly trouble the bankers, business men, and municipal authorities of Detroit. They feel, said a prominent investment banker, that they can handle the agitators when the time comes, but they are not sure that the workers and lower middle class, subject as they are to the pressure of unemployment as well as to the promptings of radical organizers, will much longer remain quiescent. They are afraid, this man said, that the blind support which the workers in the past have given to the forces of law and order is being undermined.

Some Sweet-Smelling Politics

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, July 23

THANKS to the indiscretion of a Cabinet member in bestowing his confidences, it is already possible for your correspondent to disclose the outline of the Hoover plan of campaign. Speaking to a small group of individuals whom he supposed to be loyal Hoover men, this dignitary revealed that the Hoover strategy would be developed around three main themes, to wit: (1) A general attack on Speaker Garner as "radical" and "unsound," coupled with the whispered insinuation that Roosevelt's health is bad and that the election of the Democratic ticket probably would mean the elevation of Garner to the Presidency within two years; (2) an attack on Roosevelt's own supposed "radicalism," as evidenced by his attitude on electric power and his allusions to "a new deal" and "the forgotten man"; and (3) an organized secret endeavor to persuade Al Smith's partisans in New York, New Jersey, and Massachusetts that Al was the victim of anti-Catholic propaganda disseminated by Roosevelt workers in the South and West prior to the Chicago convention. This sweet-smelling program, so reminiscent of the tactics which were successful in 1928, apparently will be expanded to allow Mr. Hoover to charge the Democrats with conspiring to "bring back the saloon." I am tempted to douse the entire plan with formaldehyde and present it without comment, but it provokes interesting ruminations. For one thing, there is abundant evidence that the impression of Garner's vulnerability is confined mainly to Administration officials and a few conservative Eastern newspaper editors. Reliable observers West and South of the Alleghenies report that the Speaker's recent controversies with the President over relief legislation strengthened him with the voters. It would be not merely surprising, but astonishing to discover that Hoover and Ogden Mills had gauged public sentiment more accurately than John Garner. Incidentally, our readers might like to know that Garner's insistence on full publicity for future loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was fortified at a critical juncture by a message from Roosevelt, who informed his running mate that he considered the issue of publicity versus secrecy in public business a vital one of public policy, and was prepared to make a campaign issue of it if Hoover vetoed the relief bill on that account. Another reason, unstated but just as real, was the fixed belief among Democratic leaders that secrecy concerning R. F. C. loans would greatly simplify the Republican problem of raising a campaign fund. If some readers are prompted to infer from the latter that national politics does not always proceed on the loftiest ethical plane, I hasten to assure them that the inference is thoroughly sound. Politics is almost as rotten as banking.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■

IF Washington is not presently the scene of bloody rioting it will be because the unemployed war veterans encamped here exhibit more good sense and composure than the authorities who are attempting to deal with them. And if violence does occur it may be attributed to Herbert Hoover's fright. The thought is not calculated to inspire national pride, but it seems inescapable. Compare Hoover's behavior with that of Congress. The Senate rejected the bonus bill while 8,000 angry veterans swarmed on the Capitol steps and plaza, shouting demands and threats. Not a soul on the hill except silly old Charley Curtis exhibited a qualm of personal fear when several hundred sullen men were picketing the Capitol for ninety consecutive hours. It did not occur to the reporters to be alarmed for their personal safety—not even to the girl reporters. Yet at the very moment when Senators and Representatives were coming and going through the picket lines, attending to their jobs, the President decided to abandon his traditional trip to the Capitol to sign bills. And when thirty or forty meek and footsore men started to plod past the White House, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, lord of a million guns, lapsed into a panic and threatened to call out the troops if the police permitted this ragged handful to approach within two blocks of the executive mansion! It is interesting to speculate on how Old Hickory Jackson, or Grover Cleveland, or Teddy Roosevelt, or the stiff-necked, lantern-jawed Presbyterian who occupied the White House during the World War would have acted under such circumstances. No sensible person wishes the President to expose himself to actual danger, but the suggestion that any danger to him was involved in this pathetic demonstration is ridiculous. In the same spirit of hysteria the authorities now have ordered the veterans to evacuate all public property within a term of days, on pain of arrest. This is courting trouble with a vengeance. The men say they will refuse, and the thought of 10,000 ex-soldiers resisting arrest is not pleasant. Guts and sanity are needed to avert trouble, but where we look for the white plume we espy only the White Feather.

* * * * *

MR. HOOVER'S peevish telegram declining Governor Roosevelt's request for a conference on the St. Lawrence waterway treaty has been pronounced "a triumph of delicate insult" by one writer and "the outburst of a fat man suffering from prickly heat" by another. Regardless of how it is characterized, it promises to be one of the costliest bits of satisfaction in which Herbert Hoover ever indulged. In answer to his rhetorical declaration that negotiations with Canada "have been under way for nearly three years," he is now confronted with a letter in which his own State Department informed Governor Roosevelt last August that "no negotiations of any kind are going on," and also with later official announcements by this government and Canada that negotiations would be initiated "at once." But the consequences of the President's rashness and spite are not likely to end with a simple challenge to his veracity. To his retort can be attributed the Senate's action in authorizing the Foreign Relations Committee to investigate the history and circumstances of the negotiations. One of the principal issues involved in the matter is whether the power generated in connection with the St. Lawrence development is to be distributed by the State of New York or by private companies. I assume that the Senate committee will ascertain how that question has been affected by the Administration's handling of the subject, the names of the interested companies, and the relations, if any, of their officials with members of the Hoover Administration. When this is done I am sure we shall be treated to some very edifying facts, and that Hapless Herbert will rue the temper which caused him to send that telegram to his campaign adversary. Of course, certain excuses can be made for him. He simply isn't the type of man who finds it easy to sit down across the table from a man who is running for the same office that he is trying to hold. If cruel chance ever forces Mr. Hoover into such a situation it will be weeks before he can unglue his eyes from his belt buckle.

* * * * *

IT should be repeated that the Congress which adjourned last week was treated to more ignorant and unmerited abuse by editors, cartoonists, and so-called "business leaders" than any within memory. The list of deaths and breakdowns caused by overwork and overstrain during the session just ended is appalling. Yet when a Senator's day consisted regularly of answering his correspondence between eight and ten in the morning, attending committee hearings from ten until noon, remaining in the chamber from noon until six, and engaging in the necessary reading and study between dinner and bedtime, it was possible for a metropolitan editor to arrive at his office at ten, compose a ringing editorial on Congressional indolence and futility before lunch, and depart for the golf course at two with the complacent knowledge that he had struck another resounding blow for the Republic! One marvels that politicians generally have abandoned their time-honored custom of shooting editors—and that it has not been adopted by the harried Washington correspondents. The failure of Congress to give fuller consideration to the Costigan-La Guardia bill, intended to revive the starved purchasing power of American consumers, while unfortunate, is easy to explain. Members of both houses simply felt it would be a waste of time and effort to discuss a measure which the President was certain to veto if passed. Indeed, most of them feel that nothing effective can be done to restore normal conditions until the Hoover jinx has been lifted. However, the author of the bill has one concrete achievement to his credit for the session. The author is the brilliant Donald Richberg, counsel for the railway labor executives, and he waged a single-handed and successful fight to prevent Hoover from promoting Wilkerson—the most notorious injunction judge in the United States—to the second highest court in the land. It is true that Wilkerson could be given a recess appointment by the President, but in order to accept it he would be compelled to resign from the district bench in Chicago and face the hazard of rejection by the Senate at the next session. I suspect the valiant jurist will elect to hold on to his lifetime cinch as a comparatively humble United States District Judge. And I suspect that, in so doing, His Honor, Wilkerson, J., can be acquitted of impracticality. It is a fact that Mr. Hoover's brave adventures in the field of judicial enhancement have a way of going sour.

Soviet Russia—Land of Youth

By HARRY F. WARD

IN the Soviet Union the use of military terms to describe the peaceful activities of everyday life is something more than analogy. The building of socialism is also a war. The "shock brigades" and "storm brigades" in agriculture and industry, the "cultural army" with its "raids" into illiterate and uncultured territory, are waging strenuous warfare against ancient foes of human progress who must now be conquered if the foundations of socialism are to be successfully laid. They fight against ignorance and inefficiency, against indolence and drunkenness, against graft and bureaucracy. They give the pugnacious tendencies of man full expression in constructive activities, as the idealists have long desired. And there are plenty of hardships to be endured, actual dangers to be faced. Just as we were leaving Odessa, the morning paper carried a brief account of a young Kom-somol found dead upon the road, shot by the kulaks against whom he had been waging relentless propaganda.

In these campaigns there are no such periods of inactivity as come to the soldiers in the trenches. While every nerve is still strained to secure speed in construction and quantity in production, a tremendous drive for quality is started. Before the economic base of a Socialist society—the heavy industries and mechanized agriculture—is quite established, a big campaign is launched to build up light industries for consumption goods, to increase and improve the food supply and the housing. As soon as illiteracy is "liquidated," the whole land, clear to the borders of Asia, is aroused to seek technical education. Such war, unending and without discharge, even more than our modern high-powered campaigns of destruction requires youth to win its battles. It depends upon the inexhaustible supplies of energy and enthusiasm from which each new generation draws its hope for the conquest of life.

Every chronicler of the Russian revolution has noted how it drew mere boys and girls into the soviets, demonstrating that a revolutionary development needs youth for counsel as well as for war. Now the enormous constructive activities compel the giving of large administrative responsibilities to those who were in their teens when the Czar fell and are now in their early thirties. The new enterprises are largely manned, as they were mostly built, by youth. I recall one young engineer of twenty-three who had served a term as administrator of a section of a technical institute comprised of three hundred students and thirty teachers. Before that, he had been carrying on, sometimes for twenty-four hours on end, experimental research in a factory. Hard and tiring? "Yes, but interesting," he said. Now after an enforced rest—with many others—in a sanatorium, he was going to finish his preparations for a full professorship. I remember a young woman down in the oil fields of Baku who also happened to be twenty-three. She had just graduated from the engineering school, and she was in charge of the installation and operation of machinery in four sections of a new refinery. She was, moreover, respected as thoroughly competent by the American foreman.

It is the youngsters of college age who are the pace-setters for the Bolshevik tempo, who work against time until the job is done, who continually invent new forms of Socialist emulation and mutual aid. In an emergency in the industries they challenge their parents to competition. They lead them into the collective farms in the villages. They are creating the new proletarian writing, painting, and music. Their shock brigades have given a new lead to the Communist Party and are filling its ranks with a type whose propaganda consists in doing rather than in talking. These young people are formulating the answer to the question of what will happen when the older generation of revolutionaries with their self-forgetting enthusiasm is gone. They are engaged in a continuous revolution. Instead of overthrowing established but enfeebled authority, they are destroying and replacing ancient ideas, attitudes, and habits. A great task and a long vision mold them too. To prevent them from becoming engrossed with the mechanics of Socialist construction or falling once again into the treadmill of routine they are called now to achieve a classless society by 1937.

Soviet educators are saying that the youth who have grown up since the revolution constitute a new type of person. They mean new not simply as contrasted with the pre-revolutionary Russian or older Party members, but with the rest of the world. In so far as the former comparison is concerned they certainly have a much clearer-cut mentality, they think more concretely and concisely. When you seek information from them, these younger men and women take out a pencil and ask for your exact questions. Then rapidly they formulate their answers according to an exact outline, and usually you get precisely what you are after in the minimum of time. In one city I remember wasting half the morning trying to get to a busy party executive. It took me three minutes to get to an equally busy Komsomol official, and less than five to get the appointments made for succeeding days to secure the information I was after. They were promptly and efficiently carried out. In another place we sat one afternoon in a factory listening to an apparently interminable report by the Communist Party secretary on the year's work while the chairman tried in vain to keep an increasing number of the workers from slipping out of the meeting. That night we told the Komsomol leaders about it. They laughed. "That's out of date," they said. "We'll get after the party about it."

Remembering the hours spent with small companies of these leaders of the masses in many places, one still feels the impact of their vitality; one realizes also that it is as different from that of other European students as they, in their turn, are different from the students of the United States. The latter, with their doubting fear of life or their inability to find enjoyment unless it is paid for and provided by others, seem strangely world-weary alongside exuberant youth of more ancient lands, with their hikes and rest houses, their unaffected group singing and folk dances. This quality of exuberance the Russians share, but they work while they study and study while they work, uniting theory and practice not in minor jobs whose outcome is private profit, but in a vast social rebuilding. For this they are all paid a stipend just as our men at West Point and Annapolis are paid, but they earn it by their social productivity. They are enjoying life while they are changing it. Ask them what they are interested in next to their work and studies; every group runs the gamut of life in its answers—philosophy, art, literature, music, nature, sports—and each of these they can discuss with a critical maturity beyond the reach of any similar group of American students. Their greatest weakness is their imperfect view of the outside world to which the propagandist nature of the foreign news in their papers has condemned them. But the nature of their questions about life in the United States, whose technical capacity they seek to overtake and surpass in the next ten years, indicates a suspicion of this weakness and also their ability to think for themselves. They know about the Scottsboro boys, Al Capone, and the dumping of Brazilian coffee, and they ask you concretely why these things are done and what they mean for our future. As they ask these questions and probe for the import of your inquiries about their own activities and attitudes, there shines from their eyes a concentrated and eager intensity such as I have never seen before outside a religious revival or a strike meeting. And this is focused not upon some personal emergency but upon matters of everyday social activity.

Every American to whom I have talked, who has taught these youthful builders of socialism, agrees that the first and main difference between them and the more serious section of American college students lies in the fact that they are dominated by a great purpose. As a Soviet educator put it, "They know where they are going; they know how; and they know why." It is, of course, the Five-Year Plan—and its successors—that has opened up a clear road before them and brought certainty of direction. The building of socialism is not a vague and blurred ideal, but a definite enterprise that is being worked out in blueprints and specifications. They know not only the transitional nature of the present period, but to what it leads. They see a long, hard road before them, and no millennial Utopia at the end of it. They regard the present conquest of the material means of life through new forms of organization as the necessary preliminary to the opening up of a new freedom for the continuous development of all human capacities. Ask them, for example, how they propose to overcome a world-wide difficulty and get students who have become accustomed to a metropolitan environment to live and work in cramped villages, and they will speak first of a debt of honor to the system that has supported them and perhaps of party discipline; then they will add, "But you know we are going to abolish the differences between city and country."

Take the pick of these young builders of socialism, and they equal the best types of any other culture, from Greece to the United States. Biologically they are a select company. Mostly of peasant stock, they are the survivors of a hard and ancient struggle with nature and a poor social environment. They have survived, furthermore, the lean years of famine. Finally, their ruggedness has been filled with the greatest purpose that can enter into man. One feels that in them the life force has once again come to full flood-tide. It is with this fact that those who dream of destroying what they are building must reckon.

Socialism and Norman Thomas

The twelve questions put by Norman Thomas to Oswald Garrison Villard and answered by him in our issue of July 20 have aroused widespread comment. We print below a few of the letters received.—EDITOR THE NATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I be permitted to ask Norman Thomas to make clear, through the pages of The Nation, his stand on the following questions:

1. How do the Socialists propose to overthrow capitalism, and establish a classless social order, without the use of force?

2. Do you believe that capitalism, controlling the election machinery, will ever permit the transfer of power into the hands of the workers by means of the ballot?

3. Do you believe that capitalism, controlling the means of production, will ever permit them to pass into the hands of the workers, unless forced to do so?

4. Do you believe in the confiscation of private property in general, and the means of production in particular, for the workers and by the workers? ("Purchase," instead of "Confiscation," we should consider as too naive to be accepted as an answer.)

5. Do you believe in the dictatorship of the proletariat?
Chicago, July 21

MAX ALPER

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The questions put to you by Norman Thomas in The Nation of July 20 are important and interesting. There are questions no less important to be put to Mr. Thomas.

Socialism means to some the ownership by the state of the instruments and the implements of production. To George Bernard Shaw it means also that the subway guard and the "washerlady" shall receive precisely the same income as Messrs. Morgan, Young, Baker, and Hoover—incidentally, also, that the compulsory practice of vaccination for smallpox and diphtheria shall be at once and forever discontinued on the ground that George knows better. What does it mean to Mr. Thomas?

To some socialism means the single tax, with additions and subtractions; to some the expropriation of pretty much all personal property and the gradual approach of the Soviet polity. If Mr. Thomas refers us to the Socialist platform, I don't believe that would be any more conclusive than a reference to the Democratic or Republican platforms.

New York, July 20

ALFRED P. PERKINS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A study of the questions put to you by Norman Thomas and your replies thereto reveals major differences between yourself and the known attitude of Mr. Thomas on five of the twelve points. It is surprising that you should profess ignorance of what "those things necessary for the common life" are. What else can they be but the means of production of food, clothing, shelter, and those commodities which characterize a higher standard of living?

It is extremely difficult to visualize the effects of a planned economy under capitalist auspices. Such a situation prevails in Italy where the state either owns or rigidly controls the key industries, yet Italy faces the same crisis which confronts individualistic America.

Your reply to question eleven calls for a discussion of the reasons for the existence of political parties. Bearing in mind that socialism aims to abolish classes, we must accept present political alignments as the logical outgrowth of the clash of rival interests. A political party is built upon the aspirations of a particular class or group in society and is characterized by unity of principle and action. Thus, we see in all democratic countries, except America, parties representing opposing interests. In Great Britain, for instance, the Conservative Party is the political expression of the landed aristocracy while the Liberals are spokesmen for the free-trade commercial interests. In America, owing to political immaturity, the class interests are obscured by a precious set of political knaves. Informed people know who owns both major parties and why they so ably serve their masters. What objection can logically be raised to the formation of a political party representative of the working class? The struggle is here; why should not labor cast its hat into the ring with an effective political organization?

New York, July 20

CHARLES R. BRADFORD

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Thomas and Mr. Villard seem to be unable to make clear to what extent they agree or disagree. It would be more to the point if Mr. Thomas were to ask Mr. Villard these questions:

1. Do you believe that there is any just way to get money without work?

2. If you do, which of the several kinds of property which confer that right on their owners ought to have the protection of the government?

3. If you do not, what would you do with such property? Tax away its full income value, leaving its use to private initiative, or socialize it?

My sympathy is with Mr. Villard in his distaste for a class party. The Socialist Party should aim at the organization of those who want socialism. They are the people who are socialized, who love their neighbors. Even the working class must rise above its immediate needs to join this fraternity.

Jersey City, July 20

ARCHIBALD CRAIG

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A word of appreciation for your answers to the twelve questions in the open letter of Norman Thomas. Although I very much admire Mr. Thomas as I hear him over the radio, I seem to have your slant on the subjects of his letter.

Canton, Pa., July 22

J. M. JONES

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I read with great interest Mr. Villard's answers to Mr. Thomas, but I confess that I was not satisfied. To the first question, whether our capitalistic nationalist social order is doomed, the answer is "Yes, if it continues at it has since 1914." That implies that if the capitalist order makes some little changes, it may continue indefinitely.

Mr. Villard believes in a careful planning directed toward the rapid socialization of natural resources, but makes special exception of land. Land even at the present time is only owned conditionally, subject to the payment of taxes. Would it make such a difference if the title of the land were vested in society and merely leased at a sum comparable to present taxes? Such a lease could be made for a lifetime, subject to the payment of the amount stipulated and utilization of the land. The only difference would be that the land could not be transferred. Therefore, no profit could be made on it and it would revert to society at the death of the lessee.

Milwaukee, July 21

J. P. SCHROETER

In the Driftway

THE tall tale is a vital part of the American tradition, as Constance Rourke so admirably and amusingly shows in her book "American Humor." It has been with us since our earliest days, experiencing a new burst of vigor and exaggeration with every major event in our history. Paul Bunyan represents probably the highest point in exaggeration and consistency, but characters and situations similar in their conception if not so consistent in their development are to be found in all parts of the country to match all epochs of their history.

* * * *

THERE is reason to believe that the tall tale is as vigorous as ever, and the Drifter would be delighted to have further confirmation from anyone who happens to run into a tale as tall as Texas which has sprung out of America's more recent past. The late Great Boom will undoubtedly produce stories of short sales and giant pools as towering as Paul Bunyan's forests, but its ending is still too close for comfort, much less humor, and it will be several healing years, perhaps, before we shall be able to laugh off the twenties as the tallest tale of all. The farm deflation, on the other hand, is of such long standing that it has already begun to produce its tall tales, two of which the Drifter thinks ought to be recorded. The first is already several years old. It concerns a farmer who is showing a visitor around his place. He recounts his mortgages; he tells how much he has lost on each of his crops; he points out his flourishing pigs which are only another expensive investment promising no return. In the course of the tour the farmer and his visitor come upon the hired man. "'Course I don't pay him," says the farmer. "He works for me till he owns the farm and then I work for him till I get it back."

* * * *

THE other tale is new, so far as the Drifter knows. A farmer who had been unable to meet his mortgage came one day to see the president of the mortgage company which rather than take over the land had allowed the farmer to continue using it. The farmer told the president that he was thinking of moving to another farm down the road. Upon inquiry, he admitted that the mortgage company which owned the other farm had offered to make certain improvements if he would take over the place. The president persuaded him to remain where he was, but only by promising improvements equal to those offered by the rival company. A few months passed. Again the farmer appeared, to tell the president that while he appreciated the improvements that had been made, he had decided to move after all to the other farm. His reason was cogent. The rival mortgage company, it developed, had offered to send the farmer's son to college if he would move to their farm. The president, upholding the best American traditions of competition, said that his company would send the boy to college, would send him, in fact, to Alabama Polytechnic Institute. The farmer was touched but not swayed. "I'm sorry," he said, "but the other company's going to send him to Yale."

THE DRIFTER

Finance

Some Novelties in Regulation

PUBLIC utility holding companies have recently been brought under an enflaming fire by at least four commissions—those of Wisconsin, Alabama, and New York, and the Federal Power Commission. The Wisconsin and Alabama bodies have ordered that no unearned dividends be paid by operating companies to the absentee holding concerns until it is established that such payments would not impair the financial strength of the operating units. Interest has also been expressed in the amount of service fees paid to the parent companies, as to whether depreciation charges are being adequately maintained, and in general as to whether subsidiaries are being "milked" for the benefit of the controlling interests. The New York commission publicly expressed its disapproval of certain accounting practices of the Associated Gas and Electric System, and the Federal Power Commission came out with a statement favoring regulation of holding companies by public authority.

In some cases the new orders seem a bit beside the point, as when the Wisconsin body seeks to learn from the telephone company of that State the salary paid to Mr. Gifford, head of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. It turns out that the companies which are forbidden to pay dividends on their common stock have already ceased such payments—a fact which the commission must have known very well. The essential thing is that a vigorous approach is being made to the utility problem through the operating company, from which the holding organization draws its financial sustenance. Possibly no satisfactory general solution can be reached in this direction; a maze of minute regulations would apparently be necessary, dealing with inter-company loans and credits, service, management and engineering fees, and the like.

More important than all this, in the long run, is the fact that a new theory of rate-making is gradually emerging. The Wisconsin company had asked for an increase in rates, instead of which a 12½ per cent reduction was ordered. In support of its decision the commission laid down the principle that in difficult times such as these a 6 per cent return on the company's stock is adequate, and that rates should take into consideration the actual value of the service rendered to the public. A long series of court decisions holds, on the contrary, that 7 and 8 per cent on the invested capital is not excessive, taking into consideration the need of attracting new funds through proved stability of earning power.

But no court has been able to show how it is possible to guarantee a 7 or 8 per cent return on capital in the face of a falling volume of business. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company itself is confronted with that problem. Its operating subsidiaries have not been earning the dividends they have been paying to the parent organization, owing largely to the fact that in the first six months of this year 785,000 telephone instruments have been disconnected in excess of new connections. Further, the electric utilities, which in recent years insisted that invested capital meant cost of reproduction, are now confronted with the fact that the use of such a cost basis, owing to the fall in commodity prices, might actually result in a reduction of rates.

A bill was introduced in the last Congress providing that the public interest and the provision of adequate transportation, rather than a hypothetical return on capital, should form the main basis of railway rate-making. Nothing came of the bill, but it will be heard from again. It bears remarkable similarity to some of the ideas which the Wisconsin utility commission has been airing recently.

S. PALMER HARMAN

Books and Films

Misted Memories

Obscure Destinies. By Willa Cather. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

OBSCURE Destinies" is comprised of three long short stories of the pre-war West. Neighbor Rosicky is a simple, low-toned account of the life and death of a Bohemian farmer living on the Nebraska prairie. Old Mrs. Harris, a character-study of three women, depicts as many generations in the life of a family transplanted from the old South to the new West. Two Friends draws a pastel portrait—which the Sherwood Anderson of "Horses and Men" might have signed—of a pair of late nineteenth-century small-town business men. Of these the first, conceived somewhat in the mood of "My Antonia" and "O Pioneers!", is the most successful. Its idealized peasant types, as her readers know, dwell close to the heart of Willa Cather. Her warm sympathy and simplicity of outlook are exactly suited to such an idyll of quiet sentiment as Neighbor Rosicky. The remaining two stories are less effective. Old Mrs. Harris should have been a short novel of the length, perhaps, of "A Lost Lady." At any rate, it seems to require a more complicated, a fuller treatment than has been accorded it. The shortest of the trio of tales, Two Friends, suffers from the opposite defect. It is little more than an anecdote of character into which Miss Cather has infused her beautifully misted memories of the old populist West, as she imagines it to have been before Sinclair Lewis made his way down Main Street. It is too slight for forty pages. On the whole, "Obscure Destinies" will please Miss Cather's admirers; and even those who are bewildered at the jacket blurb which ranks her with "the greatest of living authors" will note with satisfaction that for the moment the artificial, ivory-tower mood of "Shadows on the Rock" has been abandoned. These stories are drawn naturally and without manipulation from that same store of memories which produced those excellent books, "My Antonia" and "O Pioneer!"

With these memories it would be discourteous to quarrel. Every adult is entitled to hold his childhood inviolate. But one should, I think, bearing in mind the natural kindliness of Miss Cather's temperament, swallow her West with at least a few ounces of citric acid. She prefers to remember kindly, patient, intelligent peasants like Rosicky; manly, generous, wholesome farm children like the young Rosickys; gentle, educated, beauty-loving couples like the none-too-credible Mr. and Mrs. Rosen (Miss Cather really should not bother with Jews; her Bohemian touch is surer); and picturesque, democratic, heart-of-gold business men like the two friends, Dillon and Trueman. All her characters dislike pushing, boasting, "progressive methods." The author conceives them as belonging to an era "when business was still a personal adventure." They are her pioneer West. But when one remembers what kind of "progressive methods" were actually used in the winning of the West, one wonders whether these people of Miss Cather's were not entirely eccentric to the period rather than representative of it, as she appears in all honesty to believe. Her West was not built up by the exercise of the nicer Christian virtues, but by blood and iron. The government troops, the railroaders, the packers, and the monopolists of the latter half of the nineteenth century were only by courtesy of Miss Cather's idealism engaged in "a personal adventure." The old West had its humble peasants, its kindly small-town bankers; but for the most part it was the joint creation of masters and slaves.

In the opening years of this century there flourished a now almost forgotten New England writer, Sarah Orne Jewett. While she was far from lavender-and-old-lace, she was hardly what one would call a realist, even for her time. Preferring always to stress their finer and more endearing qualities, she wrote poignant little tales about simple New England people. She was in her way a skilful and honest writer. When Willa Cather was a young girl, she knew and loved and was encouraged by Sarah Orne Jewett; and of recent years she has done much to rescue her from ill-deserved neglect. The two women as artists are much alike, though Miss Cather is far stronger, more full-blooded and more sophisticated. In both is a foundation of Christian idealism. Both possess a sweetness and a sympathy which are not quite fit for large themes or any very resolute confrontation of life. Both prefer humble and patient people as against "important" or masterful people. While never sticky, they are both what the book trade would call "wholesome." In years to come, I believe Miss Cather will be recognized as a greater Sarah Orne Jewett of the West. She strikes lovely notes, but they are minor. To her better books (and they are her earlier ones) one may turn for a very moving kind of country sentiment, but hardly for a large, true, realistic picture of the time.

CLIFTON FADIMAN

Keeper of Men

Twenty Thousand Years in Sing Sing. By Warden Lewis E. Lawes. Ray Long and Richard R. Smith. $3.

THE title of Warden Lawes's book is derived from the fact that the sum of the sentences of the 2,500 men who constitute Sing Sing's prison population runs to 20,000 years. But the book is not only a record of Warden Lawes's highly intelligent and successful administration of Sing Sing Prison. It is also a personal record of his whole career as a prison administrator as well as an eloquent exposition of his own penal philosophy. Altogether, the book is an excellently written and moving account of an experience in practical penology. It is bound to establish itself as one of the classic documents of penological literature.

Warden Lawes may be justly proud of his accomplishment. He rose from prison guard to administrator of one of the largest prisons in the country. As he says, Mike the Rat Catcher was more important in his penological education than any theory. When he came to Sing Sing the worst horrors of the early decades of the prison's history were over—the rule of silence, the "cat" and the "shower," diets that included the luxury of two eggs a year for each prisoner—but the prison was far from the well-governed institution it is today, after twelve years of Lawes's wardenship. The prisoner has decent food, the opportunity to work, dramatic entertainments, exercise, athletics—the Sing Sing baseball team, it seems, is particularly expert at stealing bases. The Sing Sing prison hospital is the only one of its kind in the world that has been approved by the American College of Physicians and Surgeons. The prisoners are permitted through the Mutual Welfare League a certain amount of self-government. The American reader has been accustomed by his newspaper to think of prisons in terms of sullen and defiant men, riots, escapes, and executions. It will do him a vast amount of good to be introduced also to the normal course of prison life in at least one well-managed prison. Prisoners are usually well-behaved, and apparently lifers are the very models of deportment. Prison life is a tragi-comedy. Consider, for instance, the prisoners about to be released who are tanning themselves in the sun in order to make themselves look like returning vacationists. Many such droll stories are told by Warden Lawes.

Yet it must not be supposed that prison life in Sing Sing is an idyll. Even if it were there need be no fear that there would be a rush for admission. The cell blocks shut inexorably upon Sing Sing's inmates at night. The problems of prison administration are many and difficult, and often dangerous, but they have been handled by Warden Lawes with very uncommon sense. The secret of his success has lain in his realization of the fact that prison government should be a form of benevolent despotism. He has avoided, on the one hand, sentimentality, and on the other unnecessary harshness. He has fortunately possessed the qualities of the political mind at its best: its flexibility and its tact in dealing with men. A certain amount of experience not only in penology but politics is, indeed, necessary to make the ideal prison governor. At the basis of his penal philosophy is the conviction that at least half of his wards were the victims of circumstances and that therefore they will respond to the ordinary incentives of human behavior.

One of the most fascinating parts of Warden Lawes's book is his account of the operation of capital punishment. He is firmly opposed to it not because he believes in the sanctity of human life but because he regards the death penalty as futile. He has led 150 men and women to execution but he has seen murder continue unabated. He matches the familiar story of the pickpocket who stole in the very shadow of the gallows with a case of a prisoner who stabbed and killed another in the very shadow of the death house at Sing Sing. He points out the fact that he has never received a request to witness an execution from a district attorney who prosecuted the condemned, or the judge who sentenced him. Numerous requests however do come from policemen. To bring home to everybody the scenes at the death house he urges a very interesting revival of the idea of public executions: the broadcasting of an electrocution over the radio. An excellent idea which will be even better when television is finally perfected.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

Three Civilizations in Manchuria

Manchuria: Cradle of Conflict. By Owen Lattimore. The Macmillan Company. $3.

Manchuria: The Cockpit of Asia. By Colonel P. T. Ether-ton and H. Hessel Tiltman. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $3.

Japan Speaks on the Sino-Japanese Crisis. By K. K. Kawakami. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

China Speaks on the Conflict Between China and Japan. By Chih Meng. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

Japan and America. By Henry W. Taft. The Macmillan Company. $3.

Twenty Years of the Chinese Republic. By Harold Archer Van Dorn. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

The Young Revolutionist. By Pearl S. Buck. Friendship Press and The John Day Company. $1.50.

HERE are two books about Manchuria, that vast territory of colorful racial history, heterogeneous cultural elements, and rich mineral resources, recent storm center of the world. On this spot three civilizations have met together, and one of them must win out against the other two. There is China of antique continuity; there is imperialist Japan with the most modern army in the world; and there is Red Russia, of unknown force, looking on. It is interesting that China owes her immediate title in Manchuria not to conquest but to having been conquered at the time of the Manchus. Mr. Lattimore states that the Manchus seem never to have penetrated into the eastern part of Manchuria. This eastern country, including Kirin and Liaoning Fengtien or Mukden Province, "was old Korea," and at one time the Koreans were well established there. "The popular name for ruins of cities and fortifications is still 'Korean cities'." However the recent influx of one million Koreans to Manchuria is due to only one thing: unendurable conditions under the Japanese guardianship at home. Ironically enough, part of Japan's present claim to Manchuria is based upon Korean immigration to the east, though it has been the rule for the Korean immigrant to become a naturalized Chinese as soon as possible for the sake of protection. The rate of Chinese colonization, on the other hand, has been speeded up a good deal by Russian and Japanese business enterprise in Manchuria.

According to Mr. Lattimore—and I think he is right—Japanese leadership in Manchuria is not permanently possible. There must be spiritual adhesion as well as that of force to hold the vast territory of Manchuria. Manchuria is a vital factor to China, to Japan, and to Russia. It is Mr. Lattimore's opinion that Russia will win, rather than China with her ancient civilization or Japan with her new hybrid militarism. "As for Russia, now a very different nation from that which fought Japan or engaged as an apathetic pseudo-western nation in the war of 1914-1918, it is rapidly developing a specifically Russian non-western technique of warfare which is the cause of intense interest and no little alarm to western nations. The Russian army is an engine of unknown power and very great importance."

Mr. Lattimore's "Manchuria: Cradle of Conflict" is the work of a scholar, a thinker, and a man of vision. He has been at work upon his material for a period of years, studying Chinese sources and traveling for personal observation. The result is the best possible book about the actualities of present-day Manchuria, along with some interesting and rational prophecies.

"Manchuria: The Cockpit of Asia," written by two Englishmen, is an opportunist production much different in scope and treatment. Two good journalists, seeing the need of such a book, have pieced together news clippings and digested the books written on the subject. The result is valuable only as a newspaper résumé of what has happened since last summer.

In the companion books, "Japan Speaks" and "China Speaks," Mr. Kawakami and Mr. Meng respectively seem to say "My country, right or wrong." It is unfortunate, since Mr. Kawakami is supposed to be a liberal-minded Japanese. He is not informed, either, on the Korean situation. However, Mr. Meng is as poorly informed on certain historical points and his book is less well organized. It is false to say that "Taoism has been the national religion of Korea." He makes the untrue statement that Korea always "has been under the suzerainty of China," a statement which is contradicted in his own book. On page 199, The Case for Korea, written by a well-known Korean statesman, Dr. Syngman Rhee, begins thus: "For more than 4,000 years Korea was an independent and sovereign nation."

In "Twenty Years of the Chinese Republic" Mr. Van Dorn tries to give a broad survey of China since 1912. It has chapters on educational, religious, political, social, and economic progress. Although it contains nothing new or original, it will be helpful to the layman.

"Japan and America" is well documented and factually verified. The author, Henry Taft, brother of ex-President Taft, tells of his conversion to things Japanese through the good-will committees and the Welcome Association of Japan, which invited outstanding and prominent Americans to visit Japan in 1930. In the first part of the book he tells of his journey to Japan, of his entertainment by the royal family, and of informal conferences and good-will speeches in Japan. Then he gives a political survey of the country, with a discussion of the disarmament conference, anti-Japanese agitation, the Immigration Bill of 1924. He concludes with the Manchurian controversy in which he is disposed to favor the claims of Japan.

"The Young Revolutionist" is a short novel set in China by the author of "The Good Earth." Ko-sen is a Chinese boy of seventeen, the son of a typical Chinese landowner. He reflects the tortured, restless, and unadjusted China which is looking for a new light. The solution is very plain and obvious. Ko-sen sees the light of the west: "The Master there—I think they told me the Master there is one named Jesus. It is under him we would take service for our country." In many ways it is hard to believe that the author of this book is the author also of "The Good Earth" and "East Wind, West Wind." But in one respect she is more fortunate in her choice of a hero here than in "The Good Earth" for Ko-sen, unlike the peasant, Wang Lung, has been in touch with western ideas and hence is more consistent when his psychology becomes western.

In Pearl Buck we have the best of the missionaries, truly cultured, profoundly sincere, with a great gift for writing. To see a Confucian civilization in decay is to gain the conviction that it needs something, but the reader is made to feel at the end both of "The Good Earth" and "The Young Revolutionist" that China needs but one thing, those Christian doctrines which the west has held for 2,000 years, whereas I have never met personally one original and vigorous-minded Chinese who felt that Christianity at this late date had anything vital to offer China, or could reinspire in the exhausted east another 2,000 years of energetic and creative life.

YOUNGHILL KANG

Socialism or Drift

As I See It. By Norman Thomas. The Macmillan Company. $2.

NOTHING could more neatly reveal the dilemma of American Socialist leadership than this latest book by Norman Thomas. How can a Socialist leader, in these times, withdraw to his study and produce a calm, unhurried volume, based on exhaustive scholarship, charting with laborious detail the possible course of American economic and political life toward a Socialist society? Such a book is desperately needed; were it capably done, it might constitute a landmark in our progress. But today, landmarks of a sort whiz past like telephone poles beside a railway track; and still so limited numerically is the Socialist movement that its ablest thinkers must throw themselves unreservedly into propaganda, organization, and the concrete social emergencies which, if dodged, would precipitate justifiably fatal criticism. And if this book betrays by internal evidence the whirlpool of activity in which its author lives, that fact is not without its compensations. The book has life and movement; it will be read by many who would not approach with a ten-foot pole such works as those by the Webbs or G. D. H. Cole; finally, it will have its own educational virtue by reason of the fact that social attitudes are changed less by the influence of solid exposition than by specific, day-by-day events interpreted and criticized from the radical point of view.

Mr. Thomas opens his book with certain "reconsiderations" of the social scene since the appearance of his previous volume, "America's Way Out." He sharpens the issue between his view and that of capitalist critics, and, by outlining some of the consequences of the depression as it has deepened and has rocked the capitalist structure, narrows at least a little the gap between his socialism and that of some of his critics from the left. On the class struggle he writes:

I believe not only in the obvious fact of struggle between groups with conflicting economic interests, but in the class struggle between an owning and a working class. . . . The idea of such a struggle is or may be a unifying force in asserting the international solidarity of labor. But I protest when certain self-proclaimed Marxists act as if to believe in the class struggle was a kind of mystic act of salvation by faith, which almost absolves them from hard and intelligent work to organize labor economically and politically, or from the effort to purge labor unions from exceedingly "capitalistic" abuses, and which permits them to fight communism far more enthusiastically than capitalism.

Such words indicate how unwarranted have been the sneering lampoons directed against Mr. Thomas by American Communists; they also indicate how indiscriminating are the praises of dilettante supporters who wish merely to vote for "an honest man." Unlike Communists, however, Mr. Thomas believes that democratic and non-violent methods are "consistent with the class struggle," though he also points out that "socialism is not committed to absolute democracy or absolute pacifism regardless of time, place, and circumstance. . . ." He emphasizes effectively the menace of drift and confusion in the world crisis. Unless a definite program, growing out of a definite social philosophy, is embarked upon, violence will be the inevitable outcome.

One of the most thoughtful chapters is the one on The Acceptance of Violence, in which Mr. Thomas, without indulging in sentimentalism or dogma, makes a strong case for non-violence as a means of social change and decries that "tragedy of history," the way in which "lovers of liberty and justice have always blunted the edge of their own idealism, sown the seeds of new oppressions, debased the shining cities of their dreams by the wholesale violence they have felt obliged to use." In another important chapter on The Essential Condition of Economic Planning, Mr. Thomas probes mercilessly some of the outstanding pleas for a planned economy and exposes the lack of realism in plans which do not allow adequately for the futilities of competition and profit-seeking. In a seven-page Postscript on Politics which bears an uncomfortably close resemblance to an impromptu addendum to a speech, he dismisses in less than thirty words the growing demand for a new mass party of labor and liberal make-up, and editorializes on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Manchuria, Shanghai, the major parties, the disarmament conference, the collapse of the banks, the war debts, and the urgent task of Socialist Party organization. It may be suspected that Norman Thomas does not completely appreciate the impression of haste, and occasionally of superficiality, his book is destined to convey. Yet when every critical word is said, it holds wisdom for our times, presented forcefully and without equivocation. It will have an influence, apart from the rising prestige of its author, because it deals boldly with issues that Americans can in no wise hope to escape.

DEVERE ALLEN

Shorter Notices

Sheba Visits Solomon. By Helene Eliat. Translated from the German by David Zablodowsky. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Helene Eliat has written an altogether delightful tour de force in this story of the historic visit paid by Balkis, Queen of Sheba, to Solomon, King of the Jews. Charming, gay, witty, ironic, "Sheba Visits Solomon" is just about everything one would wish such a novel to be, informed as it is at once with genuine intuition and the sheerest fantasy. Sheba, according to the author, did not visit the fat, elderly, much-married Solomon merely to drink of the fountain of his wisdom. The

The Show Business

Four Articles by

Joseph Wood Krutch

The theater as business, art, and social force will be discussed by Mr. Krutch in four searching and distinguished articles.

Beginning September 7

Election Features

Oswald Garrison Villard's weekly comment on the campaign begins soon. . . . Paul Y. Anderson's pungent bi-weekly reports on the political scene will continue throughout the campaign.

13 weeks for $1

THE NATION 20 Vesey St. NEW YORK

For the enclosed $1 please send The Nation for 13 weeks to Name .....

Street .....

City .....

8-3-32

virgin queen was in quest of an heir. But although the king was too courteous to play the cad, he had eyes only for the queen's pretty little lady-in-waiting, the delectable Zud. Zud, however, had ideas of her own, and even Balkis soon saw that she had more to learn from Solomon's Egyptian wife, Tutu, than from the king himself. The occasional glimpses of the dour and aged prophet Nathan, of Solomon sitting in judgment and enjoying his own dialectics far more than the administration of the law, of the lady-in-waiting and her bucolic lover, of the queen Tutu "moral from prudence but immoral in her sympathies," are only a few of the sidelights that make the book a continuous pleasure.

Nonsuch: Land of Water. By William Beebe. Brewer, Warren and Putnam. $3.50.

Like some men who manage to make religion a joy, Mr. Beebe manages to make science a pleasure and an occasion for literary art of a high order. In this volume, the first of four to deal with his investigations of life in the waters about Nonsuch Island, Bermuda, he continues the genre of scientific writing he has developed. He deals with birds and fishes and snails and crabs, and shows, to paraphrase Heraclitus, that here, too, there are gods and beauty. The book is to be recommended for purposes of information, for aesthetic relaxation—and for emulation by other naturalists.

Spain in Revolt. 1814-1931. By Joseph McCabe. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

To the common notion of the Spanish people as a race supinely content to endure despotism and inquisition as long as it was left at liberty to watch bullfights, Mr. McCabe opposes a recital of long, unabated, and noble revolutionary effort culminating in the present democratic success. The defense perhaps was necessary, but Mr. McCabe is too fervent a defender. His style is cluttered and at times almost maudlin; and history becomes an arraignment rather than a judgment in his hands.

Kamongo. By Homer W. Smith. The Viking Press. $2.

This fine book has been handicapped by too enthusiastic reviews, publishers' blurbs, and Book-of-the-Month pronouncements that promise explanations of the universe, of the purpose of life, and of similar problems. It is in fact a well-written, unusual novel based on the author's experiences in search of lung-fish in Africa, with a charming account of the simple and not unfamiliar questions and doubts that come to an intelligent person viewing one of evolution's less successful experiments.

☐ PLAYS ☐ RADIO ☐

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN With GLENN ANDERS
DOROTHY STICKNEY, MARGARET WYCHERLY, JOHN BEAL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."

—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

BOOTH THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

THE NATION on WEVD

Joseph Wood Krutch

will speak on

The Plight of the Theater

Wednesday, August 3

8 p. m.

Films

Nonsense and Satire

NONSENSE, like madness, has its queer logic, and the queerer the logic the more fascinating the nonsense. It needed ■ Lewis Carroll to think of such a perfectly convincing reply as the Mad Hatter's, 'It was the best butter,' when his attempt to mend a watch by putting butter into it was questioned by Alice. But there have been few Lewis Carrolls in the world, and it would hardly be fair to measure all attempts at light-hearted and frankly nonsensical entertainment by applying to them the standard set up by the author of "Alice in Wonderland." Who will measure up to it? Not even the Marx Brothers or Joe Cook, delightful as their brand of nonsense often is.

Joseph L. Mankiewicz, the author of the story providing the basis for "Million Dollar Legs" (Paramount Theater), and his adapters have clearly fallen far short of producing ■ masterpiece. But they did let their fancy run as far as it would carry them, and the result is a film that at times has ■ quality of freshness and genuine imagination much too rare in Hollywood products. The best moments in the film are the episodes describing the crazy system of government which rules in the Republic of Klopstokia. What with the arm-pulling contests, which is the Klopstokian way of electing ■ president, and the constant popping up of mysterious spies, who include the imitable Ben Turpin, cross-eyed, be-cloaked, and with ■ notebook in his hand, the story starts off in the true mood of reckless extravaganza. Unfortunately, this mood does not last.

While being thankful for small mercies, one cannot help regretting that the film fails to rise to its opportunities in two other respects, aside from its tame ending. Here was ■ story that seemed to cry for a fantastic treatment on the lines of René Clair's "Le Million." Yet all we get in the film is ■ routine linking of scenes with not the slightest attempt to give them a crazy and sweeping rhythm that would reflect the mood of its story.

The other missed opportunity one can hardly hope to see realized in Hollywood. There is implicit satire in the Klopstokian methods of government. But to bring it out and stress its points would have required courage and independence of mind, and when has Hollywood shown that it had any of these qualities or cared for them?

It would be equally idle to expect genuine satire in the pictures which are supposed to satirize Hollywood itself. Recently, we had "Make Me a Star," a picture of life in Hollywood that made fun of imaginary evils while glossing over the real ones. The same formula is to be discovered in the latest picture of this cycle, bearing the eloquent name of "What Price Hollywood?" (Mayfair Theater). If we are to believe the authors and producers of this film, the price of Hollywood is the social downfall and degradation of those unable to resist the temptation of drink, and the perpetual agony and thwarted home life of those who, thanks to their eminence, are constantly exposed to public gaze. Well, well, we had better not ask what it is that drives the Hollywood geniuses to seek oblivion in drink, or who spends countless sums of money whipping up the morbid curiosity of the public in the private life of film luminaries. Let us be content to accept this gentle picture of amiable, warm-hearted, and unaffected people suffering through no fault of their own, thankful at least for the capable acting of Lowell Sherman and Gregory Ratoff, and the less frequent glimpses of her ability which Constance Bennett has been allowed to reveal in this film.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Contributors to This Issue

HARRY F. WARD, secretary of the Methodist Federation for Social Service has recently been making ■ study of conditions in Soviet Russia.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

CLIFTON FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

WILLIAM SEAGLE is the author of "Cato, or the Future of Censorship."

YOUNGHILL KANG, a Korean student of the literature and philosophy of the Orient, and a member of the department of English of New York University, has written the story of his life in "The Grass Roof."

Roget's International

THESAURUS

"Words grouped by Ideas"

Complete list of synonyms, antonyms, phrases, slang, etc., in fact everything to help find the right word. The one indispensable book for all writers. A necessary complement of the dictionary.

Now $3 Copy

from CROWELL'S

THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
393 Fourth Avenue, New York

The Modern Quarterly

announces its Summer Issue

Whither the American Writer (Questionnaire)
Sherwood Anderson, John Dos Passos,

Henry Hazlitt and others
Literature and Social Change.....Newton Arvin

Leftward Ho!.....V. F. Calverton

From Hegel to Marx.....Sidney Hook

Literary Criticism and the Marxian Method,
Granville Hicks

Fellow-Travellers.....Robert Briffault

The Civil War in New Perspective,
Will Herberg

Psycho-analysis and Communism,
Samuel D. Schmalhausen

Compositions (Poem).....Alfred Kreymborg

Monopolistic Capitalism and Imperialism,
Lewis Corey

An Open Letter to William Z. Foster,
V. F. Calverton

-----, 1932
The MODERN QUARTERLY
52 Morton Street, N. Y. C.

Gentlemen:
Please enter my subscription to your publication, beginning with the issue of.....
I enclose check for ☐ one year ■ $2.00. 50c single copy.

Special Offer: MODERN QUARTERLY (for one year) with V. F. Calverton's THE MAKING OF MAN—$2.25

Name .....

Address .....

APARTMENT FOR RENT

FOR RENT IN COOPERATIVE APARTMENT HOUSE

FOUR ROOM APARTMENT; large living room; southern exposure; eleven foot casement window facing General Theological Seminary; wood-burning fireplace; real kitchen; ample closet space; roof and garden available to tenants; cooperative cafeteria and store on ground floor makes housekeeping easy while other cooperative features help to reduce the cost of living; all modern conveniences including electric refrigeration and incinerators. Moderate rental, October occupancy.

See Renting Agent, 433 West 21st Street (in the old Chelsea district between ninth and tenth avenues) or call Chelsea 3-7631.

HOUSE TO SHARE

WILL share or divide private house, refined professional or residential purpose. Cor. Riverside Drive, nr. Columbia, St. Luke's, buses, and subway. Phone Dobson, Cathedral 8-7560 or write box 727 c/o The Nation.

ROOMS—FURNISHED

IN city's most convenient section, one block from Central Park, in private home, two unconnected, charming, furnished, rooms. Separate entrance. Housekeeping privileges. $18. and $32. monthly. Rhineland 4-3997. East 86th St.

LARGE STUDIO ROOM, furnished, in beautiful residential section. Also single room. Ready to meet all requirements. 2057 E. 12th St., Brooklyn, N. Y. Phone DEwey 9-2629.

CHARMING, furnished room, for lady, in sunny elevator apartment; family 2 adults; adjoining bath; use kitchen and living room. Attractive location (Broadway, Riverside). Reasonable. 206 W. 106th St. Apt. 64. Academy 2-6240.

POSITION WANTED

NURSE, R. N., experienced in bed-side nursing, school, industrial and public health nursing, desires position in industrial, school or doctor's office work. Box 729, c/o The Nation.

HELP WANTED

A COUPLE willing to invest time and effort in helping and living with a group of young children (6-12 years). Psychological training necessary and experience if possible. Living assured for one year. Box 728 c/o The Nation.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

AMERICAN, educator, author, planning to create international center in Provincial France, where students and writers may live and work in suitable environment, is seeking active associate who can contribute substantially to the required fund of $40,000. Investment secure, undertaking self-paying. Best professional and business references. Box 730, c/o The Nation.

PERSONAL

JOIN THE THOMAS PAINE SOCIETY. Most distinguished patriotic organization. Local secretaries wanted all cities. SEND FOR PARTICULARS, 1133 BROADWAY, N. Y.

INTELLECTUALS, interested in vital social betterments. To participate actively in modern non-political youth movement. No fees. Write: Otmar, 55 W. 46th St., N. Y. City.

LANDLORDS:

The Nation Real Estate advertisements bring results—Ask any advertiser who has used the real estate columns.

Minimum rate—1/2 inch ..... $3.08
Additional lines of 6 words ..... .62

THE NATION

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK CITY
COrtlandt 7-3330

EDUCATIONAL

CONVERSATIONAL FRENCH

Spanish - Italian - German

Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES 1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

FRENCH Spanish, Italian, German Russian, Conversational. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c. Daily 9-9. Fisher School of Languages, 1264 Lexington Av. (bet. 85-86 Sts.) Est. 1905. ATwater 9-8075

RESORTS

ReSTUPERATION CREATION
at THE CRYSTAL VILLA
Woodcliff Lake, N. J.

38 miles from N. Y. Fare 90c. Weekends—$1.00 return. Combines country pleasure with city conveniences. Ideal for convalescents. Cater to diets. Bracing walks. Bathing on premises. Wholesome Jewish-American table. Refinement. Congeniality. Rates considerably reduced. Phone Park Ridge 404.

MOON HILL

Camp for Adults with Hotel Accommodations ON SCHROON LAKE THE ADIRONDACKS Write for Reduced Rates Dietary laws strictly observed. Golf, social and athletic staff. Families accommodated. MRS. SARAH SOLOMON, Owner Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y. N. Y. Office, 175 Fifth Ave. ALgonquin 4-1320

RIVERSIDE INN, Seymour, Conn., on Lake Housatonic. Picturesque country. Woods. Hills. Only 70 miles from New York. Swimming, boating, fishing, tennis, basketball, ping pong. Horses. $21 per week. $3.50 per day. Telephone Derby 231-2.

FOR delightful vacations — or week-ends TOPSTONE FARM, in the Connecticut hills, restful, secluded. We keep our own saddle horses, and provide instruction. Address: R. F. D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn. Phone Ridgefield 648.

CAMP DAVIS—"The Week-End Rendezvous" VEGETARIAN mountain camp—sleep in tents —all sports—OLYMPIC ATHLETIC DIRECTOR—unique social fun and frolic. $3 day; $4.50 weekend; $16 weekly. R. Davis, Stanhope, N. J., or Phone Tompkins Sq. 6-5800.

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE Pleasant Valley, N. Y. Tel. Pleasant Valley 39 An ideal vacation place. Quiet, restful, Jewish home cooking. Bathing, boating fishing. Tennis. Cheap fare by Hudson River. $16. per week. Louis Sakow, Prop.

VINEYARD LODGE, Ulster Park, N. Y. (near Kingston). Modern hotel amidst gorgeous 200 acre fruit farm, sunbaths, saddle horses, tennis court, social activities, refinement, congeniality. Kosher. Reduced rates $18.00-$20.00 weekly. Joseph Rosenthal. Phone Kingston 3430

SUBURBAN ACCOMMODATIONS

IN charming house overlooking the Hudson, we will take a few people during the summer. Magnificent view. All conveniences. Three baths. Easy commutation. A. B. Parsons, South Boulevard, Nyack, N. Y.

OPEN SHELF

CURIOUS BOOKS Send for Catalogue of Privately Printed Unexpurgated Items Exotically Illustrated Limited Editions
THE FALSTAFF PRESS
Dept. N, 260 Fifth Avenue, New York

SUPERB BOOK BARGAINS

America's Primer, Morris L. Ernst....	($2.00)	1.75
For Lancelot Andrews, L. S. Elliot....	($2.00)	.75
Jefferson Davis, Allen Tate.....	($3.50)	1.50
Franklin, Bernard Fay.....	($5.00)	2.50
European Literature, Benedetto Croce..	($8.00)	2.25
Orlando, Virginia Woolf (signed Ltd.)..	($25.00)	10.00
Morning America, Sandburg (signed)....	($15.00)	7.50
Oscar Wilde, Frank Harris.....	($3.75)	2.25
Greek Ethics, J. A. Symonds, Special....		4.25

Postage 10c per Volume. Catalogs Issued.

BLACKFRIARS PRESS, 321 Fifth Ave., New York

RESORTS

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone: 222

Formerly a millionaire's estate. Most beautifully landscaped. A spot of rare beauty in the Ramapo hills. Finest accommodations.

Tennis, Basket and Hand Ball. Boating, Swimming on premises. Horses and Golf nearby.

1 1/2 hours Erie B. R. Bus or route 17.

OPEN ALL YEAR

HAMBURGER'S EVERGREEN

Farmingdale, N. J. Tel. 113

Near Asbury Park and Belmar

Vegetarian Resort in Beautiful Rural Setting Sun Baths, Sports, Bathing

Excellent Vegetarian and Dairy Meals

Rates Considerably Reduced

COME to the seashore for delightful weekends and vacations. The finest surf bathing in Long Island; beautiful beach and boardwalk. And at Reiber's Cottage you get most comfortable accommodations and choicest food. Reasonable rates. Belle Harbor 5-0089.

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship, wholesome food. Tennis.

THE HILBERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y. Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 953

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, Warrensburg, in the Adirondacks. One minute from Echo Lake with splendid bathing. Canoes and boats for guests. Tennis court. Cabins if desired. Beautifully located. We meet all guests at Lake George. Rates $18 and $20. R. J. Venton.

THE FAYLAND, HUDSON, N. Y.

ALL-YEAR TOURIST stop-over. Albany Post Road U. S. 9. Four miles south of Hudson. Garage, electricity, baths, steam heat, radio, farm products. Home-cooking. Special weekly rate. Brooklyn phone, Dewey 9-1059 after 4 P.M. Mr. Dacks.

NATURE PATH MOUNTAIN FARM Original Vegetarian dairy meals. Modern improvements, sports, sun baths. Bathing, Boating nearby. $18 week. $3 day. Excellent service. Mt. Bethel Rd., Plainfield, N. J. Plainfield 6-1474 J 1.

COLONY HOUSE PEEKSKILL, N. Y. (near Crompond Road) Phone Peekskill 2733 Commuting distance. Vacation and week-end accommodations. Lake bathing. Reasonable rates. Directions: Mohegan Colony bus to premises.

WESTERN VIEW FARM

Hospitality that is unique. Send for 1932 Collapsible Booklet. Address Edward G. Ohmer, New Milford, Connecticut Phone: New Milford, 440

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 10, 1932

No. 3501

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	113
EDITORIALS:
The End of Hitler?.....	115
Cowardice and Folly in Washington.....	116
Progress at Geneva.....	117
"Only a Novel".....	118
THE ST. LAWRENCE TREATY. By Ruth Finney.....	119
SOUTHERN LABOR STIRS. By A. J. Muste.....	121
SEX WINS IN AMERICA. By Morris L. Ernst.....	122
EXPLAINING TO DMITRI. By Morrie Ryskind.....	125
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	126
CORRESPONDENCE .....	126
BOOKS:
Prelude. By Conrad Aiken.....	127
Kaoru the Incompetent. By Mark Van Doren.....	127
Men of the Sea. By Robert Cantwell.....	128
The Crisis Stands. By Stuart Chase.....	128
A Romantic Note. By H. A. Brinser.....	129
Two Against the World. By Alice Beal Parsons.....	130
Shorter Notices .....	130
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.....	132

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN                      MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
    DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN	FREDA KIRCHWEY	MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT	H. L. MENCKEN	CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON	NORMAN THOMAS	ARTHUR WARNER
MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT'S radio speech of July 30 was little more than a reading of the Democratic platform. When the Governor did essay his own interpretations and opinions he revealed for the most part a lamentable lack of any genuine economic understanding. The most hopeful sentences in his address were those promising lower tariffs and pointing out the inherent absurdity in the Republican position of demanding payment of the war debts while at the same time making payment impossible. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Roosevelt went on to remark that if tariffs were lowered the war debts would no longer be a problem, which of course is not true; and even in denouncing the tariff he conceded the heart of the protectionist position when he repeated the silly argument that it is high tariffs that maintain our living standards. He indorsed the idea of an international monetary conference, but showed no signs of understanding the implications of such a conference. And he was guilty of some serious misrepresentations. When he accused the Republicans of not reducing the war debt at a sufficiently drastic rate before 1929 he attacked them at perhaps their one point of strength, for the war debt was consistently reduced at the unparalleled rate of about one billion dollars a year. And when he accuses the Administration of resorting to "the type of inflation which has weakened public confidence in our government credit" it is difficult to know what he means. All of the recent measures that could properly be described as inflationary have had Democratic support, and most of them, like the Goldsborough bill, the Glass-Steagall bill, and the Glass bond-secured currency bill have been either sponsored or chiefly voted for by Democrats.

IS PRESIDENT HOOVER merely playing smart politics in turning the Reconstruction Finance Corporation over to his political enemies on the eve of a national election? Or must we look elsewhere for his motive in selecting Atlee Pomerene, former Senator from Ohio, for one of the vacancies on the board of the corporation, thus giving the Democrats majority control? If the Reconstruction Corporation should accomplish everything its sponsors, including Mr. Hoover, have so grandly promised, the Republicans naturally would not care to share the resultant glory and publicity with the Democrats. Hence this effort to shift responsibility for the success or failure of the Hoover relief project to the shoulders of the Democrats suggests that failure of the relief program is anticipated, or else it must be feared in Washington that the Reconstruction Corporation may find itself involved in further scandals similar to that attending the $80,000,000 Dawes loan. Probably no more effective way of shutting off an investigation of the Reconstruction Corporation's activities could have been devised. Certainly the Democrats will not be over eager to inquire into the affairs of a body whose control rests in the hands of members of their party. In any case, it is just a trifle too naive to believe that Mr. Hoover would be willing, were he at all confident that the Reconstruction Corporation was proving a popular success, to pass on any of the credit for its success to his political foes.

THE CAMPAIGN BIDS FAIR to be remarkable for one thing. It looks as if a candidate for the Vice Presidency would really focus some attention upon himself. Indeed, it looks as if Mr. Garner might prove to be one of the issues. The Republicans see in him a vulnerable point in the Democratic line, in more ways than one. He himself has invited their attack because he has gone out of his way to slash at Mr. Hoover, for whom he obviously has no respect whatever. There is to us nothing attractive about Mr. Garner. In our judgment he weakens his ticket by his tactics, and his desire to make capital by attacking the "reds" is the clearest proof of the weakness of his mentality and the narrowness of his intellectual range. At least, however, it is refreshing to have him speak right out in meeting and squarely pin to Mr. Hoover his complete absorption in saving banks and railroads instead of interesting himself in saving the starving American. Indeed, from his talks it is obvious that Mr. Garner may be a pretty ugly customer after he gets on the stump. It will be at least refreshing if one of the four candidates will speak out and hit straight from the shoulder, even if it must needs be as unsympathetic a figure as Mr. Garner.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES of the minor parties will probably be barred from the ticket in Ohio next November through a series of amendments to the election laws which the legislature enacted three years ago. Only an aroused public opinion and immediate and effective action through the courts will serve to put the names of Norman Thomas, William Z. Foster, and other minor-party candidates on the Ohio ballot. The Socialist Party of Ohio, though its funds are running low, is conducting a vigorous campaign toward that end. Presidential electors, the Ohio Department of State has ruled, can only be nominated by "the delegates to a State convention." However, these delegates must first be elected at primaries, and under the Ohio laws only voters of recognized political parties, that is, Republicans and Democrats, may participate in such primaries. Thus the Socialist candidates appear to be legally barred. Even if this obstacle could be overcome, the Socialist ticket would still, under the 1929 amendments, have to be supported by petitions signed by no fewer than 300,000 registered and qualified voters. The Socialist Party of Ohio is now seeking the necessary 300,000 signatures, and The Nation urgently requests its friends and readers in that State to help in this campaign for the sake of establishing equal rights as between the political parties. Though they must take their fight to the courts, the Socialists feel that if they can obtain the needed signatures that fact will make a tremendous and perhaps convincing impression on the State and legal authorities.

IF THE ECONOMIC CONFERENCE to which the League of Nations has now invited the United States is finally convoked, it seems likely to set a record, assuming that it adheres to the terms of the invitation, as the most futile and farcical of all the international conferences of the last decade. The conference is to meet on the official understanding "that the questions of reparations, of debts, and of specific tariff rates (as distinguished from tariff policy) will be excluded." It is to meet, in short, only if the delegates agree not to utter a word about the three most vitally important measures that a world economic conference could discuss. Perhaps the distinction between tariff rates and tariff policy may turn out to mean something; more probably it will mean merely that the conference will agree on some pious general declarations which will bind no one. The conference will discuss "monetary matters," and the United States is assured that "within its scope will be the question of silver." Thus Senators from the silver States are placated. But what will, what can, the conference decide about silver? If it merely attempted, as has been hinted, to encourage the increased use of the metal as subsidiary coinage, then it would be sanctioning the clear economic waste of using silver where paper would do better. If it actually proposed a bi-metallic standard, which is the only other real alternative, then the moment such a proposal seemed likely to receive serious consideration there would be a raid on the gold reserves of every country still on the gold basis that would promptly throw every one of them off. The statesmen who are calling and discussing the conference have thus far given no evidence that they have the remotest notion of its probable implications or effects.

GERMANY IS DETERMINED to increase its armaments, even to the extent of violating the Versailles Treaty, if the other nations do not soon reduce their military and naval forces to comply with the pledges given to the German delegation at the Paris peace conference. This warning was issued by General von Schleicher, Minister of Defense, who is the real power behind the present Berlin Government. Such action had been hinted at before by the German press and by German delegates at the various disarmament conferences in Geneva, but heretofore the government has always sought to smooth over the diplomatic storms which followed the suggestion that Germany intended to rearm. The latest threat from Von Schleicher quite naturally disturbed Premier Herriot and the French foreign office. They addressed a number of formal protests to Berlin, expecting perhaps that the same diplomatic denials would be forthcoming. But for the first time since the war the Berlin foreign office stood fast; it declared very frankly that Von Schleicher had the full support of the government. This decision was bound to come not only because a militaristic regime now rules Germany, but because the German people long ago lost their faith in the hypocritical disarmament pledges of the other nations. For this France must bear a large share of the responsibility. The unceasing French cry for "security before disarmament" has been the chief stumbling block, at least in Europe, to execution of the provision in the Versailles Treaty for reducing all armaments to the levels forced upon Germany by that treaty.

IN OUR MELLOWER MOMENTS we have been expecting apologies to emanate from the participants in the arms conference at Geneva; but the only one that has come to our notice is that of Eduard Benes, spokesman for Czechoslovakia. According to the Associated Press, in one of the closing sessions Mr. Benes "made a public retraction and apology for his assertion two days ago that bombardment from the air is barbarous and inhuman." This graceful entre' acte was staged, it appears, "on the complaint of the British Air Ministry, which asserted that British flyers never had been guilty of barbarous actions." Now in our naive fashion we had actually worked ourselves up into believing that modern aerial warfare was a bit uncivilized if not downright indelicate. We feel immensely relieved. Our chief discomfort now is a patriotic one. In their development of nice and considerate bombs, which have none of the horrible messiness of the aerial equipment of other countries, the British have stolen a march on us. It fairly burns us up to realize that when an American airman drops one of our old-fashioned bombs on, say, a Sandinista hospital in Nicaragua, it puts our airmen in a reactionary light. The late Lord Thompson once declared, in answer to a disturbed questioner at a meeting of the Foreign Policy Association in New York, that when dealing thus with recalcitrant native populations, the Air Ministry was careful to blow up only revolutionaries. The only thing to do is to turn over all future jobs of bombing to the British, whose selective bombs in Irak, the Northwest Frontier of India, and elsewhere have supremely qualified them to perform the rite of pacification.

IF THE NATIONAL ECONOMY LEAGUE succeeds in its drive to reduce the yearly federal expenditure for the Veterans' Bureau by $452,000,000, the American taxpayer as well as the organization itself will be in line for congratulations. As we have repeatedly pointed out, the claims upon the government by veterans who have become disabled in the pursuits of ordinary life have mounted to a menacing degree. Our approval of this phase of the League's activity is qualified, however, by the fear that the movement may go on to assail all efforts at drastic taxation in the higher brackets designed to pay for essential social services.

It is preposterous for Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd, who is directing the campaign, to declare that our local, State, and federal taxes have "already reached the point of confiscation"; we can imagine what amusement such a reckless remark would excite among our British cousins, who know what taxation really is. Nor can we agree with General Harbord, another leader in the crusade, when he says that not only the Eighteenth Amendment, but "the tariff, the foreign debts, are for the moment incidental and subsidiary to the fight against mounting taxes." We strongly suspect that most of the League's moving spirits have been distinctly inconspicuous in the struggle to cut down sharply our shameful waste in armaments.

WELL, THE RED SCARE, which we have all been expecting as part of the Hoover general staff strategy, is well under way. Not only did the President try to explain his ruthlessness with the bonus army on the ground that its members were being unwittingly influenced by Communists, but we have in the same week dispatches from various portions of the country to the effect that wicked Communists are at work trying to destroy the banks of the United States by starting lying rumors about them. A raid in Pontiac, Michigan, produced, according to the police, correspondence to show that the occupant of a room was a party to a widespread conspiracy to destroy the credit of the nation's banking institutions. This undoubtedly clears up the whole mystery of why it is that we had some three thousand bank failures in 1931 while Canada did not have a single one. It is Moscow's fiendish brain which, with ghoulish glee, is at work in our midst. As our readers are well aware, every bank in the United States that failed has been honestly, ably, and in every way correctly managed, and in not a single case have the bank officials been derelict, or have the institutions been borne down by the evil influences of the depression. Thanks to the vigilance of the police and the Department of Justice, the reputation of our bankers is now spotless beyond question. Our congratulations go out to the valiant detectives who are not only balking the miscreants from Moscow but are vindicating a much-maligned group of American business men.

THAT BRAVE INDIAN, Vice President Curtis, recently sped across the country to Los Angeles to open the Olympic Games. At Las Vegas, according to the United Press, "Armed guards protected Vice President Curtis today as he sped to Los Angeles by rail after police arrested six persons in the crowd that watched him leave." Hecklers interrupted Mr. Curtis, and one of them shouted, "Why didn't you feed some of those ex-soldiers?" Vice President Curtis, it will be remembered, was the one who first had the courage to summon troops to combat the bonus army in Washington. They were ordered back, to be sure, at the insistence of General Glassford, who thought they were not necessary, and it remained for Mr. Hoover to prove that Curtis was right when he himself issued the call to arms which finally routed the invaders of Anacostia. We are glad to report that Chief Charles met the Las Vegas question with the same courageous finality. His reply was: "I've fed more than you, you dirty coward." Obviously, being Vice President is not as funny as Morrie Ryskind and George S. Kaufman think it is.

The End of Hitler?

WILL Adolf Hitler's smashing victory in the Reichstag elections ultimately prove his undoing? Reports on the voting of July 31 show that his National Socialists have won 230 seats, more than twice the number they had in the Reichstag elected two years ago. This gives the Hitler movement the largest representation any party has had in the German parliament since the republic was founded. But it does not give the fascist leader enough votes to control the government. Even with his Nationalist allies he lacks a governing majority. Hitler may now attempt to seize power by revolution, though this is exceedingly doubtful, for the time for direct action has apparently passed. Moreover, Hitler himself has repeatedly declared that he means to set up his dictatorship only by "legal" means. It appears, therefore, that the fascist leader must now either join a coalition with the Hugenberg Nationalists and the Catholic Center or refrain from entering the government, allowing the Van Papen Cabinet to remain in power through his sufferance.

By remaining outside the government, playing only a passive part in the affairs of Germany during the next few months, Hitler's influence would be largely negative. True, the large bloc of fascist votes in the Reichstag could be used as a club to hold over the present regime, but there are not enough fascist votes to put into effect any part of the Hitler program. And the fascist party is a party of action. It has grown fat on Hitler's extravagant promises. If its leader now fails to produce concrete results, fails to take energetic action leading to early improvement in the German economic situation, the party may very quickly turn upon this false messiah. On the other hand, if Hitler elects to enter a Nationalist-Catholic coalition, he will presumably be permitted to join only on terms laid down by former Chancellor Brüning, leader of the Catholic Center, without whose votes no coalition government can be erected. There is little doubt that Brüning would accept nothing in the Hitler program except that which is economically and politically sound. In brief, the greater part of that program would be unceremoniously rejected. But this again would mean that the action which has been promised the fascist voters would not be forthcoming. Hitler's impressive victory in the Reichstag elections virtually commits him to action; but, short of adopting violent measures, there is no way in which he can effectively act. Will the impoverished middle classes continue to follow his unproductive leadership much longer?

Even with Hitler's wings clipped the danger for Germany would not be over. The Von Papen-Von Schleicher regime has no votes in the new Reichstag. It might be willing to give way to a coalition government which it could dominate, but it may be doubted that it would retire for any other reason. General von Schleicher no less than Hitler means to rule Germany. He is probably willing to do so with the consent of the Reichstag and the cooperation of the moderate and nationalist parties, but if this cooperation is withheld and the Reichstag decides to oppose the present regime, that would in our opinion simply bring about another dissolution of the parliament, this time perhaps without provision for new elections.

Cowardice and Folly in Washington

WE should be the last to deny that a government must seek to keep order and that the challenge of the appearance of the Bonus Expeditionary Force in Washington was a serious one. But there are good and bad methods of handling every situation, good and bad police actions, wise and stupid, kindly and brutal ways of removing each and every menace to public order. According to our information from eye-witnesses, the bloodshed and forcible expulsion of the veterans was due both to folly and to cowardice. From the very beginning General Pelham D. Glassford, a retired regular officer who is the superintendent of police, has shown courage, intelligence, and sound common sense in handling the bonus army, and has been actuated also by commiseration for the desperate plight of the men who assembled in Washington in the exercise of their constitutional right to assemble and to petition for a redress of their grievances. If General Glassford had been given a free hand we should never have witnessed such incredible scenes as took place in Washington—seven hundred and fifty regulars, with tanks, tear-gas, and all the paraphernalia of war, brutally and ruthlessly running some 10,000 veterans out of town, burning their pitiful shacks, and incidentally gassing innocent civilians, newspapermen, detectives, without the slightest consideration for the plight of these destitute thousands after their eviction.

Obviously somebody blundered and blundered badly. Given a weak and timid man in a difficulty of this kind, and he is bound to be the first to turn to ruthless use of power, the first to do the wrong thing—and Mr. Hoover is both weak and timid. What was it that brought about the bloodshed on the day it happened? There had been weeks of tolerance; then great vacillation on the part of the commissioners of the District of Columbia who issued orders to evacuate the veterans and then revoked them and rode roughshod over General Glassford. On the day before the trouble, Wednesday, July 27, there was a sudden consultation in the White House with Secretary Hurley and Secretary Mills present, and action was decided upon. The troops were all in readiness about the sacred White House and the eviction began, with the results known. Even before that the White House had announced that it was considering the declaration of martial law and of calling out the army, but no one believed that this would be done until General Glassford had been allowed to try to move the men out.

Instead, the President, using as his excuse that the presence of the men was delaying the demolition of this property "necessary in order to extend employment in the District," issued his orders. At the very moment when, after consultation with the police, the commander of the veterans was trying to induce his men to go quietly, the White House turned a simple evacuation of a few half-demolished buildings into what the Baltimore Sun editorially describes as a "pitiful and brutal conflict between desperate homeless men and saber-swinging cavalry, with tanks in reserve"; as "a movement for the complete and ruthless clearing out of the whole 'army' from the District, the mild 'conservatives' and the 'radicals' alike." The President, in his afterthought, declares that there were many Communists and men of criminal records among the veterans who misled these innocents "unaware of the character of their companions." But if this was the case, why had not the police removed the criminals long ago? As a matter of fact, neither the presence of criminals nor Communists had worried General Glassford. Indeed, that officer immediately gave an interview in which he said: "I handled the situation for nearly two months without bloodshed. In carrying out orders issued this morning I am sorry to say that they resulted in the death of one man, serious injury to another, and injuries to several policemen." The orders, of course, came to him from above. With the same sympathy and commiseration which has moved him from the beginning, he declared that the only result of the army's action was that the veterans "will still be on the police, but not so well-handled." He is the only official who has expressed even the slightest concern as to what may happen to the unfortunates who are now without any place to lay their heads, or any possibility of sustenance. It would seem, if there is any humanity left in Mr. Hoover, that he would at least call upon the Red Cross to take these victims of official ruthlessness in hand. We admit, of course, that they are not the victims of an act of God; none the less, there must be some humanitarian agency which could take care of these men before they become really desperate.

As it is, no official statement can conceal the fact that the higher officials of the government lost their heads. And so, for the first time in our history, police and troops fired on and bombed their fellow-Americans in the streets of the capital. Indeed, if further proof of the state of nerves of the government is needed, we can cite the official statement of General MacArthur, Chief of Staff, who was so silly as to say that if President Hoover had not acted, "another week might have meant that the government was in peril"! Yes, our great American Government—not that of Colombia, or Salvador, but ours—was actually within a week of falling because of the presence in Washington of some 8,000 or 10,000 homeless, half-starved, unarmed victims of our social disorder! How strong his faith in our government!

Of course, we are aware that the New York Times type of mind rejoices. In the clubs and Wall Street there will be applause; it will be once more explained that it is really humanitarianism to "treat 'em rough" at the start. A little early bloodshed will serve notice on the country that the regulars are loyal, that the government will stand no nonsense and will shoot to kill whenever trouble appears. That, we shall be told, will save a lot of bloodshed. We wonder. One cannot be too sure. Sometimes ruthlessness works the other way. The law-abiding people of Anacostia booed and hissed the troops, and so did some of those in the city's streets, when they saw the way they had behaved and the application of the torch—and the troops threw gas-bombs at them. The people of the United States will not take kindly to the sort of military rule they have been in the habit of calling Prussian. At least, however, they have clear warning of what may come to pass, how slight is the distance to a military dictatorship, and how ruthless it will be.

Progress at Geneva

IN many respects we sympathize with the criticisms directed by Germany, Russia, and Italy against the Geneva arms conference, which took a six-months' adjournment on July 23. These governments pointed out that the conference had taken no step toward the reduction of armies and navies, and that it had failed to abolish "aggressive weapons," grant Germany juridical equality with France, or solve the Franco-Italian naval problem. As we said last week the outcome is on the whole a bitter disappointment. Nevertheless, the very fact that the conference has been able to accomplish something demonstrates that its efforts have not been wholly in vain. It should not be forgotten that these disarmament negotiations have taken place during one of the most critical periods in world history. Every country, gripped by the depression, has vainly attempted to protect itself by nationalistic measures whose only effect has been to create international animosity and to intensify the depression. Moreover, in the Orient a "war" has been fought between Japan and China, while in Latin America there have been renewed threats of war between Bolivia and Paraguay. In Europe new apprehensions have been aroused by the establishment of a Junker dictatorship in Germany and the high-handed overthrow of Social Democratic rule in Prussia.

Under such circumstances, it would have been easy for the arms conference to have adjourned in open bitterness and complete disagreement. Fortunately this result has been avoided. It is true that the conference has not concluded a general disarmament treaty; but it has adopted a number of important provisions which may be embodied in such a treaty when the conference reassembles next January. Thus, the governments have agreed to the abolition of all bombardment from the air—an extremely important provision, especially from the standpoint of civilian populations. They have sanctioned the French proposal for the internationalization of civil aviation, as the one effective means of preventing civilian craft from being converted to military use upon the outbreak of war. They have decided to limit the size of land artillery and tanks and to prohibit all forms of chemical, bacteriological, and incendiary warfare—all of which is good as far as it goes, but, if adopted, only makes war a little less horrible. Finally, they have agreed to establish a permanent disarmament commission to supervise the execution of the disarmament treaty, when finally completed, and to act as an organ of conciliation when any government believes that its security is threatened by the armaments of a neighboring power. During the next few months committees also are to study the best means of securing a reduction in the present size of armies and navies, of securing the limitation and reduction of military expenditure, and of controlling the private manufacture of arms. Although this list of accomplishments does not secure any immediate relief from the burden of armaments, the Geneva conference, we repeat, has succeeded in keeping alive the goal of disarmament in a period when it might easily have been abandoned, and in taking certain steps toward insuring that the goal eventually will be realized.

During the next six months the United States will have an opportunity to take three steps which in our judgment will greatly facilitate the work of the arms conference when it reconvenes. In the first place, the American Government should reexamine its naval and military policy to see whether it really conforms to the doctrine laid down by President Hoover that in view of the anti-war pact armaments must be used only for defense. It is clear to us that there is no danger threatening the "defenses" of the United States which justify building up to the parity levels of the London naval treaty. It is also clear to us that the simplest and most far-reaching means of securing naval reduction lies in abolishing the battleship. If England and Japan consent to such abolition, no one can argue that the United States should retain the battleship for "defensive" purposes. Likewise, the Hoover disarmament proposal of June 22 should be amended so as to discard the provision increasing the American army to 200,000 men. Congress should also radically amend the National Defense Act of 1920 under which the American army today consists of a skeletonized force, manned by an excessive number of officers, the purpose of which is to throw six field armies of 4,000,000 drafted men into Europe immediately upon the outbreak of war. The assumption that the American army is to be employed primarily in fighting battles in Europe is utterly inconsistent with the principles of the anti-war pact. The American army should be transformed into a genuine defense force, thus saving millions of dollars to the taxpayer and proving our sincerity.

Secondly, the United States should assist in strengthening the procedure for the pacific settlement of disputes. Until an adequate means of peacefully composing international difficulties is established, it is unlikely that the world will achieve a large measure of disarmament. The Nation does not believe that the United States should become involved in any system of international sanctions; but it does believe that it should work for the development of international organization, based upon pacifist principles. We hope therefore that President Hoover will send a strong delegation to the September Assembly of the League, to consider what joint action, short of the application of sanctions, should be taken upon the report of the Lytton commission concerning the Sino-Japanese dispute.

Finally, we again enthusiastically support Senator Borah in urging the American Government immediately to convene an international conference to attack world economic problems, including the cancelation of all war debts. A year ago no French cabinet would consider wiping out the Young plan because of fear of being immediately overthrown. Last month, however, M. Herriot, realizing the disastrous consequences of failing to settle the war-debt question, consented to the virtual abolition of reparations. The very audacity of the move changed the attitude of the whole world toward France and greatly strengthened M. Herriot's political position at home. Opposed as it is to a Republican victory this November, The Nation is frank to admit that Mr. Hoover's prospects for reelection would be greatly increased if he followed M. Herriot's example and made a bold effort at solving the international economic problems. Will Mr. Hoover have the courage and the imagination to act?

"Only a Novel"

THE literary section in the current issue of The Nation is devoted especially to reviews of novels—commonly regarded as the "lightest" kind of reading and hence the most suitable to that season of the year when the mental energy of the population is supposed to be at its lowest ebb. Many generations of novelists have fought against the assumption that works composed in the genre which they cultivated were necessarily inferior to other forms of literature, and perhaps few people today really believe that they are, but prejudices die hard and there are a dozen conventional phrases still current which imply apology. Ask the average man with a book what he is reading and the chances are that he will reply, "Only a novel."

The truth of the matter is, however, that fiction is not merely the most popular form of belles lettres; it is also the one with which men live most intimately and by which they are most commonly and continuously influenced. The very artistic—and therefore artificial—perfection and beauty of the lyric or dramatic forms make them somewhat remote. The more admirable they are, the further away they seem, and it is not the greatest or the most enduring works of art, which, at any particular time, come most pertinently "home to men's hearts and bosoms." They lack the concreteness, the superficial verisimilitude, and the immediate relevance of the novel. They may exalt us and they may take us beyond or above the ordinary concerns of our daily life. But they do not, like the novel, make themselves a part of it to such an extent that what we read in, for example, a Theodore Dreiser or a Sinclair Lewis, seems merely an extension of our daily experience.

It was, indeed, out of the need for a literature of just this kind that the novel was born, and it did not at first know what to call itself. Defoe's proto-novels were merely fake memoirs. Richardson wrote his with the deliberate and avowed intention of illustrating his moral ideas by means of realistic fables. And if the novel soon freed itself from the narrowness of Richardson's mind it has remained surprisingly true to his fundamental conception, for it has usually been something either more or less than pure art.

For the very reason that the novel is "impure" it has been able to become the vehicle for many things. Every great social, or moral, or political enthusiasm has used it, and no inconsiderable part of its history might be written in terms of the "movements" which have employed it for their own purposes. It has been taken possession of time and time again by tactics similar to those now being employed by the Communists who are proclaiming that only "Marxian" novels ought to be taken seriously, and though it has always proved itself more enduring than any movement, much of its vitality has resulted from the fact that it could be thus taken possession of and used.

For this reason literary critics have tended either to distrust it or to reserve their praise for the rare examples of what they have been pleased to call "pure" novels—for Flaubert, perhaps, or, more recently, for André Gide or Marcel Proust. In them they have admired qualities not dissimilar to the qualities of great poetry or great drama—namely, style, detachment, unity, and harmony. Accordingly, they have proclaimed these the only real novels and, in a sense, they are right. But they have foolishly expected that they should also be the ones most read or admired, and they have forgotten that however admirable the virtues praised may be they are not the ones which the novel originally sought or the ones for which the novel has generally been read.

The stream of fiction is a muddy stream; it has borne along in its current all sorts of things which artistically should not be there. But it is largely because of these extraneous things that it has been read; largely because of them that it has exerted upon the lives and opinions of the public a more direct influence than that exerted by any other kind of writing. Poetry reflects and influences the deepest and subtlest of our feelings. From the poetry written in any age might possibly be deduced the spiritual state of the greatest spirits of that age. But the novel gives the very form and pressure of the time.

Primarily, in other words, we go to the novel less for art than for information and experience. In the case of no other form of literature does both the pleasure and the profit deducible from it depend so largely upon what we are being told and upon what we seem to be going through. In no other form do defects of almost any kind seem of so little importance provided only we are able to gain some sense of familiarity with a type of character, a way of life, or an attitude toward society with which we were unfamiliar before.

No one not ashamed to admit that his education is incomplete need apologize for reading "only a novel." No one who feels that there are things for him still to learn about the manners and thoughts of his contemporaries need think that he is wasting his time merely because he has turned from "serious" books to a piece of fiction, even though that piece of fiction may possibly be neither of permanent value nor of great artistic excellence. For art, precious and indispensable as it is, is not the only thing we live by or for. It represents the quintessence of experience and, sometimes, the transcending of experience, but experience is the crude stuff out of which it is made, and there is no form of literature which is so nearly the equivalent of experience as the novel.

Perhaps youth is and ought to be the time when most novels are read. Few mature men read them at the rate of one a day as many young men have done for a year or two at a time. Youth is, after all, the time when the need for experience is most acutely felt and the time when experience is most likely to seem capable of containing the answer to every vaguely felt need. Later one is more likely to realize that even the widest experience is unsatisfactory and, for that reason, to feel more and more strongly the charm of those purer forms of literature which so obviously provide more than vicarious experience. But few men are wise enough or experienced enough really to dispense with the novel, and whoever has given up reading it must confess that he has lost interest in the mere life of his times.

The St. Lawrence Treaty

By RUTH FINNEY

Washington, July 26

NO issue with more fascinating possibilities than the new St. Lawrence treaty has ever been presented to the American people as the basis of a nation-wide political campaign. By advocating the treaty, a candidate may please some of the farmers, some of the railroads, some of the power companies, some of the municipalities concerned. By insisting that the treaty as it stands today has delayed rather than hastened final settlement of the St. Lawrence dispute, a candidate may strike a responsive chord among some of the farmers, some of the railroads, some of the utilities, some of the cities.

This treaty, which must be ratified by the United States Senate and the Canadian Parliament before becoming effective, is looked upon with favor by farmers in the northern block of midwestern States because they believe it will mean cheap transportation for their products. States a little farther south, which expect to benefit more from shipping their goods down the Mississippi, look at it askance, fearing it does not permit diversion of enough water from Lake Michigan to maintain a nine-foot channel in the river. Railroads and those who have invested in them do not enjoy the prospect of increased water transportation from the West. But that is true in regard to development of both the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi. Erie, Pennsylvania; Cleveland, Ohio; Detroit, Michigan; Gary, Indiana; Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Duluth, Minnesota; and Chicago, Illinois, may all become deep-sea ports, open to 90 per cent of the world's ocean commerce, if the St. Lawrence waterway is opened. On the other hand, Buffalo, where all lake ships must now stop to transfer their cargoes, will lose much of its importance.

And then there is the question of hydro-electric power, a question full of ifs, ands, and buts. Cheap and plentiful power from the St. Lawrence would make possible electrification of the New York Central Railroad between Buffalo and New York, a contingency earnestly desired by that railroad since its competitor, the Pennsylvania, has undertaken extensive electrification work. The General Electric Company, close ally of the major utility groups, would supply the equipment for such a project. Construction of a generating plant by the State of New York, which can borrow money more readily and more cheaply than any corporation at present, would insure low-cost power to make the enterprise a success.

On the other hand, the State's plans for utilizing the St. Lawrence power call for development in a way that will "benefit the people of the State as a whole and particularly the domestic and rural consumers to whom the power can economically be made available." Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt and his Power Authority have been taking this provision seriously and laying plans for either selling power to a private utility company under contracts guaranteeing low rates to domestic and rural consumers, or distributing the power direct to municipal and district purchasers. The Niagara Hudson Power Corporation of the Morgan group of utilities, serves northern New York at present and urgently wants St. Lawrence power on its own terms, an aim it apparently will not accomplish while Roosevelt directs the policies of the State. It furthermore does not want a low-rate yardstick established in its territory.

On the other side of the international line, opinion is quite as much divided in regard to the treaty. The same conflict of interest exists there between farmers desiring cheap transportation and the railroads. Montreal, now an important shipping center, is unwilling to relinquish its importance to other cities farther west. And the power problem is just as complicated on that side of the line.

The St. Lawrence development will produce 2,200,000 horsepower of new hydro-electric energy. Half of this will belong to Canada and half to the United States. All of Canada's share will go to the Province of Ontario with its large and prosperous public power development and its low power rates. The share of the United States will all go to New York where Roosevelt's plans call for making cheap power available alike to industry and small consumers. Both facts are extremely distasteful to the Province of Quebec, where private power companies, some Canadian and some American, including the Aluminum Company of America, are strongly entrenched. Quebec has very low industrial power rates and has already lured a number of American firms desiring to take advantage of them across the line into the province. If low industrial power becomes available in New York, the advantage of moving to Canada obviously diminishes. So Premier Taschereau of Quebec denounces the treaty as "a national crime" and promises to block its ratification as long as possible.

The document which has been in the making for many years and has caused such uproar upon completion, is a short, terse compact opening the way for construction of a twenty-seven-foot ship channel in the St. Lawrence River the entire distance between the Great Lakes and the sea, at a total cost of $543,429,000, including works for generation of power. Of this total cost, the treaty provides that $272,453,000 shall be borne by the United States and $270,976,000 by the Dominion of Canada. It allows credit for work already done in essential parts of the seaway, with the result that the United States must still expend $257,992,000 while Canada's share is $142,204,000.

Two important matters were in controversy between the two countries in addition to this allocation of costs, and on both of them the United States has surrendered to her northern neighbor. Canada was anxious that two power dams be built in the river instead of the one large dam recommended by United States engineers and particularly by engineers of the State of New York. Construction of one dam would have meant a greater amount of Canadian land flooded in the adjacent reservoir, and construction of dikes around a number of small Canadian towns. Construction of two dams adds approximately $70,000,000 to the cost of power generation, and almost doubles the cost of annual maintenance. Action of the United States in agreeing to the two-dam plan considerably increases the amount New York must expend as her share of the project.

The second matter in dispute concerned diversion of water from the Great Lakes. In the treaty the United States has consented that no waters shall be diverted without permission of the International Joint Commission beyond the 1,500 cubic-second feet for Chicago's drainage canal allowed by the United States Supreme Court. At the time the court's decision was handed down, construction of a nine-foot channel in the Mississippi River had not been undertaken, but the decision left the way open for discussion of further diversions of water. The treaty closes the door to this possibility, unless consent is given by the International Joint Commission, of which half the members are Canadians.

For over a year, New York has been asking the federal government to enter into an agreement with the State as to the share each shall pay of development work in the international section of the St. Lawrence. The Dominion of Canada entered into such an agreement with the Province of Ontario. After much supplication, the United States State Department began a series of conferences with members of the New York Power Authority looking to division of costs, but these conferences were broken off abruptly in June, with a statement that President Hoover would decide New York's share of the necessary expense. New York has heard nothing more from the federal government, and the treaty was signed with its status still undetermined.

For years, private power companies have turned greedy eyes toward the potential energy of the mighty St. Lawrence, but since that portion of it capable of power development constituted the international boundary between New York and Ontario, the State and the province have each asserted ownership of half the bed and banks of the river, though neither could make use of its property until Canada and the United States, with preeminent rights to control navigation, should agree on development of the river.

During the past few years, with such an agreement in sight, New York has taken definite steps, under guidance of Governor Roosevelt, to establish for all time its claim to this great resource and to develop it as a public project. Roosevelt's plans, furthermore, have called for cheap power for general use. At present, the average rate paid by domestic consumers in Canada, including both public and private power plants, is 2.29 cents a kilowatt hour. In the United States the average domestic rate is 6.03 cents a kilowatt hour. Differences on either side of the St. Lawrence are even more marked because Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission is in control of one bank of the river and Morgan-owned utilities are in control in New York.

Proceeding with this program, New York created a State Power Authority early in 1931 and directed it to generate New York's St. Lawrence power as soon as international negotiations permitted. Sale of this power, greater in quantity than the amounts capable of being generated at Boulder Dam and Muscle Shoals together, was to be made to private utility companies at the switchboard, and Governor Roosevelt promised New York that no sales would be made except by contracts guaranteeing low retail rates to domestic and rural consumers.

Since only one company, the Niagara Hudson Power Corporation, has lines extending to the St. Lawrence, Roosevelt announced an alternative plan providing for public distribution and sale of power if satisfactory contracts were not obtainable. He proposed to take advantage of New York laws permitting the State to designate utility transmission lines as common carriers, and thus assure distribution of St. Lawrence power without the expense of building public transmission lines. The final step in his alternative plan called for legislation permitting cities and rural districts to purchase power and distribute it locally.

The entire plan, however, was dependent in two respects upon action by the federal government. Construction could not start until navigation plans were completed and an international agreement reached. And construction could not profitably be undertaken at all if arrangements were made requiring New York to spend an excessive amount in generating power. The State had means at hand to control retail power prices, but first it would have to sell at wholesale prices great enough to cover costs of generating.

In view of this situation, Governor Roosevelt wrote to President Hoover in June, 1931, immediately upon creation of his Power Authority, asking that New York be represented in all negotiations concerning the St. Lawrence. A month later, having received nothing but a routine acknowledgment from the President, Frank P. Walsh, chairman of the Power Authority, wrote again, urging the necessity of conferences between the State and federal governments to settle their problems before negotiations were undertaken with Canada. Throughout the summer and early fall, New York continued to ask for conferences. Finally, on October 14, Walsh wrote to President Hoover pointing out that "the federal and provincial governments of Canada had reached a complete accord regarding issues corresponding to those upon which the Power Authority, representing the State of New York, feels it essential to seek an understanding with you."

Hoover referred the letter to the State Department, and on October 28 negotiations between the federal and State governments began. At that time, a member of the Canadian Parliament disclosed, treaty negotiations were already under way between his country and the United States. Scarcely had conferences between the Power Authority and the State Department been undertaken when the latter served notice that it would expect New York to pay $150,000,000 as its share of the St. Lawrence development. Members of the Power Authority protested that this amount exceeded the cost of all works for navigation and power on the American side of the river, would frustrate the purpose of the State to provide cheap electricity for homes and for industries, and would drive large American industrial concerns across the Canadian border. Negotiations continued through the winter and spring. Secretary of State Stimson, himself a New Yorker and member of the law firm of Winthrop, Stimson, Putnam, and Roberts, legal representatives of the Niagara Hudson Power Corporation, went to Geneva, leaving the conferences in charge of subordinates.

At length it was agreed orally, according to the Power Authority, that $150,000,000 was too large a sum to levy against New York. However, no alternative sum was agreed upon, and on June 7 of this year members of the Authority were suddenly notified that the policy of the federal government in all these matters would be decided by the President. Protests from the Power Authority against concluding a treaty with Canada before the domestic problem had been settled went unanswered. Word leaked out that the treaty was ready for signature. A telegram from Governor Roosevelt to President Hoover asking a conference before the matter was concluded met with curt and sarcastic refusal. Four days later Hoover announced that an agreement with Canada had been reached. His announcement, hastened apparently by Roosevelt's telegram, came the day before ad-journalment of Congress, and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at once arranged for investigation of the whole affair during the fall recess. Governor Roosevelt expects to air his grievances before this committee and ask that Congress fix New York's contribution to the St. Lawrence project on an equitable basis before ratifying the treaty with Canada.

Southern Labor Stirs

By A. J. MUSTE

High Point, N. C., July 22

AT about eight o'clock on the evening before last I was standing with Lawrence Hogan, hero of the Marion strike of 1929 and southern representative of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action, on the main street of this Carolina industrial center. A group of workers were unfolding to Hogan, whose appearance and talk marked him as a "native," the details of the "general strike" which had occurred the previous day. Suddenly we noticed a disturbance a block away. We found that a group of about twenty-five men, mainly young, had just forced their way into the Rialto moving-picture house, the finest in town, without paying any admission. They contended they were unemployed and without money, but nevertheless entitled to their movies! By the time we arrived at the theater enough State troopers had thundered up on motorcycles to stop further unpaid admission to the theater.

A few minutes later, as we stood on a near-by corner talking to some former Marion strikers who had moved to High Point, every light in the city suddenly went out. Every wheel operated by electric power had stopped. It was about fifteen minutes before light and power were turned on again. Next morning the papers explained that a fuse had blown out in the power station. It was a patent subterfuge; we learned for a certainty that trouble had occurred with the electric motor driving the machinery in the Diamond Hosiery Mill, one of those on strike. The version given by the unemployed was that some of their number, deprived of a chance to see the movies free, resorted to another form of direct action and ruined the motor in the hosiery plant "to teach the big fellows that we hain't going to stand for no more bad treatment."

High Point began its industrial career as a wood-working and furniture town. It experienced a post-war boom, the population rising from 14,000 in 1920 to nearly 40,000 today. In addition to expanding its furniture industry, it lured hosiery, cotton, and silk mills seeking to escape union conditions elsewhere. It claims 125 manufacturing plants with an output, before the crash, of $52,185,880 annually and a pay roll of $10,000,000 paid to approximately 12,000 industrial workers, the total gainfully occupied in the city amounting to nearly 17,000. Because of unemployment, short-time work, and repeated cuts, wages have almost reached the vanishing point. The furniture industry is "shot to pieces." A representative of the United States Department of Labor to whom I talked yesterday described it as "another one of these dying industries, the result of changes in the home life of Americans, the use of steel furniture in offices, and similar developments." Hosiery is perhaps a little better off, but a number of hosiery mills furnish only one or two days' work a week. Striking hosiery workers expressed themselves as able to live on a wage of $2 per day, provided they had five days' work per week. I had just left the head of the city welfare department who had shown me grocery orders of four dollars per week issued to a medium-sized family when I met a cotton-mill worker who had such a family to support and who told me she was making $4 for a 36-hour week. She went on to say that she might as well not be working at all. The same city official informed me that nearly 1,400 families, one-seventh or more of the total in the city, were on straight relief or being furnished work by the city.

This is the all-too-common story of a population being forced gradually toward starvation. The two factors had an important bearing on the "revolutionary" outburst early this week. The leading hosiery firm is the Adams-Millis. Mr. Millis is on the city council. Mr. Adams is the big gun. His company leads every wage-cutting move, then the others are "forced" to follow, and when the cut has gone the rounds, Mr. Adams begins another one. Mr. Adams is bitterly hated by all the workers. They tell you that he recently built a house costing $85,000 on property costing $65,000. There are indications that the townspeople generally share this feeling at least in a mild degree. Secondly, the furniture workers charge that many of them have been loafing for months because cheap labor was brought in from the farms to replace them. City authorities assert that they made special efforts to prevent this, and that most of the employers "cooperated splendidly," but they admit that the cooperation was not complete.

This was the set-up at the beginning of the week when the Guilford Hosiery Mills announced a further wage reduction. The workers in the boarding department promptly walked out, and the other departments followed suit. Like a flash, word spread to other hosiery plants and in one after another every single worker shut off his machine and went on strike. As the hosiery workers poured into the streets—there were between four and five thousand of them presently—a wave of excitement swept through the little city. There was not a family which was not directly affected. The unemployed furniture workers, nursing an old grievance against those who had taken their jobs, spontaneously marched to the furniture mills, overpowered guards, unceremoniously tossed a couple of protesting employers out of the windows of their own mills, and drove the workers into the streets. The cry went up to shut down every plant in town.

Next, the crowd marched to the Duke Power Company's plant and shut off the power. Some of the workers began calling Negro servants in private houses to come out on strike, and a few answered the call. Cars and buses were commandeered and the crowd went out to shut down hosiery and furniture mills in the surrounding towns, Thomasville, Kernersville, and Lexington. At this point a total of 150 plants had been shut down and 20,000 workers called out.

During the evening, crowds marched around the city having a gay time. There was talk of entering bakery and food stores, but nothing came of it. The authorities had advised business places and stores in the downtown section to close. State troopers were arriving in considerable numbers. Plainclothesmen had caused the arrest of a number of young fellows—"hoodlums," they were said to be—who had been especially active in closing down mills. The crowds were exhausted from excitement, and went to bed.

Here was a "general strike" in a conservative Southern city. Beyond doubt it was unpremeditated. There is no unionism in the town. No Communists had been active. Furthermore, the move was carried out by workers who consider themselves patriotic Americans, who are violently anti-red, who have been taught to regard strangers with suspicion, and who have no labor philosophy. Of course, policemen, state troopers, and detectives followed us about. But these paid guardians of law and order were less relentless in following our car with its New York license number than hosiery workers who didn't want any "outside agitators" "making trouble." They think it was because of the presence of "outside agitators" that shooting occurred at Gastonia and Marion in 1929. It was they who called the police to take Beulah Carter, a Durham hosiery worker sent into High Point as investigator by the Hosiery Workers Union, into custody and who were talking of running her out of town the next morning. Within the past few hours some Communist organizers have come into town and been arrested, and it is quite possible that a known Communist in High Point is safer behind the bars than on the streets in working-class neighborhoods.

My impression is that the city authorities have so far handled the situation cleverly. They have used no "rough stuff." They have built up a suspicion of any "outsider" who might advise the strikers, who are utterly inexperienced, although these same authorities state they would welcome an American Federation of Labor union. They have driven a wedge between the hosiery workers, the other trades, and the unemployed, so that the hosiery workers themselves urged the others to go back to work after the first day—which practically all of them did. The leader of the hosiery strikers, of whom there are now 5,000, has issued statements denouncing "hoodlumism," pledging maintenance of "law and order," stating that they have had no advice and leadership from outside and desire none. Privately he states that he realizes the need for organization, but that the time to talk about that will be when this strike is settled.

The employers, or at least most of them, have offered to rescind the recent wage cut, provided the workers agree to a survey of wages paid elsewhere in North Carolina and to accept a cut if the differential is proved to be unfavorable to High Point's competitive position. The workers answer that they know when their wages are not enough to buy food with, without surveying other towns, and are demanding that the wage scale of April 1 be restored. The recent cut was the second since that date.

Sex Wins in America

By MORRIS L. ERNST

FOR its first hundred years the United States was unafraid of sex. It was free of literary taboos except for a taboo against blasphemy. Though it did not approach sexual matters in any mood of high joy or open gaiety, nevertheless amorous excitement was a portion of literary diet even though accompanied by some of the feelings of a naughty boy hiding from his teacher. Those men who drafted our federal Constitution bulged their cheeks in naughty giggles when reading the works of Fielding or Sterne. The plays of Congreve were presented without expurgation. Sexual literature was openly sold in all the States and territories, and in all probability the manufacture and sale of so-called dirty postcards had not even made an appearance. Bootleggers were not known.

The very early tariff acts contained clauses intended to bar foreign obscenities. This manifestation was more anti-foreign than anti-sex. Public dress was, of course, strictly circumscribed—so strictly that in many portions of New England a maiden was not allowed to wear her hair in braids. It was too provocative to the youth of the land. But this was strictly Puritan—a reaching for outward decency and public conformity.

Up to 1870 neither the great classics of all languages nor the writings of contemporary authors were hauled off to the headquarters of vice agents in a frenzied search for material which might corrupt the young. Literary freedom was curtailed only for women, who were deemed unable to cope fully with the frankest literature of the day. White men were considered immune from corruption. The reading of Negroes was of course restricted. In some States it was made a crime to offer even a Bible to a Negro. The restrictions on both Negro and feminine reading were obviously attempts to preserve male, white supremacy.

And then around 1870 the lid was clamped down on matters of sex. A new era began. The name of Comstock has been indelibly attached to this second period. He was the leader. He was a symbol for all those who were sexually repressed. His diaries indicate the pathetic distress of an incurable analerotic. He suffered with a horrible guilt, all through life, when he felt that he had thus sinned against God. But his immediate backers were the wealthy bankers of the day. Delightful old harum-scarums like J. P. Morgan acted as founders of the Society for the Suppression of Vice.

Censorship spread over the land like a prairie fire. The government declared that use of the mails was a privilege and not a right of the people and that no obscenity should go into a mail pouch. State after State declared that obscene matter was illegal. But in not a single legislative hall was a definition of obscenity attempted.

The only specific, identified, objective ban was the one laid upon contraceptive information and apparatus. Up to 1870 the entire press had run advertisements of methods of birth control. Suddenly our American scene underwent a change. Contraceptives had to be smuggled into the offices of doctors and under the counters of drug-stores. Advice as to proficient and aesthetic methods of preventing conception was taboo even to the medical profession. This important field of public health acquired such bad odor that the medical profession became cowardly before the danger of being called lewd or obscene.

After 1870 the surreptitious printers began to flourish. In the period that followed, thousands of postcards depicting the sexual act in normal or in so-called perverted positions were printed and sold to men, women, and children. Books banned from the mails were in great demand. Condemned works sold at high prices and excessive profits. Theatrical products permitted all through the civilized world, even in England, were suppressed. "Sapho," "Mrs. Warren's Profession," "The Captive," "Maya," "God of Vengeance," excited the vice-hunters. Burlesque shows and semi-nude chorus girls were not interfered with, but "Strange Interlude" could not open in Boston. The works of Walt Whitman, freely distributed from 1855 to 1888, were suppressed in the latter year. The "Arabian Nights," the "Decameron," portions of the Bible separately printed, "Hagar Revelly," "Ulysses," and scores of other books were haled into court.

And in this clash of interests all of our reading became more frank. Not that we have yet come to the kind of bawdy and robustious sexual reading that Washington and Jefferson and Madison enjoyed—but we are on our way.

The vice-hunters acted as the advertising agents of sex. Several books that would have sold a paltry few thousand were printed in the tens of thousands because Mr. Sumner was shocked. Try as he would to keep the names of the attacked volumes out of his annual reports, the press spread the news, and by word of mouth people whispered about "The Well of Loneliness" or the Dennett pamphlet. The former became a Lesbian bible and sold in excess of 100,000 copies, and the demand for the latter kept pace with each step in the legal proceedings. Boston went on rampages. Hundreds of volumes were attacked in the Boston Book Massacres. "An American Tragedy" was convicted by a judge and jury, and the highest court of the State sustained the conviction.

Books and plays were the early windmills for our censors. And then came their great opportunity—the movies. Six States were persuaded to create political boards of official censors. Millions of feet of film were cut each year. In one State a hairpin was deleted—too stimulating to men in these days of bobbed hair. New York tries to ban pictures of corrupt politicians. Kansas says no liquor may be shown. Many decisions were oddly paradoxical. Massachusetts, convicting the salesman of Dreiser's "An American Tragedy," voted down State censorship of the movies. New York attacked Lesbian themes such as "The Well of Loneliness," but Boston never even batted an eye at female perversion. The federal courts acquitted the publisher of "Hagar Revelly" and the New York courts within three months condemned the book. Books were legal in Chicago but banned in New York, legal on a Tuesday and illegal on a Wednesday. The ban indices of the two great federal agencies—Post Office and Customs—seldom agreed. Y. M. C. A.'s ordered the Dennett pamphlet by the thousands, while the directors of these Y. M. C. A.'s, sitting as directors of vice societies, tried to suppress it.

Certain plays ran an entire season on Broadway and on tour, but a screen version of them was not allowed. Sexual material was permitted at times if sold in expensive bindings, but attacked if sold at two dollars a volume. The rich had either been corrupted or were not worth saving. Judges, clerks of the courts, and jurors seldom returned the copies of the books containing alleged obscenity presented in court by the vice societies. Liberals in the general fields of economic thought sided with the Comstocks in their crusades against sex. Walter Lippmann was the standard-bearer for some of the bitterest campaigns conducted against sex magazines and theatrical productions. Many who stood with Jefferson in his plea for a wide-open market in economic thought shied away from sex.

It is amazing that many people who belong to an organization such as the Civil Liberties Union are afraid of the right to spread sexual ideas. They endeavor to preserve their attitude of freedom of thought by opposing the obscenity laws, but are outraged by what they call "pornography." This they cannot define, but they accept its prosecution as a social need. There is plenty of hiding-space behind the weasel words of any law. The twilight zone between obscenity and pornography is beyond human vision. The creed of anarchy or the fighting gospel of communism, many liberals contend, should be allowed free dissemination. A change in government even by force holds no horrors for them. Let everyone express his ideas without any interference. The danger to the State is slight, and even if it were great, did not Jefferson say that a revolution every decade or so is good fertilizer for a vital commonwealth? But men and women, their sexual libidos—hush, hush, there you will find danger. The hearth, the young are threatened. Men may not go home to their wives, and wives may be educated up to a curiosity about diverse sexual experience. Very few men in or out of the scientific professions have stood up in the community and shouted: "Where is the proof that any of this sexual material is injurious? Is it not merely a matter of taste? Can obscenity be defined, and if defined, is it not a word of subjective, changing content? Is a specific voltage of sex to be allowed in a book, and on the silver screen a smaller dose? And what about the famous First Amendment to the Constitution, called the Bill of Rights, which we all have been brought up to think guarantees complete freedom of thought?"

For nearly sixty years the Constitution was forgotten. The Supreme Court had been shocked by the Comstock exhibits of 1870. The mails were closed to obscenity; this in spite of the fact that in 1835 Clay, Calhoun, and Webster had all declared in stirring Senate debate that any censorship of the mails was not only unconstitutional but highly dangerous. But that occurred when an attempt was being made to use the mail censorship in order to prevent Abolitionist literature from seeping into the South.

The Supreme Court whittled away a large hunk of the Constitution when the censorship of the movies was sustained. On that occasion the hedging was more difficult.

It had to go so far as to say that the movies had nothing to do with ideas, that the screen was merely an exhibit, like a flea circus, and hence any State could license and regulate and censor to its heart's desire. Six States and many cities have done so. Pictures portraying pacifists have been banned in Pennsylvania and New York, which has virtually destroyed their national market. Ridicule of Volsteadism is not permitted. The movie censors have persistently censored ideas.

For nearly fifty years, from 1870 to 1920, campaigns were waged against everything connected with sex. Thousands of dollars were poured into the vice societies. Police officers were prodded into action by these extra-legal agencies, which were often endowed with special powers and at times were authorized to retain a portion of the fines resulting in cases in which they had been the entrappers. But the tide swept on. From the Comstock point of view the citizens were rushing faster and faster to purgatory. The censors failed to recognize that the styles in obscenity had changed even as women on bathing beaches had dropped off their flounced sleeves and their cotton stockings. One-piece suits appeared on the beaches and in our novels.

And then in true American fashion the first real signs of a shift appeared. We have always been a people of anarchistic tendencies. Law has never been sacred. We nullify whenever the lawgivers, judges, or legislators hand us a statute not to our liking. We even agree with Emerson that immoral legislation should be disregarded. For a time nullification is quiet and orderly. We profess admiration for laws which may protect others, but like the censors of books we are certain that we ourselves cannot be harmed. And then comes a time when the courts balk at the hypocrisy of the land. Judges and jurors cannot longer subscribe to oaths of office and see the laws flouted. And from the benches come the decisions which whittle away the objectionable statutes. Thus do the courts reinterpret so as to save us from further open defiance. Many courts, after 1915, started to sense the mood of the people. Judges were in a devil of a pickle. What they condemned one summer they found on the newsstands the following winter. "Three Weeks," by Elinor Glynn, was suppressed in Boston by the highest jurists. One year later, if they reread it, they must have wondered what they had been shocked at. Legal decisions affecting literature were overridden by the people.

Since 1915 the leading vice agency of the United States, the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, has failed to gain a conviction in a single case where a book was published with an established publisher's imprint or where the book had been openly sold by the retailers and reviewed by the press. In other words, acceptance by the ordinary book trade and book public was regarded by the court as a standard in testing obscenity. The testimony or the blush of a paid attorney for a vice society was no longer convincing. "Hagar Revelly" was the turning-point. Since that conviction the vice societies' victories have been restricted to surreptitious prints, postcards, little scraps of paper stealthily disseminated by people with a sense of guilt.

Let us look at the battlefield and the lines the Comstocks have withdrawn to. They attacked Gautier's "Mlle de Maupin." After a bitter struggle the court held the book to be a classic—legal and pure, even though the highest court of New York had commented on the fact that the avowed purpose of the volume was to make light of virtue and to glorify fornication. The clerk who had been arrested, sued, and recovered several thousand dollars from the society for false arrest and malicious prosecution. Cabell's "Jurgen" was next brought on the mat. One of the ablest criminal judges declared it to be immune. It was too sophisticated. Too few persons would understand its subtleties. Petronius's "Satyricon" was haled into court. A long opinion was handed down. This was aged in the wood. It was pre-Comstock stuff, hence legal. "A Young Girl's Diary" and "Women in Love" received honorable mention from the judges. Juries were bored by the reading of "Replenishing Jessica," and length and boredom were accepted as reasons for immunity. "The Well of Loneliness" dealt with homosexuality. The theme shocked the censors. But our wise judges refused to condemn any book on its theme alone. Mary Ware Dennett sold thousands of copies of her pamphlet, "The Sex Side of Life," dealing among other things with the subjects of masturbation and venereal disease. The pamphlet even said that the sexual act was the greatest physical joy of man. Without setting up possible alternatives, the censors threatened Mrs. Dennett with jail. A jury conviction had to be overturned by the judges of the Circuit Court of Appeals. Sex education took a big spurt.

After ten years of suppression a new attempt was made to legalize Schnitzler's "Casanova's Homecoming." A magistrate said that times had changed, but the vice agents still thought that maybe the grand jurors would not agree with such heresy. A grand jury read the book and refused to indict. The book was cleared. Dr. Marie Stopes's books were the cause of many men and women going to jail a decade ago. But in 1931 not only was "Married Love" (it sold 700,000 in England) allowed into the United States, but the federal courts permitted the importation of the author's other books, "Wise Parenthood," "5,000 Cases," and "Contraception." What were we coming to? "Contraception" is a book giving pictures of various contraceptive devices. For decades the medical profession had believed that the best European knowledge on the subject of birth control must be smuggled into this land of the free. The bootleggers of the standard works of Holland, Germany, and England were promptly put out of business by this decision of Federal Judge Woolsey. And to cap the climax, the federal authorities have generously and wisely admitted "The Sex Factor in Marriage." This book, written by Dr. Helena M. Wright and sold for two dollars, treats of sex as a joy and a gay thing. The pleasure motif is the chief consideration of the author. The book is not a classic. It is not old. It is not sophisticated. It is not technical. It is not a bore. And still it is openly sold.

Frank sexual-education tracts may be legally sent through the mails. Homosexuality is an admitted theme. Books dealing with birth control may be imported. Contraceptives may be sent through the mails to doctors or druggists if for prevention of disease as well as for prevention of birth. Classics encouraging infidelity have been approved by our high courts. Crudities of expression, scatological references, have been held to be neither lewd nor lascivious. The campaigns of the sex-hunters in the United States are virtually at an end unless the vender of the picture or the tract enters the courtroom with an air of guilt and with the taint of stealth.

Explaining to Dmitri

Ex-Prince Dmitri Vichovich

4268 Third Avenue

Leningrad, U. S. S. R.

DEAR DMITRI: I have your letter asking me to explain to you the political situation that affronts, as you so neatly phrase it, the American people. I shall do my best, but you must understand that I am confronted with a grave difficulty: that of not understanding it myself. You have probably confused me with Walter Lippmann, who explains everything in the New York Herald Tribune. Mr. Lippmann explains everything to everybody's satisfaction, with the possible exception of the man who writes the Herald Tribune editorials. Either the latter gentleman does not read Mr. Lippmann (which is, of course, incredible) or he isn't convinced by what he reads (which is even more incredible). Most incredible of all, however, are the editorials the gentleman writes for the Herald Tribune. These are so incredible that nobody understands them, not even Mr. Lippmann, though he would probably venture to explain them anyway.

But, Gott sei dank, you have not asked me to explain the Herald Tribune editorials or Mr. Lippmann, and I am duly grateful. You want to know what has taken place in the arena of American politics, and I shall try to give you a brief summary.

Practically all the conventions (including the Culbertson two-bid) have been held, and the list of the simple homespun nominees is truly formidable. The G. O. P. (which you must not confuse with your own dear G. P. U.: the G. P. U., as I understand it, puts people out of their misery quickly, whereas the G. O. P. prefers the slow torture of starvation) has nominated Herbert Hoover again. He is, of course, the logical candidate, having done nothing at all in the past four years. During his administration, his personal fortune has shrunk from four million dollars to seven hundred thousand. If these figures mean anything, in four years more Mr. Hoover should be able to leave the White House and take up permanent residence in the Poor House. This gives the American people as fine a chance for revenge as they have had in years, and the Republicans are counting heavily on this motive to keep them in power.

The Democratic convention was enlivened by a "Stop-Roosevelt" movement. We shall not know until November just how successful this movement was, but the general impression is that anti-Roosevelt men scored a triumph when they succeeded in nominating John Nance Garner as Roosevelt's running mate. It is a little too early to tell in which direction Roosevelt is running—toward Garner or away from him, though a study of Roosevelt's previous tactics leads me to believe that he is not running, but straddling. He straddles as well as Mr. Hoover, and, from any distance at all, it is almost impossible to tell them apart. This point is being taken advantage of by the Republican propagandists, who keep asking "Why change Hoovers going downstream?"

Immediately after his nomination, Mr. Roosevelt flew to Chicago, and then made a trip in a small boat along the New England shore line. This seems to prove beyond a doubt that he is physically fit to cope with the problems of the Presidency. Only his mental fitness for the office is now open to question. Mr. Farley, his campaign manager, insists, however, that Roosevelt is eminently qualified to follow in the footsteps of his predecessors, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, and there may be something to what he says.

The Socialist Party nominated Norman Thomas, who has none of the false pride that occasionally pops up in American nominees. If it's a Presidential year, he runs for President; if it's just a gubernatorial year, he runs for governor. Mr. Thomas will poll a large vote, including mine, which usually goes to Al Smith. But the fact that Thomas is the ablest of the candidates will count heavily against him. The American people have a tradition to maintain, and you can rely on them to maintain it. Heywood Broun is not running this year, but may do a show instead. Those who saw Broun's last show want him to stick to his political career, but, after all, there are no chorus girls in politics.

The Communists are going to have a ticket in the field, but you, naturally, know more about that than I do. I doubt that they have a chance, as the only Communists in America are those who are beaten up by the police, and when the police get through, a Communist is lucky if he can register, let alone vote.

The Prohibitionists had a convention, but have not nominated anybody permanently yet. They are dickering with Borah, but you know what happens to anybody that dickers with Borah. It is true that Borah is not satisfied with the Republican prohibition plank. Neither, however, was Nicholas Murray Butler. But the difference between the two men is that Borah, though dissatisfied, decided to remain in Washington; Dr. Butler, immediately after the convention, sailed for Paris, where he had no difficulty in putting through a wet plank. You can say what you want about Dr. Butler (unless, of course, you're a student at Columbia) but he's nobody's fool.

Some other items may interest you: Senator Norris has come out for Roosevelt, but then even Achilles had his heel. . . . Mrs. Roosevelt will edit a magazine for babies. This I take to be a tactical error, as babies can't vote. . . . And young Jimmy Roosevelt has shown that blood will tell by issuing a statement on one day and denying it the next. . . . Paul Block is not expected to cut Jimmy Walker's salary for 1933, as the proposed reduction is to apply only to city employees. . . . And Julius Klein, of the Department of Commerce, has issued another statement to the effect that business is better. Dr. Klein's statements, like those of the department stores, are issued on the first of every month, but you can take 98 per cent off. This tops Macy's by quite a bit.

Well, there's the news. I hope you can make something out of it. Give my regards to Sonia, Petrovich, Babushka, and the others. And tell them not to worry about us. There is no depression here. Out of 120,000,000 people fully 100,000,000 are still working.

Yours, etc.,

MORRIE RYSKIND

In the Driftway

COLONEL Frederick Stuart Greene, New York State Superintendent of Public Works, has recently been upheld by Judge Pound of the Court of Appeals in his two-year fight to keep the Perlmutter Furniture Company from blotting out a large section of the landscape with a huge billboard. The billboard in this case was set up for the edification of travelers approaching a beautiful new bridge which Colonel Greene had just finished superintending; and it is easy to understand that Colonel Greene felt as badly at having his new bridge violated by Mr. Perlmutter's billboard as an early American connoisseur would feel at having one of Mr. Perlmutter's overstuffed Grand Rapids sofas set down within the chaste paneled walls of his eighteenth-century living room. Colonel Greene not only felt badly. He got very mad, and since the land on which the billboard stood was private property, he decided to build, on State property in front of the sign, a lattice-work screen in the exact proportions of the billboard.

■ ■ ■ *

THE injunction with which the beast, in the guise of the Perlmutter Furniture Company, sought to estop beauty, in the person of Colonel Greene, was upheld in a lower court. But in a higher court, beauty won, as we have come not to expect. "No adjacent property-owner," ruled Judge Pound, "has the vested right to be seen from the street in his back-yard privacy." And this extraordinary decision ended with the following sentences: "Beauty may not be a queen, but she is not an outcast beyond the pale of protection or respect. She may at least shelter herself under the wings of safety, morality, or decency."

■ ■ ■ *

JUDGE Pound's decision is not the first one of its kind. Another judge in another part of the country has only recently discovered a paradoxical thing called the public's privacy, and has ruled that billboards have no right to invade it. The implications of both decisions are amusing and startling to contemplate. If Colonel Greene can protect his highways from billboards why cannot the Drifter rid his varied path not only of all the trade names and claims which now scream at him as he goes by, but also of the architectural monstrosities, large and small, which line that path from Maine to California? We shall soon be reading of property-owners "taking the rap" for perpetrating a horrible bungalow, and the Drifter knows of at least three service stations whose owners he would like to have sent up. The day may even come when the innocent bystander can hale into court one of those crimson-nailed, gum-chewing denizens of our public thoroughfares and prosecute her on the grounds of violating the aesthetic Bill of Rights, firm in the knowledge that the American Civil Liberties Union will see him through to the Supreme Court if that is necessary. It is true, of course, that a new species of censorship based upon beauty would work hardships on certain worthy causes. Nine out of ten nudists, for instance, would be banned, not because they were indecent, but because they were plain to the point of illegality.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

God Save Us, Indeed!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Surely Paul Y. Anderson is much too generous when he writes that "No one whose cerebral development exceeds that of a soft-shell crab could possibly listen to the proceedings for ten minutes without being impressed with their trashy and degrading character." For like most radio bunk, the conventions were broadcast because people like that sort of thing.

One might argue that had the recent movement to broadcast murder trials been successful, its effect would have been to debunk sensationalism in our courts, or that our scandal sheets debunk rather than promote scandal and scandal-mongering. But the tragic fact remains that thousands of intelligent men and women, stimulated by mob excitement, were enchanted by what they already knew to be political bunkum.

God save us from television!

Los Angeles, Cal., July 7

H. JEFFERY SMITH

The Doom of Pessimism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his review of "The Doom of Youth," by Wyndham Lewis, Joseph Wood Krutch observes that a very distinct advantage of Lewis's ideological system, so far as its "pure entertainment value" is concerned, is its unpredictability—as compared, for example, with Marxism, since "one always knows what a Marxian is going to say." Does this mean that Mr. Krutch is prepared to expound a seriously Marxian interpretation of any phenomenon under the sun—of Greek mythology, let us say, or Shakespeare's tragedies, or Tolstoy, or Abraham Lincoln, or the American Civil War (to mention only subjects on which eminent Marxians have made observations)? Or does Mr. Krutch's remark mean anything at all—except that Mr. Krutch himself is not a Marxian? Is an irresponsible unpredictability, in his eyes, the test of a sound ideological system? And would he recognize the possibility that might be tempted to feel, no matter how unjustly, that after decades of corrupt self-pity and complacent world-weariness one always knows exactly what a romantic and pessimistic individualist is going to say?

Northampton, Mass., June 29

NEWTON ARVIN

Against War

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Among all the international conferences of recent years on war, the forthcoming congress called for August 20 to 22 by a committee of distinguished European writers holds out hope of vigorous action on a new united front. Headed by Romain Rolland, Albert Einstein, Henri Barbusse, and George Bernard Shaw, it has already organized a formidable support.

An American committee has been formed to organize the American delegation, with Theodore Dreiser as its chairman. Fifty delegates are wanted. Will Nation readers who have friends in Europe planning to be in or not far from Paris August 20 to 22, advise them to get in touch with the Congress headquarters? The address is Kampfkongress gegen den imperialistischen Krieg, Berlin-Charlottenburg 4, Schlüterstrasse 33, Germany. Full information will be sent from there.

New York, July 31

ROGER BALDWIN

Books

Prelude

By CONRAD AIKEN

And there I saw the seed upon the mountain but it was not ■ seed it was a star but it was not ■ star it was a world but it was not a world it was ■ god but it was not a god it was a laughter blood red within and lightning for its rind the root came out like gold and it was anger the root came out like fire and it was fury the root came out like horn and it was purpose but it was not a root it was a hand destructive strong and eager full of blood and broke the rocks and set them on each other and broke the waters into shafts of light and set them end to end and made them seas and out of laughter wrung ■ grief of water and thus beneath the web of mind I saw under the west and east of web I saw under the bloodshot spawn of stars I saw under the water and the inarticulate laughter the coiling down the coiling in the coiling mean and intense and furious and secret profound and evil and dispatched in darkness shot homeward foully in a filth of effort clotted and quick and thick and without aim spasm of concentration of the sea and there I saw the seed upon the shore but it was not a seed it was a man but it was not a man it was a god magnificent and humble in the morning with angels poised upon his either hand.

Kaoru the Incompetent

The Lady of the Boat. Being the Fifth Part of The Tale of Genji. By Lady Murasaki. Translated from the Japanese by Arthur Waley. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

ONE of the most amazing things about Lady Murasaki's masterpiece is that it gets better as it goes along. One might have guessed that the cries of praise which critics sent up over the first volume several years ago would be followed, as new volumes appeared, either by qualification or by silence. But no such thing. Each instalment has been given its special superlative, and there can be no doubt that this fifth one will in its own way demand—and get—encomiums.

One reason for all this might seem to be that Lady Murasaki worked on every page of her story with the greatest care. Though long it is unpadded. There will be more than half a million words of it by the time the sixth and last volume is here; yet it would be difficult to open the work anywhere and find it slow or meaningless, or anything indeed but compact almost to the point of epigram. The conversations are everywhere dramatic; the landscapes are always as precise as the finest prints; and the story never pauses for an instant, though it may charmingly digress.

The only other reason would be the old one of genius, and I suppose it is the best. It is difficult to believe that anybody who could not write like this by nature could ever learn to do so by art. Art is long, but not that long. Or at any rate it is true that in all the time during which westerners have written novels they have not advanced to the combination of qualities which this Japanese lady achieved with apparent ease a thousand years ago. Even Proust, who has been compared with her in an attempt to prove that she deserves high place, could have learned from her, if he could have learned from anybody, to keep somewhat nearer than he did to the human center. Possessing all of his subtlety, and—unless it is Mr. Waley's English that should be praised here—possessing all of his resources in language, she has in addition that kind of sympathy which can be found more often in persons who are not at all clever than it can in persons like herself, and she has a beautiful abundance of common sense. She is quite ■ fascinated by manners, quite as addicted to the aristocracy, as Proust; yet her reader never feels that he is being conducted through a mob of gilded eccentrics. Her people may not be the kind one knows, yet each of them, no matter how remote his manners, becomes immediately familiar and remains a friend.

"The Lady of the Boat" begins after the death of Genji, who as hero held the preceding four parts together. The interest is now divided between two young men, Kaoru, Genji's reputed son, and Niou, his grandson. But Lady Murasaki, far from being handicapped by this multiplication of heroes, gains by it, since she knows so well how to distinguish between Kaoru and Niou and how to play them off against each other. Both of them are exquisite and captivating gentlemen with whom every Japanese lady falls in love, yet they are as different as Hamlet and Casanova, Kaoru being rendered incompetent in gallantry by ■ certain seriousness which makes him hanker after monkhood, and Niou being saved from the appearance of promiscuity only by ■ delicacy which matches his impetuosity. The volume is concerned chiefly with the love of these heroes for two sisters, Agemaki and Kozeri, who themselves are scrupulously distinguished—though, since ladies are more alike in romance than gentlemen are, an even finer brush is required to draw the line between them. The story of these four is isolated by a masterful stroke of art from the other great story which runs through the "Genji" series like a mural background. This other story is thronged with people, and is in effect the history of a whole court, the incessant bustle of which is always audible above the murmuring of whatever lovers may occupy the foreground at a given moment. The resulting harmony is something which only the greatest novelists have been able to create—which only a great novelist, indeed, ever thinks of attempting. The lesser novelist may exhibit his ingenuity in the devices he employs to make his characters few; but he misses the ultimate triumph when he shuts the multitude away, for the multitude is mankind.

Readers may wonder whether Kaoru, whose reluctance to lose himself in love is made so perfectly clear, ever experiences the passion for Agemaki which Lady Murasaki says he does. If this passion is not credible, then the book does have one fault. But the wisdom of its sentences, the excellence of the poems which are scattered everywhere through it, the brilliance of its landscapes, the warmth of its wit, and the depth of its understanding will more than make up for any such detail. And Mr. Waley's English will be always ■ reason for reading farther.

MARK VAN DOREN

Men of the Sea

Three Fevers. By Leo Walmsley. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

LEO WALMSLEY'S English fishermen are simple people, and his account of their lives is limited almost entirely to their activities at sea and to their work preparing equipment ashore. Occasionally, it is true, he shows one or another of them at home, but they seem somewhat staid there, and ill at ease, as though they were conscious of being watched; bantering their womenfolk, drinking tea, or commenting about the weather, they seem determined to behave as one feels fishermen at home should behave. The real drama of their lives, the author seems to say, or at least any drama worth writing about, is not in their domestic or financial or sexual problems, but in the nature of the work they do. The three fevers that grip them are cod fever, lobster fever, and salmon fever, each attacking the members of the Lunn family (and all the fishermen on the coast) before the last has entirely spent itself, and each bringing its special complications and its special dangers. Mr. Walmsley evidently knows these risks and complications, and the people who share them, very intimately. He seems to draw upon a great store of technical information for his effects; if we are a little vague about the essential differences between his characters, for example, by the time the book is finished, the various and frequent storms they endure are sharply differentiated. And to show how one storm differs from another is perhaps more difficult than to indicate the differences between people—at any rate, it is a more unusual accomplishment. When it is said that the descriptions of simple manual tasks—of launching the boats, of drawing in the nets or the lobster pots—are cleverly and clearly given, with a minimum of waste on the technical explanations, the outstanding features of this first novel are roughly stated.

What is significant is that the author, admiring the recklessness and daring of his characters, communicating his admiration and the reasons for it with great skill, reveals no such daring in his approach to the physically safer, mentally more precarious occupation of writing. He describes at great length Marney's determination in drawing in the last line while a storm is threatening them all, and he lets the reader know what risks (of which the fishermen are clearly conscious) lie behind this determination, but he draws back from the emotional crises of his characters' lives with a caution he would presumably despise if his characters revealed it. So he edges away from conflicts—other than that of man against nature—when they threaten, taking refuge in an off-at-a-tangent comment, or in a blank, impersonalized observation; or he solves a dilemma too easily by changing the subject. And so, too, he checks the flights of fancy and the minor extravagances that disturb his patient, detached realism. The loss is all the more apparent because such modest attempts as he gives are invariably pleasing:

For a time we were silent. Despite that, we were conscious of the approaching wind and its significance, we watched the line coming on board with undivided interest. The fascination of a fisherman's life is that he reaps his harvest from an unseen world through whose insecure and perilous crust he throws down his sacrificial gifts for a reward that may be small, or may be great, but is always uncertain.

This is a long way from the imaginative daring that threatens "Moby Dick" on every page, but it is at least similar in kind. There are enough of these passages to indicate that much may be expected from Mr. Walmsley if he will bring to his own craft some of the recklessness he admires in another.

ROBERT CANTWELL

The Crisis Stands

The Crisis of Capitalism in America. By M. J. Bonn. The John Day Company. $2.50.

The crisis was ultimately due to the misuse of capital. The savings which the production surplus has yielded, or was expected to yield, had been spent in the construction of new production plants of constantly increasing capacity, in the hope that the consumers on whose behalf this vast apparatus was to operate would grow up automatically. The capitalist world in which we live has formed the habit of conveying credit, the elasticity of which is exceedingly large, mainly into channels of production. It is still obsessed by the pre-capitalistic notion that consumption is an evil which represents a more or less unavoidable kind of extravagance. Apart from consumer-financing which constitutes only a comparatively small part of total consumption, the fact remains that production is over and over again expanded with the aid of credit derived from or built up on savings—in particular, by the construction or expansion of costly plants which can turn out goods as cheaply as estimates proclaim only if they are fully employed—whereas consumption is left to itself. . . . So it comes about that production is governed mainly by technical considerations, and far outsteps consumption both in time and quantity, since it has secured for itself technical perfection, but not financial success.

SO Professor Bonn describes the cancer at the heart of capitalism. To my mind, and to the mind of a gathering number of students, it is a sound diagnosis. Capitalism in the sense of a system devoted to the saving and investment of private capital seems to have about run its historical course. Capital has accumulated, in the form of cement, steel, lumber, bricks, machines, and serialized processes, to a point where we have approximately all of it we need for a high standard of living in America, and far more of it than the domestic market can absorb in terms of purchasing power. This applies to booms as well as to slumps. Looking abroad for other markets, we find lumber, cement, and steel piling up not only in Europe, but in Asia, South Africa, South America, Japan, and Russia—in some countries already in excess of the domestic market. There are new factories all over the old dumping grounds. Part of our recent prosperity was due to the producers' goods we sold to build and equip these factories.

What good is a pile of capital if there is no place, broadly speaking, to invest it profitably? The civilized world after one hundred and fifty years of thrift, savings, self denial, and financial buccaneering has built its capital structure. The job is done. The next great historical move obviously is to use the structure at approximate capacity to throw off consumers' goods.

This means more income for consumers and less for savings and reinvestment. Such is the only formula which the future can utilize. But it is a formula alien, heretical, and self-destructive to capitalism as such. Capitalism can only accept it by ceasing to be capitalism and turning into—shall we say?—consumerism. Capitalism has never given a damn for the purchasing power of consumers, but has kept the machine going by providing jobs through expanding the industrial structure. The structure is now overexpanded, and the capitalistic formula has run out; or, to be more precise, the structure has exceeded the limit of market demand, and the formula is about to run out. (There may be one more business cycle in it, or there may not.)

Crisis, indeed. Professor Bonn does not carry his argument quite to the point indicated above, but his analysis moves remorselessly in that direction. To quote again:

America has behaved in much the same way as did German industry when it borrowed so heavily. Both saw only one-half of a period of time: the half during which, with the aid of credits, one creates new production plants and therewith furnishes work, pays wages, reaps profits, and gives new impetus to production. Meanwhile they completely forget the second half of the period, during which the new factories ought to be producing, but, owing to the restricted marketing potentialities, are unable to do so to the full extent. In place of the hoped for low working costs, they are burdened with comparatively high capital charges and high working costs. . . . So long as this false financing was going on, it helped bring about a trade boom.

Professor Bonn, like J. A. Hobson, knows what he is talking about. His book is clear, penetrating, and sound. It tells America what is the matter with her, and in doing so tells capitalism what is the matter with it. An alternative title might have been "Tombstone for a Dying System." He propounds no remedies, an honest course to take, for there are not any. We can, of course, bury the corpse and change the system. This thought, however, our good professor does little more than hint at.

As I write, the stock market heaves upward, commodity prices increase spottily, employment gains in a plant here and a plant there. Defenders of the old formula are on their knees praying that the corner has been rounded. Perhaps it has. What of it? A little relief; a few deep breaths; a flurry of speculation. The market for producers' goods has reached its approximate ceiling. Nothing has been done, or can be done under the old formula, to broaden and stabilize the base of consumption. Back of flurry, optimism, and temporary activity, implacably the crisis stands.

STUART CHASE

A Romantic Note

The Devil Is an English Gentleman. By John Cournos. Farrar and Rinehart. Two volumes. $3.75.

OBSERVERS of the swing of the literary pendulum have confidently been awaiting the emergence of a new romanticism; a romanticism chastened by the bitterness of realism, but still throbbing with that infinitely satisfactory vitality that comes with its akinness to the intensely human world of ideal dreams. The lugubrious barrages issuing from the neo-humanists ensconced in their academic fortresses have apparently resulted more in deafness than conviction, and every faint tinkle of a romantic note is the more refreshing if for no other reason than the pleasant contrast.

The pain of a realism that approached a sadistic limit has paved the way for a new romance. John Cournos's "The Devil Is an English Gentleman" is an attempt to do away with that pain, or, in other words, to follow the new trend. He has written two romantic volumes, but unfortunately, instead of taking into consideration the realistic epoch that shattered the purple dream of the Victorians, he has simply resurrected it, even to the obnoxious color. Like Ernest Dowson, Mr. Cournos in a mild way would like to fling roses riotously with the throng, but he has forgotten that the roses of that vintage smell mostly of decay.

Mr. Cournos has conceived a romantic plot of noble proportions. He has gathered together the lives of three generations of English gentlemen. He has interpreted them in terms of their loves. Their dreams and their individuality are the basic texture of his work. Their growth and decay is the growth and decay of their single personalities. The self of his characters develops from within, oblivious to external abstract

Back to Her Middle West

WILLA CATHER'S

OBSCURE DESTINIES

Three new stories written with all the charm and artistry we have come to expect from one of the greatest of living authors.

5 1/4 x 7 3/4 inches, 230 pages, $2.00

"the book-of-the-year"

CHARLES MORGAN'S

THE FOUNTAIN

"A superlative novel." 451 pages, $2.50

In "The History of Civilization"

G. S. GHURYE'S

CASTE AND RACE IN INDIA

The institution of caste in all its aspects as seen by the Reader in Sociology at the University of Bombay.

6 1/4 x 9 1/2 inches, 209 pages, $4.00

Sixty Poems

LANGSTON HUGHES'S

THE DREAM KEEPER

A selection from the work of this famous Negro poet, with twenty-one poems which have not appeared before in book form. Illustrated. $2.00

Coming August 15th, Sigrid Undset's new novel, THE BURNING BUSH. Order now. $2.50

At All Bookshops

ALFRED · A · KNOPF · PUBLISHER

forces and circumstances. Their self is the whole, and all that matters.

Yet, as Mr. Cournos unfolds his people, or rather lets them unfold themselves, one is increasingly conscious of the fact that these are not beings created by an insight looking from the perspective of post-realism. They are rather the reflections of one who has tried to restore a dead romanticism that grew too lush and went to seed in terms of realities that it tried to hide. The characters of Mr. Cournos find themselves in situations which could develop into a new individualism and a new romanticism compatible with the present. Instead of following this excellent possibility, he is content to drag Thaddeus of Warsaw out of his deserved grave, set him down in red plush drawing rooms and let him exchange stilted profundities with sad-eyed females—and all of this with considerable tiresome verbosity that ends in a tennis match between once-impassioned lovers and ex-almost mistresses.

H. A. BRINSER

Two Against the World

The Rueful Mating. By G. B. Stern. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

G. B. STERN'S newest novel has been warmly praised by reviewers as intelligent and discriminating as Rebecca West and Lewis Gannett, and many bookstores class it with "The Good Earth" and "The Fountain" as a best seller. It concerns a little girl, Halcyon Day, who at the age of twelve was fêted and spoiled in New York as a child prodigy given to the production of dreadful tripe miscalled poetry, the forcible removal of that child by a disgusted English father to a good healthy English background where he fervently hoped she would soon "find her level," her growing-up, and marriage.

It is possible that the author seized upon this story as a useful vehicle for poking fun at all the various English methods of educating good healthy little girls, and at all the different adult attitudes toward that strange creature whom Agnes De Lima once aptly called "Our Enemy, the Child." The ridiculous elements of any hoary institution, often accepted as uncritically by those accustomed to them as we accept our skyscrapers and chewing gum, are immediately apparent to an outsider. Halcyon was an outsider by virtue of her precocious notoriety which had removed her from the companionship and pursuits of childhood, and by virtue of her four years' residence in New York. The concussion that she made upon the good healthy English background to which her father brashly transported her, and the concussion that that background made upon her, furnish Miss Stern with abundant opportunities for the humorous exposure of the worst elements in the English system and the worst consequences of being a child prodigy. The value of this exposure is somewhat marred by Miss Stern's hearty liking for caricature. The stodgy unimaginativeness of Captain Day and his sisters is as boundless as is the fatuity of New York worshiping its twelve-year-old celebrity; and one gathers at times that Miss Stern confuses the state of being a child prodigy in America with the state of being a child in America. Nevertheless, the diligent reader will find numerous clever jabs at a good healthy English childhood and at American sentimentality. But 184,000 words seem to me rather more than a writer as accomplished as Miss Stern should take for an exposition that could have been more effectively made in a magazine article.

One must assume, therefore, that she was writing a good, solid, substantial novel, one of those enchanting books that can go on and on forever because they create a world of their own, a world in which the reader finds excitement or emotion, or surcease from his own world. Such a book must make one believe in it, whether as reality or fantasy. And here again I am at a loss. The quite improbable plot might well be supposed to represent a child's wish-fulfilment dream, an escape from the cut and dried responsibilities of life. And yet the impossibly good and noble, if prankish and diverting Eden, a child actor whom Halcyon fortunately encounters soon after her arrival in England and whose path thereafter crisscrosses hers by courtesy of a large number of coincidences, this noble Eden is represented as attaining his nobility as a result of unflinching devotion to the realities of duty.

And here, apparently, we encounter the central theme of the book, the essential flimsiness of a spoiled little girl who is an awfully good sport but whose aspirations outrun her experience, and the essential nobility of the child supporter of a family who never forgets duty and so bounds into fame. This theme embedded in something very long, whether a wish-fulfilment fantasy, or a good substantial novel, or a satire on Parents Versus Children, I'm not sure which, is aided on its course by a large assortment of whimsical people who somehow don't seem to come alive in spite of skilful tricks of showmanship, by a large assortment of unexpected happenings, and by a nice selection of sensitively rendered English scenes. But for this reviewer these concomitants do not fuse together into a world.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Shorter Notices

Gingertown. By Claude McKay. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Claude McKay approaches the problems of the American Negro, in novels, poems, and short stories, realistically. He does not plead for his people. He is not so much trying to win sympathy for them from the outside as he is attempting to reveal them to themselves. "Gingertown" is a collection of short stories which those who enjoyed "Home to Harlem" will want to read. Here there is a wider range of subject material; and there are several different backgrounds—Harlem, Jamaica, Broadway, homes, churches, and cabarets. No one of these stories is as good as "Home to Harlem"; but there can be no question that McKay stands in the front rank of the writers of the so-called Negro literary awakening. The arrangement is unusual; in general, the stories grow increasingly better as one reads the book through.

Fathers of Their People. By H. W. Freeman. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

The author of "Joseph and His Brethren" has gathered under one title what are, in actuality, a series of short stories about Suffolk farm characters. The stories are idyllic, and even if they are not profound and moving they possess a pastoral warmth which is effectively sustained for retrospect by the sudden explosion of the war at the end of the book.

The Book of Living Verse. English and American Poetry from the Thirteenth Century to the Present Day. Edited by Louis Untermeyer. Harcourt Brace and Co. $2.50.

Mr. Untermeyer forestalls criticism of his selection of poems for this book by telling us that the intent of this collection "is immediate and intuitive instead of analytic," that he offers here poetry which he believes to be "living" regardless of its period or of its subject matter. "Living verse" has for the editor that combination (as well as communication) of passion and personality which is, for him, a touchstone of passion. The collection is not for scholars, but for those "who lack intimacy with the great body of English and American poetry or immediate leisure to pursue the acquaintance." Mr. Untermeyer is offering, in other words, a short-cut to an appreciation of poetry through bringing together in one volume the lyrics (and the poems are almost all lyrics) which because of mood, subject matter, or beauty of form, or all three, have long been enjoyed by students of poetry.

With respect to the earlier periods, Mr. Untermeyer's selection was really made for him; this poetry has been in anthologies over and over again, and Mr. Untermeyer has shown little inclination to vary the selection. As for the poetry of modern times included here, we have the editor's own judgment as to what is best, and the selection is somewhat curious. There are some rather startling exclusions and some rather startling inclusions. Humbert Wolfe is well represented; Louise Bogan, ■ much finer poet than most, is not included. The book represents Mr. Untermeyer's feeling for what is "living verse"—the feeling of Mr. Untermeyer and of the earlier editors of anthologies.

The Running Footman, or the Sentimental Servant. By John Owen. The Macmillan Company. $2.

When the great lords of England had young men to run before their carriages in all manner of weather, it is to be supposed that the state of the young men's lungs would be pitiable; even more pitiable would be the state of affection of young men who were considered lowly in the servants' hall. For of course such young men would love slightly above their station. Upon these threads a not very interesting story is woven, in ■ style which is wordy to little purpose. There is no reason why the novel might not have been historically sharp and keen, but the events run so quickly into heavy sentimentality, which the subtitle anticipates but does not excuse, that the footman's last race is not harrowing but only pointless.

Mrs. Taylor. By Marjorie Worthington. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

What happens to ■ proper and well-to-do American woman in the prime of life when she loses her successful husband? Nothing; she simply continues being proper and well-to-do, and in due time accumulates another successful husband. "Mrs. Taylor" is a cold, meticulous, and not in the least improbable portrait of such a woman, well content with her fine suburban home, her servants, her garden, her smart clothes, her baths, her bridge parties—a sterile woman, but of course one of the very best people, afraid of nothing but life itself and capable of everything except grandeur and ignominy. Mrs. Worthington's novel is to be commended for its faithfulness of portrait and for its simplicity and precision of style, but lacking as it does any suggestion of social criticism or moral evaluation it falls short of genuine distinction.

The Getting of Wisdom. By Henry Handel Richardson. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

Originally published in 1910, "The Getting of Wisdom" bears the hall-mark of the author of "The Fortunes of Richard Mahony." One understands how so quiet a story laid in ■ girls' boarding school in Austria passed almost unnoticed, its exquisite profundity unappreciated, its psychological insight missed in the simplicity of the tale which has no dramatic high spots. In the light of the great trilogy and of that fine musician's novel, "Maurice Guest," recently revived, it yields its rich significance. It is worthy to stand beside those others, for, though far less ambitious in scope, it achieves an equal perfection. Little Laura is a child of imagination without sentimentality, of intellectual realism without practicality. She is proud and feels that she is superior, as, potentially, she is. She is also the shameless opportunist. She suffers; she toadies; she has her short-lived triumphs and her painful humiliations. She is forever out of step with the staid commonplaceness of her surroundings. She is the ugly duckling, the passionate child. She is a true daughter of Richard Mahony with some of Mary's blood in her system.

Lives. By Gustav Eckstein. Illustrated from line drawings by Hokurai. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

In his biography of Noguchi, Dr. Eckstein revealed himself as ■ writer of individual mind and manner. "Lives," which bares the privacies of a family of rats, a macaw, ■ pigeon, three turtles, nine canaries, a gardener, and some cockroaches, gives evidence that in Dr. Eckstein, if he chooses to cultivate this field, America has in reserve a scientific writer far above the measure of ■ William Beebe. "Lives" is continuously delightful for its alert observation, its buoyant wit, its jaunty style.

The Mexican Immigrant—His Life-Story. By Manual Gamio. University of Chicago Press. $3.

Here is one of the important books for those who desire to understand our southern neighbors. It supplements Dr. Gamio's previous scholarly volume, "Mexican Immigration to the United States," with seventy-seven personal narratives of Mexicans who for one reason or other came to the United States, tell why, and what they found here. It is, in short, a series of human documents—the "confession" idea served up with the wisdom of an ethnologist and under the academic imprimatur.

Woodrow Wilson: Life and Letters. By Ray Stannard Baker. Vols. III, IV. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $10.

The third and fourth volumes of Mr. Baker's biography cover the years of Wilson's governorship of New Jersey and his first administration as President down to the opening of the World War. Aside from the abundance of detail with which Mr. Baker, drawing upon the great collection of Wilson's pa-

□ PLAYS □ RADIO □

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN With GLENN ANDERS
DOROTHY STICKNEY, MARGARET WYCHERLY, JOHN BEAL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."
—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

BOOTH THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

The Nation's Radio Hour on Station WEVD

Henry Hazlitt

on

Politics and Crises

Wednesday, August 10, at 8 p. m.

□ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT □

PLAYS TO SEE

Another Language—Booth—45 St., W. of B'way.

Bridal Wise—Cort—W. 48 St.

Of Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.

Show Boat—Casino—7 Ave. at 50 St.

That's Gratitude—Waldorf—50th St. E. of B'way.

The Cat and the Fiddle—Cohan—43 St. & B'way.

pers, illuminates nearly the whole of this period (there is less about the Baltimore convention, the subsequent campaign, and Wilson's controversy with McCombs, his party manager, than was to have been expected), the volumes are particularly important for the light they throw upon Wilson's systematic preparation for political office, his conception of a dominating personal leadership, his unwillingness to be drawn into the Progressive movement, his skilful handling of Bryan, his aloofness from practical politics and lack of concern for campaign machinery, his readiness to talk down to the crowd as the Presidential campaign approached its end, the unfavorable impression which his campaign speeches made upon business men and financiers, the weakness of his first Cabinet, and his amazing declaration regarding American foreign policy. On these, as on other matters, Mr. Baker allows himself a freedom and frankness in criticism which contrasts rather strikingly with the reticence of his previous volumes, and his criticisms are prevailingly just. On the other hand, his depreciation of the influence of Colonel House in the campaign of 1912, while perhaps warranted, suggests at least a touch of bias. The volumes leave Wilson's character and leadership still a problem.

□ OPEN SHELF □

Henry George's Books
Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men—sent free.
None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.
ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
15 Park Place, New York City
SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

EDUCATIONAL

CONVERSATIONAL FRENCH

Spanish - Italian - German

Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

FRENCH Spanish, Italian, German
Russian, Conversational.
Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c. Daily 9-9.
Fisher School of Languages, 1264 Lexington Av. (bet. 83-86 Sts.) Est. 1905. AT-water 9-6075

WANTED

WANTED—100 BLUE BOOK AUTHORS
I am organizing a class of 100 beginners, who will be taught by mail how to win fame and fortune through Little Blue Book authorship. Write for free details.
E. Haldeman-Julius, Desk X 918, Girard, Kan.

POSITION WANTED

ADVERTISING man, 6 years experience newspaper salesman, copy writer, reporter; highest credentials as producer; versatile; married; member Masonic fraternity; university training. Box 732, c/o The Nation.

PERSONAL

THE American Gymnosophical Association offers membership to intellectual men and women of cultivated taste. Our facilities are a private gymnasium and swimming pool in New York City; a lovely 60 acre farm in New Jersey; calisthenics and games under expert teachers. Kindly send 10c postage for further particulars. Address Box 705, c/o The Nation.

"A TROPHY OF BRAINS, aggravated by moron environment." a lady diagnosed herself. Since joining Contacts improvement has been remarkable. Hundreds of interesting, original, debunker correspondents. Debunking literature available. Full details for 3c stamp. Contacts, 211 East 11th St., N. Y. C.

□ FOR RENT □

TO LET, on club property adjacent to a large nudist park, a five-room stone bungalow, equipped with modern plumbing and all electrical appliances, including an electric cooking range. The bungalow is completely and attractively furnished. Tenant or lessee must be qualified for, and desire, membership in the nudist club which owns the large wooded, surrounding estate, distance two and one-half hours by train from New York City. Address Box 731, c/o The Nation.

ENGLAND

LONDON HOUSE—Cheyne Walk, Chelsea; overlooking Thames; garden. Unfurnished. Rent 250 pounds. Information, B. R. Andrews, 525 W. 120th St., New York.

ROOMS—FURNISHED

IN city's most convenient section, one block from Central Park, with Russian family, two unconnected, charming, furnished, rooms. Separate entrance. Housekeeping privileges. $18. and $32. monthly. Rhineland 4-3997. East 86th St.

WANTED—TO BUY

WANTED: To buy, 3 to 5 acres of ground, without buildings. Within 75 miles of N. Y. City, in N. Y. State only. Preferably near lake, river or state road. No agents. Describe location and give lowest price in first letter. Box 733, c/o The Nation.

□ RESORTS □

THE FAYLAND, Hudson, N. Y.

ALL-YEAR TOURISTS' stop-over. Albany Post Road U. S. 9. Four miles south of Hudson. Garage, electricity, baths, radio, farm products. home cooking. Bathing, boating, fishing. Tennis, weekly. B'klyn Tel.: Dewey 9-1059 after 4 p.m.

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE

Pleasant Valley, N. Y. Tel. Pleasant Valley 39
An ideal vacation place. Quiet, restful, Jewish home cooking. Bathing, boating, fishing. Tennis. Cheap fare by Hudson River. $16. per week. Louis Sakow, Prop.

COLONY HOUSE PEEKSKILL, N. Y.

(near Crompond Road) Phone Peekskill 2733
Commuting distance. Vacation and week-end accommodations. Lake bathing. Reasonable rates. Directions: Mohegan Colony bus to premises.

CAMP DOR-CEL for Nature lovers.

Bathing, sports. Food from our own farm. Reduced rates $14 per week. Write Doris Ariewitz, Norwich, Conn., R. D. No. 7, or Phone Kingsbridge 6-9907.

Other Resorts on pages ii and iii

TO THE LANDLORD:

Do you want tenants for your house or apartment?

The NATION has a select reliable group of readers who look to our real estate columns to help them find new living quarters.

We know for we have many letters from advertisers telling us how pleased they are with the results from their advertisements.

Why Not Try These Columns?

Rates: Minimum, 1/2 inch, $3.08

1 inch, $6.16

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

New York City

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 17, 1932

No. 3502

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	133
EDITORIALS:
Economic Ignorance at Ottawa.....	136
The Stimson Doctrine .....	137
Vacations .....	137
TEAR-GAS, BAYONETS, VOTES, AND HOOVER. By Paul Y. Anderson .....	138
OUR CAST-IRON CONSTITUTION. By William Seagle.....	141
A NEW CRISIS IN CHINA. By Long Bow.....	143
THE ARENA. By George S. Kaufman.....	145
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	145
REMEMBER SACCO AND VANZETTI.....	146
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.....	147
BOOKS AND FILMS:
The Inner Temple. By Robert P. Tristram Coffin.....	148
White Housekeeping. By Alfred E. Smith.....	148
On Being Repetitive. By C. Hartley Grattan.....	148
The Importance of Henry James. By Robert Cantwell.....	149
The Truth About Slavery. By Oswald Garrison Villard.....	150
Shorter Notices .....	150
Films: Concerning Dialogue. By Alexander Bakshy.....	151

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

DEVERE ALLEN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN FRED A. KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

LEWIS S. GANNETT H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS ARTHUR WARNER

MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

MURDER AND TERROR are still the order of the day in Germany. The hope of the moderate elements that the period of terrorism would end with the Reichstag election campaign has not been realized. It is true that there has been a decrease in the murder rate; seventy-nine persons were killed on the streets in the first twenty days of July, or approximately four a day, while since the election the killings have dropped to about two a day. But other acts of terrorism are increasing in number. Hundreds of persons have been assaulted on the streets; hand grenades have been thrown into scores of houses, causing considerable property damage; newspaper offices have been raided and wrecked by gangs of hoodlums wearing political party uniforms or emblems. Until now the Von Papen-Von Schleicher regime has refused to take the necessary measures to suppress this gangsterism. It has talked at length about restoring order, but it appears to be afraid of offending the fascists, who are charged by the moderate and Socialist press with being primarily responsible for the continued terrorism. Even Adolf Hitler seems unable to control his followers. Fired by his wild promises, they are now demanding action, are indeed acting upon their own initiative. There can be little doubt that a vast majority of German citizens, traditionally law-abiding, desire peace and order, but it appears almost certain that the political gangsters will drag Germany into civil war with their bloody tactics. At the moment of going to press the militarists are attempting to pacify the Nazis by offering their leaders a few Cabinet posts. This may satisfy Hitler, but will it appease his followers?

BUSINESS HAS BEEN WATCHING the stock market so nervously for many months that the recent sensational recovery there could not fail to attract wide and immediate attention, but it is doubtful whether, even so, the general public realizes the extent of that recovery. Up to August 6 the average price of fifty representative stocks, including railroad and industrial issues, had risen, according to the compilations of the New York Times, 68 per cent in one month. This is probably, in terms of percentages, the greatest advance that has taken place in a similar period in the history of the stock exchange. The advance becomes even more impressive when one considers some prominent individual stocks. Thus United States Steel had risen 101 per cent, General Electric 133 per cent, J. I. Case 198 per cent, International Harvester 184 per cent, Anaconda Copper 216 per cent. Now, as Will Rogers has remarked succinctly, "As dumb as we are we know we can't get prosperous that quick," and this remark is confirmed by the Times's weekly business index, which for the first week of August showed physical volume of business at 53.9 per cent of "normal", the lowest point it has reached so far. Moreover, it must not be forgotten that Mr. Hoover has taken not a single fundamental step that might help to bring about recovery. Our prohibitive tariff remains as high as ever; we remain adamant on war debts. The problems of railroad receivership, of unpayable farm mortgages and other debts, also remain. Nevertheless, the stock market's rise, even though dangerously rapid, cannot be dismissed as of no general importance. At the very least it represents a significant recovery of the financial community's nerves; it both reflects and encourages a recovery in basic commodity prices; the rise in securities in itself protects the solvency of many financial institutions, and increases business confidence.

MR. HOOVER HAS BEEN TAKEN at his word by the directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In signing the new relief bill, one section of which provides a fund of $300,000,000 for loans to the States, the President said that loans would be extended only in cases of "absolute need" and upon "evidence of financial exhaustion." When Illinois asked for an immediate loan of $10,000,000, it was given only $3,000,000 for unemployment relief in Chicago. We do not know how the latter figure was determined, but we do know that Chicago has been compelled to spend that amount every month to feed its hungry. Detroit likewise has been helped with a meager loan. The $1,800,000 it obtained will barely meet the municipality's indebtedness to the grocers for food already distributed. Four Ohio counties have together been granted a loan of $852,662. But when Pennsylvania asked for $10,000,000 it was politely informed that it had not done its "full duty with respect to the furnishing of funds for relief purposes." Why this distinction between Illinois and Pennsylvania? Is there any proof that Illinois is closer to financial exhaustion than Pennsylvania? Certainly we know of none. And why such a niggardly policy in extending financial assistance the need of which is only too tragically apparent? Must delegations from Chicago, Detroit, and other cities run to Washington every month to beg for help? To our mind this miserly policy, which the financial position of our government does not justify, not only defeats the spirit in which Congress voted the $300,000,000 fund, but compels the nearly exhausted cities actually to cut their relief to a starvation basis.

ROBERT P. LAMONT, HAVING RESIGNED his position as Secretary of Commerce, is to become the new president of the American Iron and Steel Institute, succeeding Charles M. Schwab. This is interpreted as meaning that the steel industry as a whole will adopt a more aggressive policy in combating the depression. There can be little doubt that the industry stands in need not only of an aggressive policy but probably also of an entirely new policy. The industry has done very little toward developing new markets for its products. It maintains no research laboratories as does the electrical industry; suggestions and ideas for new uses of steel have come chiefly from the outside. The practice of the steel companies in fixing prices of rails and other products, which they erroneously disguise as a method of "stabilization", is now proving injurious. The automobile companies, which at the moment offer virtually the only market for steel goods, are refusing to buy beyond their immediate needs because they feel that they should be permitted to take advantage of a "buyers' market" in steel, but such a market is denied to them because of the price-fixing practice. Again, the steel industry has long supported the protective tariff system, although lower tariffs would very greatly benefit its home customers and enable the latter to buy more steel. While the industry needs a more aggressive policy, it is not certain that former Secretary Lamont is the man to direct that policy. Indeed, it is reported from Washington that his lack of aggressiveness in administering the affairs of the Department of Commerce was primarily responsible for his resignation.

THE B. E. F. HAS GONE HOME, thanks to President Hoover's tear-gas, Mayor McCloskey's clowning, and the canniness of those "men in high places" who realized that the price of transportation west from Johnstown—soft cushions, free meals, and all—was little enough to pay to get rid of 8,000 homeless, hungry Americans. In the approved American fashion, the responsibility has now been shifted to the cities farther west where the desperate attempt to get rid of the bonus army continues. Whether that succeeds time will soon tell. But the Administration cannot be very happy to hear that Walter W. Waters, self-appointed leader of the veterans, is to stump the country with the story of the events of July 28. "I intend to take the story of 'the battle of Anacostia' to the people. This story is more important than the bonus." Throughout the country, unfortunately, there are all too many McCloskeys, too many demagogues, too many troop commanders with bombs to use, too many, in fact, of the various key performers who have made the B. E. F. incident one of the sorriest occurrences in our history. There are, on the other hand, only too few General Glassfords as is so well set forth by Paul Y. Anderson in his admirable story, elsewhere in this issue of The Nation, of the bonus army's expulsion from Washington. Meanwhile, the incident has set one precedent. For the first time, lobbyists have been driven out of Washington with sabers.

THE STATE MILITIA HAS BEEN CALLED out in Indiana to suppress disturbances or threatened disturbances among the miners. This has happened twice in the last few weeks. On the last occasion Governor Leslie deemed it necessary to declare martial law in a section of the coal country. In Ohio, the militia has been on duty for weeks. Battles between guardsmen and miners are reported with disturbing frequency. Workers have been found murdered along lonely hillside roads. Bridges have been dynamited, railroad tracks torn up, other property damaged or destroyed. In Arkansas the national guard was mobilized when five hundred union coal-diggers attempted to stop non-union operations in the Johnson County mines. More than a dozen men have been killed in Kentucky in the last several months. Mine guards in West Virginia not long ago fired upon a group of union sympathizers, killing a miner and seriously wounding several others. Similar reports have come from other sections. Men are being shot to death almost every day in the coal country as the mine war goes on. And the disorders appear to be increasing in number and in violence. We are told that there has been little unrest, few disturbances among the workers in this period of depression. The mine war offers most tragic evidence of the falsity of this misleading optimism.

DEMANDS FOR GOVERNMENT ECONOMY spring primarily from the fact that the owners of property are having to pay higher taxes. Among the many groups bawling for economy one specializes in attacks on "government in business." Addressing this group recently, Robert R. McCormick, owner of the Chicago Tribune, charged the proponents of government ownership in Congress with "sacking the nation by confiscatory taxation." But persons who think as Colonel McCormick does ignore the fact that government enterprises, when honestly and efficiently operated, tend to reduce, not to increase, our taxes. The town of Iola, Kansas, which has a municipally owned electric light, gas, and water system, has this year been able to reduce its tax rate to the lowest point in seventy-three years. More than two-thirds of the municipality's revenues come from the profits of the city-owned utilities. By next year Iola's indebtedness will be wiped out and the property-owners will have to pay no taxes at all for local purposes. Iola will then have joined other tax-free cities, such as its neighbors Chanute and Colby, both of which likewise have municipally owned utility systems. Let those who are forever denouncing "government in business" as a cause of higher taxes first investigate the facts; the true causes lie elsewhere.

AS WE GO TO PRESS Governor Roosevelt faces one of the great tests of his career: he is about to try personally Mayor Walker with a view to settling whether that agile gentleman shall or shall not remain in office. The Mayor is very brash and is rejoicing that at last he has an opportunity to cross-examine the wicked men who have been persecuting him, as he asserts, solely to make political capital. But he comes to Albany under the handicap of the overwhelming indictment of himself contained in Mr. Seabury's rebuttal of Mayor Walker's answer to his first communication to the Governor—a rebuttal which left Mr. Walker as stripped to the world as any member of a nudist colony. Not in years has there been a finer bit of dialectic destruction. Whether he removes the Mayor or not, the Governor is bound to be criticized; one camp or the other is certain to accuse him of playing politics. On the other hand, if he decides the evidence is sufficient for removal, it is within his power to give the country one of the most salutary lessons as to what constitutes official honesty that could be imagined. Even if the Governor decides that the evidence is not sufficient to warrant his exercising the power of removal, it is still within his right to flay this particular official. There is already some comment on the fact that this hearing is scheduled for the same day as that upon which President Hoover is to give us his speech of acceptance. Without having seen that precious document, we have no hesitation in saying that what is going to happen in Albany is a thousand times more important and is certain to be a thousand fold more interesting and illuminating. We do not flatter ourselves, we are sure, in saying that we are certain that we could write Mr. Hoover's speech of acceptance in advance, about as it will appear, grammatical errors, platitudes, pussy-footing, self-praise, misrepresentation, and all the rest.

WE CONGRATULATE MISSOURI upon Colonel Bennett Clark's capturing the Democratic nomination for the United States Senate in last week's primary—another instance to prove that the primary does give a good man an opportunity to win the approval of his fellow-citizens without licking the boots of a boss. The son of Champ Clark, Colonel Clark showed superb courage throughout his fight. As the St. Louis Post-Dispatch put it, "there is no such word as evasion in this candidate's vocabulary." He came out flatfootedly for the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment and for drastic reduction of the present tariff schedules, which he declares to have been actuated by "indefensible avarice" and to constitute one of the main causes of the depression in which we are living. He went straight into the zinc-mine district of his State, which is insistent upon the tariff on zinc, and then and there he said: "I will not help any living human being to rob the American people merely because he happens to live in Missouri." As for the zinc tariff he declared that it had brought only "bankruptcy for the mine-owner, starvation for the mine worker, and penury for the merchant who depended on their trade." In addition, Colonel Clark advocated the five-day week and disarmament, and opposed the continuance of the Farm Board. An excellent officer in the war, Colonel Clark is a thorough-going peace man. Now that he has passed the first hurdle, we urge upon every Nation reader who lives in Missouri the need of sending this brave and unfettered man to the United States Senate.

AUSTRIA HAS LOST its strongest statesman. Whatever else one may think of Monsignor Ignaz Seipel, who served the new republic as Chancellor from 1922 to 1929, one must concede that his shrewdness, firmness, and foresight time and again saved Austria from chaos and possible extinction in the confused decade that followed the collapse of the former empire. On August 2 Monsignor Seipel died at Pernitz, still a relatively young man—he was only 56—and still a power in politics. When this Roman Catholic priest came to the chancellorship in 1922 there were many who predicted that Austria would not long survive the inflation and economic disruption of that turbulent period.

Seipel, however, went begging in the capitals of Europe, and finally came home with the $135,000,000 loan from the League of Nations. But in turn he had to bind Austria to preserve its economic and political independence, and it was this pledge, given in writing, that blocked the Austro-German customs union which was proposed last year. Ever an ardent nationalist, though in the beginning moderate in politics, Seipel was hated by Socialists, Communists, and extreme nationalists alike. In May, 1923, he was stoned by a nationalist mob on the streets of Vienna, and in the following year he was shot by an unemployed worker. Toward the end he moved far to the right and became an open supporter of the Heimwehr and of the fascist theory of the state. But if we cannot admire his political views, we shall, nevertheless, remember him for the strength and honesty of his character.

THE CELERITY WITH WHICH IL DUCE jumps from one role to another must prove puzzling even to his American admirers. His stand for more drastic disarmament at the Geneva conference came closely upon the heels of a financial stringency which had all but paralyzed some of the Italian banks. Faced with these difficulties the dictator on July 21 called the results at Geneva "vain" and "entirely inadequate when compared to the wishes and hopes of the world." Writing for the Enciclopedia Italiana, however, the ardent peace champion now declares that fascism "rejects pacifism, which implies renunciation of struggle and cravenness in the face of sacrifice. . . . Only war carries all human energies to the height of tension and gives the seal of nobility to peoples that have the courage to confront it."

A NOBLE-SPIRITED SCHOLAR passed from this earth when G. Lowes Dickinson, Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, died on August 3 in London. Were countries sane enough to reward the most unselfish, the wisest, and the most high-minded of their citizens, Lowes Dickinson would long have held one of the highest offices in the gift of Great Britain. An ardent advocate of peace, he had the courage to remain so when war came, not being accustomed to sloughing off his principles and ideals to suit the happenings of the moment, and especially not in obedience to an insensate and brutal patriotism. So he became in 1914 one of the most unpopular men in England, together with Bertrand Russell and Ramsay MacDonald. That unpopularity did not disturb him. He continued to preach the truth as he saw it and the wisdom of his entire course has long since been completely justified by the events since the Armistice, especially his opposition to harsh reparations or retaliatory measures against Germany. One of the first Englishmen to condemn the Versailles Treaty, he had worked from the beginning of the war as the President of the Union for Democratic Control for a peace that would be worthwhile and should make forever impossible the repetition of what he, in one book, called "The European Anarchy" and in another, "The International Anarchy." His book on "War: Its Nature, Cause, and Cure," is one of the best of the volumes in opposition to wholesale murder. More than that, he was a scholar in his own right and no mean historian to boot. Especially at this juncture, the world can little afford to lose an unofficial statesman of the high type of G. Lowes Dickinson.

Economic Ignorance at Ottawa

THOSE who have been wondering lately just what is wrong with the world could hardly find a more instructive answer than that supplied by the daily reports of the discussions of the Imperial Conference at Ottawa. There is not a single statesman at that conference who talks as if he had ever in his life opened even one elementary economic textbook. So far as Ottawa is concerned, not only contemporary liberal economists, but all the classical economists from Adam Smith's day, have written in vain. Behind the statement of every premier lies the crude mercantilism rampant before the eighteenth century. There seems to be hardly a popular fallacy regarding foreign trade which the statesmen at Ottawa do not warmly embrace.

Whatever may have been the defects of the classical economists in other fields, the soundness of their fundamental analysis of the real gains possible through foreign trade remains beyond dispute. Their conclusion, as summed up by John Stuart Mill, was that "the only direct advantage of foreign commerce consists in the imports. A country obtains things which it either could not have produced at all, or which it must have produced at a greater expense of capital and labor than the cost of the things which it exports to pay for them. . . . The vulgar theory disregards this benefit, and deems the advantage of commerce to reside in the exports: as if not what a country obtains, but what it parts with, by its foreign trade, was supposed to constitute the gain to it."

The statesmen at Ottawa have been talking, without intermission, precisely the language so properly derided by Mill. Mr. Baldwin, speaking for Great Britain, presents a table of exports and imports with the dominions, and as these show an excess of imports over exports, remarks, more in sorrow than in anger, "From these tables it will be seen that the visible trade balance in favor of the dominions is nearly £100,000,000." "The tables," he adds, "show that the United Kingdom has been doing her share in encouraging the trade and industry of the dominions; that she takes a very large proportion of dominion exports, for many of which there would seem to be no other outlet available in the world." Whereupon Mr. Havenga, speaking for South Africa, retorts that Mr. Baldwin's figures are certainly misleading as applied to his own country, because the Baldwin figures of British imports from South Africa include re-exports and gold. It is true that the gold that South Africa sends to Great Britain comes from South Africa's own mines; still, Mr. Havenga doesn't think they should be included. "As far as the Union is concerned," he replies, "the position is that South Africa in 1930 bought from Britain more than £29,000,000 worth of commodities which enter into competitive trade, while Britain bought from South Africa less than £12,000,000 worth of such goods, and this favorable position of Britain in the competitive trade of South Africa is the normal position." And all the other dominion governments put forward similar arguments.

Consider the implications of this. Each delegation to the conference talks as if the goods its country buys from the other countries represented in the conference were bought, not because that country needed them, or could not get along without them, or could get them only at a higher price elsewhere, but as if it bought the goods simply as a favor to the selling countries. To buy goods from another country is considered to be not only a friendly but a generous act. To permit oneself to be sold goods from another country is to tolerate, it would seem, almost a hostile act. In brief, when each delegation thinks of the advantages of foreign trade to its own country, it thinks always of the selling class; it thinks of the profits of its business men, not of the savings of its consumers. The reason for this is only partly that producers are better organized and better able to bring various forms of persuasion and pressure on statesmen than consumers are. The whole tendency of statesmen, who in this respect merely share popular prejudices, is to think of social wealth almost solely in terms of money, so that the profits of manufacturers as such seem real, while the real welfare of consumers seems too intangible for serious consideration. It was with this in mind that William Graham Sumner spoke of the consumer long ago as "the forgotten man." It is to be regretted that Governor Roosevelt, though he has appropriated the phrase, has not really understood it.

But even if we confine ourselves to the interests of sellers, what are we to say of the Ottawa discussions? In the negotiations between England and Canada, both talk of granting each other tariff "preferences". The effect of such preferences must depend, of course, upon what is meant by the word. If it means merely lower tariffs within the empire, then it must be welcomed as a very important step in the right direction. But if preference is to be achieved rather by higher tariffs to the outside world—which seems at present more probable—then it can only make the present plight of the world still more desperate. The Canadian representatives talk blandly of switching $100,000,000 more of their yearly purchases to England, deflecting $50,000,000 of them from the United States. Here again the attitude is that imports, like kisses, go by favor—that buying is a matter of whim, that the same goods can be bought as cheaply and conveniently in England as in the United States. And no Canadian statesman has pointed out so far that if Canada buys $50,000,000 less goods a year from the United States, the United States must, in the long run, buy $50,000,000 less from Canada. Would there be an immediate market in England for these lost exports? Or would Canada, which depends comparatively so much more than we do on foreign trade be distorting and disorganizing that trade at the very time that it can least afford to do so?

In deploring the stupidly medieval economic notions that prevail at Ottawa, we do not mean to imply that we consider them any worse or essentially any different than those held by our own Administration. The recent Ottawa discussions merely throw a brilliant light on the short-sighted national selfishness and on the practically universal lack of understanding of the simplest economic principles that prevails among the world's statesmen. They tell us too plainly, not only why those statesmen have been unable to stop the progress of the greatest economic crisis in a century, but have done so much to prolong and intensify it.

The Stimson Doctrine

WHETHER or not the new Stimson peace policy actually prevents war between Bolivia and Paraguay, and there is every reason to believe that it will, it must be considered an important addition to the peace machinery of the world. Nineteen members of the Pan-American Union have jointly informed these two South American countries that "they will not recognize any territorial arrangement of this controversy which has not been obtained by peaceful means, nor the validity of territorial acquisitions which may be obtained through occupation or conquest by force of arms." This is the same doctrine which Secretary Stimson laid down last January with respect to Japanese aggression in Manchuria. At the present writing it is not certain that both parties to the Gran Chaco dispute will heed the warning of the Pan-American Union. Paraguay has unconditionally accepted the conditions set forth, but Bolivia, to whom possession of the Gran Chaco territory means free access to the sea, something for which that country has been fighting ever since the War of the Pacific deprived it of its only maritime provinces half a century ago, has so far withheld its acceptance. It is to be doubted that Bolivia can long oppose the united will of its neighbors.

Obviously the Stimson doctrine, to be effective, must have the support of all the countries directly or indirectly concerned in a given controversy. In Manchuria this support is lacking. Japan, of course, is openly opposed to the application of this new doctrine there. But of much greater significance is the attitude of Great Britain, France, Russia, and other Powers interested politically or financially in the Far East. They have not formally rejected the Stimson doctrine, but neither have they accepted it. If they refuse to join with the United States in withholding recognition of Japanese gains in Manchuria achieved by means of the recent hostile invasion, the new policy can have no meaning in that area. With respect to the Gran Chaco controversy, on the other hand, all the countries concerned, except Bolivia, have announced their adhesion to the new policy.

There is some question as to what effect the Stimson doctrine as embraced by the Pan-American Union will have on the Latin American policy of the United States. In his note of January 7 to Japan and China, Secretary Stimson spoke of treaty rights as well as territorial changes. The Union's note of August 3 speaks only of "territorial acquisitions." We have presumably come to the end of our period of territorial expansion. In the immediate past the United States has used military force to achieve other ends, to impose its will in financial and similar matters upon reluctant Caribbean and Central American countries. The policy enunciated in the joint note of August 3 will not serve to check such intervention. Under the terms of that note the United States is still free to send marines into a Latin American country, ostensibly to "protect American lives and property," but actually to collect debts or to acquire new treaty rights. Happily, in the last few years there has been a decided trend away from this policy of intervention. None the less, if the Stimson doctrine prevents war between two South American countries, it must be regarded as a valuable step forward.

Vacations

RECENTLY the Manchester Guardian held a contest for its readers on the subject, "Why I shall return to Shrimpton this year"—Shrimpton being the symbolic name of the spot to which vacationists return year after year. The burden of the answers was unmistakable. In Shrimpton the vacationer was somebody. The postmaster remembered him; the villagers doffed their hats. For a brief time, at least, he was filled with a sense of importance.

And whether he goes to Shrimpton or the Tyrol, the man on vacation likes best to select some place and form of recreation that will put him in a romantic or important light. Given the chance, he will try to approximate that ideal of existence which every busy human being carries about with him from Monday to Saturday, from nine to five, fifty weeks of the year.

Would the slave of an industrial civilization be a gentleman farmer? He arranges, for his vacation, a setting of meadows and stone fences where day by day at so much a week he may survey his acres, observe the intimate unfolding of a rose, watch the hay-cutters at their fragrant task, and pretend that the over friendly pup that follows him around is that one-man dog that every man secretly believes is waiting for him somewhere in the world.

Or has he always fancied himself as a soldier of fortune, of whom it might be said that the world is his home? He boards a steamer, he goes to as far a place as he can get back from by a certain all-too-certain Monday morning. And though the route and all the reservations may have been made in advance, Thomas Cook himself could not deprive him of the illusion of being a vagabond—he sips his aperitif in that late golden sunshine that seems perennially to linger about sidewalk cafes with all the nonchalance of habit and a miraculous forgetfulness of the filing cases and typewriters that are in reality only six or seven ocean days behind him.

The precious days slip by. The gentleman farmer watches his crops. The carefree world traveler sips his aperitif. The man who would really like to spend his life in the solitude of mountains catches his fish in the lonely stream. In the heart of each a poignant regret grows more poignant as the vacation end approaches. More poignant and at the same time somehow more pleasant. Toward the end, in fact, though not one of them would admit it, the life of a gentleman farmer in winter comes to seem a little bleak; the world traveler wonders if, after all, homeless world travelers are really happy. As for the mountain fisherman, the fish are not biting so briskly as at first and he begins—secretly—to tire a little of both canned soup and solitude.

And so it is that on those certain Monday mornings most vacationists return—not solely for economic reasons, and more willingly than they would care to admit. The truth is that most human beings are too timid to climb down from their whirling merry-go-round unless they feel sure of getting back to it safely in a few weeks' time. Or would it be more charitable to say that perhaps they know, with an inherent wisdom, that one man's adventure is another man's rut?

Tear-Gas, Bayonets, and Votes

The President Opens His Reelection Campaign

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, August 6

HOOPER'S campaign for reelection was launched Thursday, July 28, at Pennsylvania Avenue and Third Street, with four troops of cavalry, four companies of infantry, a mounted machine-gun squadron, six whippet tanks, 300 city policemen and a squad of Secret Service men and Treasury agents. Among the results immediately achieved were the following:

Two veterans of the World War shot to death; one eleven-weeks-old baby in a grave condition from gas, shock, and exposure; one eight-year-old boy partially blinded by gas; two policemen's skulls fractured; one bystander shot through the shoulder; one veteran's ear severed with a cavalry saber; one veteran stabbed in the hip with a bayonet; more than a dozen veterans, policemen, and soldiers injured by bricks and clubs; upward of 1,000 men, women, and children gassed, including policemen, reporters, ambulance drivers, and residents of Washington; and approximately $10,000 worth of property destroyed by fire, including clothing, food, and temporary shelters of the veterans and a large amount of building material owned by a government contractor.

The political results are less impressive. Indeed, among high officials of the Administration there is fast-growing apprehension that the great exploit was planned and executed with more daring than judgment, and that, as a campaign effort, it may prove to be one of the deadliest boomerangs in political history. That fear already has found expression in two public statements by the gallant Secretary of War, Pat Hurley, seeking to justify the employment of gas bombs, tanks, sabers, bayonets, and fire against unarmed men, women, and children. One of them, as I shall presently show, is such a tissue of known and demonstrable falsehoods that utter panic must have prompted it.

The circumstances surrounding the use of troops and modern implements of war to evict these people from their miserable hovels and to drive them from the capital force me to the reluctant conclusion that the whole affair was deliberately conceived and carried out for a political purpose—namely, to persuade the American people that their government was threatened with actual overthrow, and that the courage and decisiveness of Herbert Hoover had averted revolution. It is no secret that Mr. Hoover and his advisers hope to make "Hoover versus radicalism" the leading issue of the campaign. The presence of the unemployed veterans and their families in the capital presented an opportunity to show the country that the danger of "insurrection" was real and that the Administration had prepared to meet it. To accomplish this object it was necessary to provoke actual conflict, and that is what the Administration proceeded to do. A simple review of the salient facts would seem to make this apparent.

For several weeks the men and their families had been encamped in Washington, some occupying abandoned and partially wrecked buildings and shacks on downtown plots owned by the government, but a large majority existing in crude shelters erected by themselves on a large government-owned field on the opposite bank of the Anacostia River. Excepting a small unit of Communists, which the main body promptly outlawed, the behavior of the men was characterized by extraordinary discipline and restraint. To one who visited their camps many times and talked to scores of them, any suggestion that they constituted a threat against the government is preposterous. Even the Communist gestures were confined mainly to two futile attempts to parade before the White House, which got them nothing but broken heads, jail sentences, and fines. The attitude of the great majority was one of good-humored and patient fortitude under incredibly primitive conditions of existence. In a thousand ways they exhibited the instinct to make comedy out of their own vicissitudes—an instinct as characteristic now as it was in France. The so-called "bonus army" in actuality was an army of unemployed men who believed they had a special claim on the government and came here asking the government to give them relief unless it was ready to provide work. Bonus or no bonus, they would not have come if they had had jobs. Any assertion to the contrary is ridiculous.

Save for the feeble gestures of the isolated Communist group there was no trouble until that fatal Thursday, due in part to the remarkable tact and common sense of General Glassford, the chief of police, in part to the discipline enforced by the leaders of the camps, and in part to the essentially law-abiding instincts of the men themselves. The worthy Hurley mouths indignant phrases about "panhandling" and "forced tribute from citizens," but in all my visits to the camps I was never asked for anything more valuable than a cigarette—and I am a fairly prosperous looking citizen. As soon as Congress adjourned there was a steady exodus of the campers, as attested by the daily statements of the Veterans' Bureau, dutifully reported by the Associated Press and Administration newspapers. Responsible officials repeatedly declared it was only a matter of days until all would be gone.

But suddenly someone high in authority decided the government must have immediate possession of the partially razed block bounded by Third and Fourth Streets and Pennsylvania and Missouri Avenues, where about 1,500 were existing in abandoned buildings and makeshift huts. Most of these people were from Texas, California, the Carolinas, Nebraska, West Virginia, and Florida, which are not exactly hotbeds of "radicalism." Instructions went from the Treasury to the District commissioners to have the police evict the squatters. On two occasions Glassford convinced the commissioners that the police had no authority to conduct such evictions, and pointed out that the procedure for eviction is definitely prescribed by law. On Wednesday there was a conference at the White House attended by Hurley, Attorney-General Mitchell, and General Douglas MacArthur, chief of staff of the army. On Thursday morning Glassford was informed that Treasury agents would begin evacuation of a part of the block, and that if anyone resisted eviction he was to be arrested for disorderly conduct. This meant that the actual eviction would be done by the police, and so it worked out. Someone had devised a technicality for getting around the law. Glassford's protests were unavailing. It was obvious that irresistible pressure had been applied to the commissioners.

One building was emptied with little difficulty of all but one occupant—a legless veteran whom Glassford permitted to remain until the Veterans' Bureau could take care of him. An hour later, at noon, three men, one carrying a large American flag, started a march across the block, followed by several hundred. When the leaders encountered a policeman he grabbed the flag. There was a scuffle, and one of the marchers was hit on the head with a nightstick. He wrested it from the officer and struck back. Other policemen rushed toward the spot, and there was a shower of bricks from the marchers in the rear. I was standing about forty feet away, and it looked like an ugly mess, but the cops kept their heads and no shots were fired. Glassford dashed into the heart of the melee, smiled when a brickbat hit him in the chest, and stopped the fighting in a few seconds. Within two minutes the veterans were cheering him lustily. Two policemen had been badly hurt by thrown bricks, and several veterans were bleeding from the clubbing they had received and from accidental hits from within their own ranks.

The trouble was resumed with more serious consequences two hours later when a policeman attempted to bar several veterans from a building which, in fact, had not been prohibited to them. They rushed him and he shot. A fellow officer coming to his assistance was hit with a missile and likewise opened fire. Still others joined in. Glassford, on the second floor of the same building, commanded his men to stop shooting, and the policeman who had fired the first shot and who apparently was hysterical, whirled and aimed his revolver at the chief. In this encounter two veterans were fatally wounded, another received a flesh wound, and a bystander got a policeman's bullet in the shoulder.

It was soon afterward that Glassford made an illuminating statement to reporters. He said: "The trouble began when I was compelled to enforce an order which I considered unnecessary. In a few more hours this area could have been evacuated peacefully."

The truth of this statement seemed evident. The men had been advised by their leaders to move, better quarters had been promised, and plainly they were ready to follow Glassford's counsel. The trouble was that someone in authority had determined to force the issue. Two District commissioners reported to President Hoover that the civil authorities were "unable to maintain order," and within a few minutes infantry, cavalry, machine-gunners, and tanks were on their way from Fort Myer and Fort Washington—although they were delayed an hour in the rear of the White House while an orderly dashed back to Fort Myer for the tunic, service stripes, and English whipcord breeches of General MacArthur, the valiant chief of staff having steeled himself to lead the offensive in person. Again we have a significant disclosure from General Glassford, the one official whose judgment, courage, and knowledge of conditions had been conspicuous.

He did not tell the commissioners that the police were unable to handle the situation—on the contrary, he told them the police could handle it "unless the field of operations was to be expanded"; he did not ask for troops, was not consulted about calling them out, was not informed they were coming, and was not consulted by their officers when they arrived. In short, the whole affair had been taken out of his hands by someone higher in authority, someone resolved on an actual clash between the regular army and the encamped veterans. The publication of the orders disclosed that this "someone" was Herbert Hoover. Before me is a statement by Secretary Hurley which contains the following words:

No one was injured after the coming of the troops. No property was destroyed after the coming of the troops except that which was destroyed by the marchers themselves. The duty of restoring law and order was performed with directness, with effectiveness, and with unparalleled humanity and kindness.

Let us see. When the troops arrived they actually were cheered by the veterans on the south sidewalk of Pennsylvania Avenue. A cavalry officer spurred up to the curb and shouted: "Get the hell out of here." Infantrymen with fixed bayonets and trench helmets deployed along the south curb, forcing the veterans back into the contested block. Cavalry deployed along the north side, riding their horses up on the sidewalk and compelling policemen, reporters, and photographers to climb on automobiles to escape being trampled. A crowd of three or four thousand spectators had congregated in the vacant lot on the north side of the avenue. A command was given and the cavalry charged the crowd with drawn sabers. Men, women, and children fled shrieking across the broken ground, falling into excavations as they strove to avoid the rearing hoofs and saber points. Meantime, the infantry on the south side had adjusted gas masks and were hurling tear bombs into the block into which they had just driven the veterans. Secretary Hurley states that "the building occupied by the women and children was protected, and no one was permitted to molest them."

What he means by "the building" I do not know, because scores of shanties and tents in the block were occupied by women and children. I know that I saw dozens of women grab their children and stagger out of the area with streaming, blinded eyes while the bombs fizzed and popped all around them. I saw a woman stand on the Missouri Avenue side and plead with a non-commissioned officer to let her rescue a suitcase which, she told him, contained all the spare clothing of herself and her child, and I heard him reply: "Get out of here, lady, before you get hurt," as he calmly set fire to her shanty.

"No one was injured after the coming of the troops," declares the veracious Mr. Hurley. I saw one of his own blood-splashed cavalymen put into an ambulance, apparently unconscious, as several of his comrades pursued a fugitive into a filling station, trampling a woman in their charge. Simultaneously an ear was shorn from the head of a Tennessee veteran by a cavalry saber. As a matter of fact, there was hardly a minute when an ambulance did not dash in and dash off with a victim. I was in that hapless mass of policemen, reporters, and spectators at Third and C Streets a few minutes later when an order was given from a staff officer's car, and a company of infantry came up on the double quick, tossing gas bombs right and left. Some exploded on the sidewalk. Some fell in front yards jammed with Negro women and children. One appeared to land on the front porch of a residence. Two small girls fell to the sidewalk, choking and screaming. But the veterans were beyond the street intersection, more than fifty yards away, held at bay by the cavalry. This gas was intended for spectators—and they were fated to get many another dose intended for them before the night was over, although the police suffered even more—they had no masks. Meantime the legless veteran had come hobbling out of that inferno of gas between Third and Fourth Streets and Pennsylvania and Missouri Avenues. His eyes were almost closed. He had been lying on his bunk when the first bomb landed in the building. He had taken off his artificial feet because his stumps were chafed from too much walking, and it took time to strap them on. He was the last to emerge. From his personal belongings he had rescued only his blanket and a copy of his poem. But “no one was injured” and “no property was destroyed,” according to the gallant soldier-oil magnate of Tulsa!

According to Messrs. Hoover and Hurley, it was necessary to evacuate this block in order to “give way to new buildings to be built under the construction program authorized by Congress. This new construction was designed to give employment to the unemployed of Washington and vicinity.” As a matter of fact, inquiry at the Treasury discloses that the plans call for no buildings on this block. It will be used for a park and parkway. Its part in relieving unemployment consists in this: that forty Negro laborers and a crane will be used in razing the remaining buildings. Moreover, it develops that an undertaker, whose place of business still stands on the site, has appealed from the judgment in a condemnation suit, and the labor of leveling the block may not be completed for weeks.

Secretary Hurley defiantly announced that “statements made to the effect that the billets of the marchers were fired by troops is a falsehood.” On the day when he first made this declaration it appeared in dozens of newspapers which also published a graphic Underwood and Underwood photograph of an infantryman applying a torch to a veteran’s shanty. I am only one of numerous reporters who stood by while the soldiers set fire to many such shelters. In the official apologia, the Secretary asserts that “the shacks and tents at Anacostia were set on fire by the bonus marchers before the troops crossed the Anacostia Bridge.” I was there when the troops crossed. They celebrated their arrival at the Anacostia terminus of the bridge by tossing gas bombs into a throng of spectators who booed and refused to “get back” as soon as ordered. About fifteen minutes after their arrival in the camp the troops set fire to two improvised barracks. These were the first fires. Prior to this General MacArthur had summoned all available reporters and told them that “operations are completely suspended,” that “our objective has been accomplished,” that “the camp is virtually abandoned,” and that it would “not be burned.” Soon after making that statement he departed for the White House. When the two barracks ignited by the soldiers had been burning fiercely for at least thirty minutes, the veterans began firing their own shelters as they abandoned them.

On the high embankment which bounds the plain opposite the Anacostia River, thousands of veterans had gathered, and with them mingled thousands of Anacostia residents, all intent on the lurid spectacle below. Promptly at midnight (General MacArthur had gone to the White House more than an hour earlier) a long and shadowy line of infantry and cavalry advanced across the fiery plain toward the embankment. Sabers and bayonets gleamed in the red light cast by the flames. Virtually everyone had deserted the camp; it seemed incredible that the offensive would be pushed still further. It seemed so to the veterans and the residents of Anacostia—but an officer had told me earlier in the evening that the strategy was to drive all the campers “into the open country of Maryland.” Presently, that familiar fizzing and popping broke out along the face of the ridge, and there was a rush of veterans and spectators toward the streets of Anacostia. Near the top of the incline is a house occupied by a lone woman. In this house a veteran had rented a room for himself and his wife. It was not that he was too much of a mollicoddle to share the ruder comforts of the camp below—it was simply that his wife expected to become a mother within a month. As the advancing line of bayonets ascended the slope and reached the yard where the landlady and her boarder were standing (the wife continued to sit in a wicker chair), the woman of the house screamed that this was “private property” and that she would appeal to the police for protection.

“To hell with the police. They ain’t got nothing to do with this business,” the sergeant replied. “Get these people out of here.” The woman insisted (I was standing in the weeds fifteen feet above), and the sergeant finally consented to allow the veteran’s wife to remain, but her husband had to move on with the rest of the throng, which appeared to consist of about one-third veterans and two-thirds residents of Anacostia. It had retreated about fifty feet before the advancing bayonets when several gas bombs were tossed backward into the yard. The expectant mother and her hostess fled indoors.

For many blocks along the embankment similar scenes were being enacted. With “unparalleled humanity and kindness,” the troops tossed scores of gas bombs into the vast crowds lining the hillside, driving them back to the main thoroughfare of Anacostia. Automobilists, unable either to turn or back up, abandoned their vehicles and ran from the stinging fumes and menacing bayonets. Within five yards of the main business corner a veteran carrying an American flag failed to move rapidly enough, and I saw a gleaming blade sink into his hip. Moaning, he staggered toward a drug store, still clutching his flag.

Chief Glassford, who was in the best position to know, has said that it was “unnecessary.” But, although a brilliant soldier and an even more brilliant policeman, he is not a politician. The politicians had decided it was necessary. It was necessary to dramatize the issue of “Hoover versus radicalism.” One hitch has developed. The President has asserted that less than half of the campers were men who had actually served under the flag, and Hurley assures us that the disorders were led by “reds” and “agitators.” How unfortunate, then, that those killed were bona fide veterans of the World War, entitled to honorable burial in Arlington! But how much more tragic it is that, in a crisis like this, the United States Government should be under the control of such a trio of adventurers as Hoover, Hurley, and Mills!

Our Cast-Iron Constitution

By WILLIAM SEAGLE

IN the present atmosphere of depression a great many criticisms of fundamental economic or political institutions are being made. Programs are offered from all sides; we must do this or that to prevent disaster, proclaim the eager prophets who hasten forward with their schemes of reform. Economically, the magic phrase "a planned society" is heard. We must have old-age pensions, we must have compulsory unemployment insurance, we must be able to fix prices and control the processes of production and consumption. Politically, we must abolish lame-duck sessions of Congress, inaugurate proportional representation in national elections, secure responsible cabinet government. The vast social and economic changes which have been introduced by twentieth-century industrialism dictate a new society. Individualism must give way to socialization. Social life must cease to be anachronistic, the old machinery must be scrapped.

Thus the argument runs. Since social change is necessarily a slow and painful process, it may be taken for granted that great obstacles will have to be overcome before any program of social reform is realized. But there is one additional factor which must be taken into account in America in the formulation of any program which is to have a completely realistic basis. It is that almost all changes that are currently proposed probably cannot be accomplished under existing constitutional limitations. Either they are so obviously unconstitutional that no responsible Congress could so much as consider them, or their constitutionality is open to so much doubt that the Supreme Court would certainly invalidate them in passing them under review. Here, indeed, is a dilemma, but there is no sign that it is receiving very much attention. In fact, there has never been so complete a divorce between economics and political science. One would hardly suppose from reading such popular critics of our economic system as Stuart Chase, James Truslow Adams, or George Soule that there is such a document as the Constitution.

The reply has always been made to those who have expressed general dissatisfaction with existing American institutions, that the Constitution itself provides a remedy. It can always be amended. It is true that the way of amendment is the only safe way to secure permanent fundamental changes but, alas, the apparent way out is a very illusory one. Indeed, it smacks of the Bourbonism which counsels the people to eat cake. It so happens that the Constitution of the United States is like unto the law of the Medes and the Persians of which it was said "it altereth not." Even in the writings of such conservative constitutional commentators as Charles Warren and Robert Luce are to be found intimations that in this kaleidoscopic twentieth century the process available for amending the American fundamental law is not flexible enough. From the point of view of its adaptability, Bryce classified the American Constitution as "rigid." Nineteen amendments have been appended to it, but, as is well-known, ten of these have been adopted at one time in pursuance of an agreement made before its ratification, and three have been secured only as the result of civil war. If the Constitution has been able to function at all, it is because so many changes have been wrought in it by a process of "interpretation." It is true that this interstitial modification of the Constitution which has resulted in its partial adaptation to the needs of the nation in the past is still available, but it is far too slow for the rapid pace of our own times.

It is hardly necessary to dwell upon the defects of the present methods of amending the Constitution which are provided for in Article V. The only method that has proved at all workable is that of Congressional proposal of amendments with ratification by the State legislatures. Special State ratifying conventions have never been used. The attempts of some States to provide for ratification of amendments by popular referendum were held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. But it is to be doubted whether popular participation of this character in the amending process could lead to very much. Forty-eight popular referendums, or forty-eight specially elected conventions assembled in forty-eight separate States, represent an unbelievably cumbersome procedure. The fathers after all were thinking only of thirteen States. It is true that the trouble would be worth-while if very much could be accomplished by single amendments, but only piecemeal changes could be wrought in the Constitution in this way. After much travail only a mouse could be born. A single amendment could necessarily effect only a single change, and it may seriously be doubted whether any genuine social reorientation could now be realized in this manner. Even if it be assumed that a whole new constitution could be submitted by Congress in the form of a single amendment, that obviously would be no way to adopt a new scheme of government. It would simply be a case of taking or leaving what was offered. A constitution must be the result of a process of proposal and counter-proposal, of bargain and compromise.

The only method known to political science which is suited to a thoroughgoing constitutional revision is the general constitutional convention, but under the present Article V it is next to impossible to assemble one. To secure independent but simultaneous action on the part of the necessary two-thirds of the States is an almost insuperable task. The fact is that more than thirty-two States, or the necessary two-thirds, have at various times since 1899 petitioned Congress, as required, to call a constitutional convention, but too many constitutional riddles have been involved for Congress to feel impelled to act. How long do the State petitions to Congress for a constitutional convention remain good? Must all the petitions request the same amendment? Must a petition request a specific amendment, or may it request a constitutional convention for general revision? Can Congress forestall a constitutional convention by submitting the desired changes to the State legislatures? These questions have remained entirely academic because there is no judicial way of settling them. In fact, however, they are not very often asked, because the very idea of a constitutional convention makes everybody nervous. The last one this country had in 1789 is too intimately associated with a period of revolution. No court can control a constitutional convention which, representing the people in their sovereign capacity, is supreme. It is recalled, moreover, that as a matter of fact the Convention of 1789 disregarded the Articles of Confederation, so that the present Constitution may be said to have been illegally adopted. State constitutional conventions which work under the implied threat of the federal military power may be one thing—in fact, many have been held, according to one estimate, once in every thirty-three years; but a federal constitutional convention would be quite another. In a very interesting book, "A New Constitution for a New America," published a decade ago in another period of depression, William MacDonald urged the calling of a general constitutional convention to adapt the fundamental law to new needs, but unfortunately under the present provisions of Article V it is next to impossible to assemble such a body.

The conservatism of the fathers has been amply demonstrated in recent years by such scholars as J. Allen Smith and Charles A. Beard. This conservatism undoubtedly manifested itself in their rejection of the principle of majority decision in the amendment of the Constitution. But it is equally true that they were no less ridden by the bugaboo of State rights. They made the amending process particularly rigid to make it difficult for a small group of States to disturb the status quo. As the result of this jealousy of the States, it has been made possible for thirteen States whose population is in the neighborhood of only 5,000,000 (less than that of the City of New York) to prevent a constitutional amendment which may be desired by all the other States whose population exceeds 100,000,000.

Communists and other malcontents have immemorially been treated to the commonplace that in America the adaptation of our institutions to new needs is always possible through orderly constitutional change. But constitutionally these needs are really incapable of adequate satisfaction. Is the Constitution born of revolution to be superseded only by revolution? The probability of its recurrence is not lessened but increased by the likelihood of its being only a "bourgeois" revolution. Among communists such a revolution is spoken of with ridicule and contempt. It is supposed to be the lowest of all possible types of revolution. All the objectives which it can possibly accomplish are held to have been attained in 1789. Such a belief, however, can hardly be justified by even elementary school history. The work of 1789 was not done, alas, in the spirit of '76. The United States is the one country already supposed to have democratic institutions which could actually profit immensely from a bourgeois revolution, so anachronistic are its political institutions.

The likelihood of any form of revolution depends, of course, upon a whole complex of social and economic forces. But as far as political science is concerned, the only way such a result can be prevented is to deal in time with the amending process of the American Constitution. Many amendments have been offered in recent years, but none of them is as important as the alteration of the amending process itself. It may be regarded as the last counsel of peaceful change. It is, indeed, the amendment of amendments.

The amendment of the amending process itself would pass all problems into social solution. It could enlist the most general support because it would in itself be a definite commitment upon no issue except the desirability of social change. But there is at least one problem, that of prohibition, which may not be solved adequately until the present Article V is itself revised. Repeal still has many obstacles in its way. But prohibition might be sacrificed in a general trade of social purposes. The citizen who is a dry may still want some form of farm relief so badly that he may perforce reconcile himself to the possibility that some of his fellow-citizens may be allowed to drink. Hard bargains may be driven under the spur of economic necessity. But prohibition would no more be directly involved than lame-duck sessions or compulsory unemployment insurance or fixing prices.

While the revision of Article V would constitute only a preliminary step to the adaptation of American institutions, it would in itself result in one immeasurably important political reform. A new and more flexible amending process would change the whole character of American constitutionalism. The power of judicial review has too often placed great obstacles in the path of American social progress. The Supreme Court of the United States has acted as a third and decisive legislative body which has constituted the bulwark of conservative interests. Yet there is nothing inherently evil in the power of judicial review itself. Even under a due-process clause of wide application, the power of judicial review could not result in judicial usurpations of legislative authority if the effects of unwelcome judicial decisions could be removed by a constitutional amendment, adopted under an easily workable amending process. Only once has this been possible in American history under the present amending process, when the Sixteenth Amendment was adopted after the income-tax decision. In no other instance has the issue been focused with sufficient sharpness, or been of sufficiently immediate catastrophic importance to arouse public opinion to the point where the almost insurmountable obstacles of the present amending process could be overcome. For the rest, popular rights have rather been gradually and interstitially undermined by a series of decisions whose tendencies could not be arrested by amendments of general import. But under a modernized amending process, the power of judicial review might even be retained. In a federalism such as ours judicial review serves a legitimate purpose of controlling state divergencies from national regulations; where capable of control, it would even be welcome as a temporary check upon possible excesses of legislation. A power of judicial review acting as a brake would be a totally different mechanism from one acting as a throttle.

No definite scheme of a new amending process need here be offered. Once its necessity is realized, it will take appropriate shape. As to its exact form, there will naturally be differences of opinion. But in general it may be said that a good amending process should combine a relatively easy method of inaugurating individual changes with a slightly more difficult method of general revision. The extent to which the power of initiating amendments is to be divided between the nation and the States will always doubtless prove a troublesome problem. Two principles, however, may be ventured as vital in all phases of the amending process: A majority should be sufficient to secure either the initiation or final approval of any changes; in both phases, also, popular participation through the referendum should at least always be possible. The need for stability needs to be reconciled with the no less legitimate need for change. Even a slight relaxation of the present provisions of Article V would be a vast improvement.

A New Crisis in China

By LONG BOW

THE Kuomintang has dominated China since 1926. During these past six years the Chinese people have been promised, time and again, internal peace, termination of imperialist oppression, and economic reconstruction under the leadership of the party. Instead, there has been, since the establishment of the present national government at Nanking, a succession of civil wars, foreign invasions, mutinies and revolts, floods and famine. The burden of taxation has not been lessened, while misery and poverty among the masses have increased in intensity. The forces of discontent are constantly gaining strength and are gravitating around the Communist stronghold in the southwest.

Five years ago the voice of Kuomintang was eagerly heard and enthusiastically echoed throughout the country; its denunciations struck terror to the hearts of warring militarists; its proclamations envisaged the coming of a new day; its leaders, outspoken and heralded by the masses, appeared as apostles of a new faith; it was looked upon as the national fountain-head of regenerating power and influence. Today, the voice of the Kuomintang is feeble; its pronouncements lack the force of conviction; its headquarters are closely guarded for fear of attack; and its leaders are timid and confused.

Bearing in mind that the ruling elements of a nation are hardly better than the ruled and that politics and government administration best reflect the character and qualities of a self-governing people, it will not be difficult to appreciate the task confronting any group of men attempting to revolutionize China. The bulk of the people of China are paternalistic in their thinking and individualistic in their behavior. Everybody is his own government and master. They are stubborn and hard to convince; they are eccentric and cannot be tamely led. The life of China, irrespective of classes, consists of a myriad of small and unconnected circles within a big circle. The Chinese live, toil, and breed incessantly. When hard times come, as at present, they war on their neighbors instead of against ignorance and poverty.

The Kuomintang was originally a loose association of revolutionary conspirators. Actuated by sheer patriotism and possessed of creative imagination, the early leaders claimed the right to direct the destiny of the people through the transitional period. The party laid down a threefold program of nationalism, democracy, and socialism as the panacea for the nation's ills. Its aim was the creation of a modern state in place of feudalistic China. The revolutionary ideology was almost transcendental. To place this program before the people and to carry it out required political realism as a component part of revolutionary leadership. For this the Kuomintang was indebted to the Soviet-inspired Chinese Communist Party and to direct moral and material assistance from Soviet Russia. The part which Soviet agents played in the early days has since become an incalculable element.

Theoretically, the Kuomintang aimed at a socialist-democratic revolution with every class of society as an active participant. The workers, the peasants, the small tradesmen, the merchants were all to constitute the revolutionary masses whose aspirations the party was to represent and for whom the party was to be the mouthpiece. It was felt that in the common struggle for liberation from foreign imperialism the prejudices and conflicts of classes within the revolutionary ranks would be submerged. This, however, proved to be an illusion resulting from intellectual confusion of the leaders. It merely opened the way to the penetration of the Communists whose infallible feeling for the masses and quick grasp of the revolutionary situation enabled them to lay hold upon all mass organizations.

From the very beginning there were evidences of a lack of homogeneous leadership in the party. The majority of the members of the Central Executive Committee were men whose middle-class vision extended not beyond their family doors. They were incapable of discerning the path of the revolution. A handful of radical propagandists constituted the vibrating force of the party. They were powerful agitators but lacked sufficient sense of responsibility to be true leaders. The military became the controlling element in the party. But this group consisted of men who were devoid of political wisdom and were more bold than prudent. They soon came under the sway of passion and adventure. There was no centralized leadership.

The crisis wore on. There were perpetual disagreements and quarrels. Then came the inflated expansion of the party following the northern campaigns. War was designed to bring the party political power but victories blinded its intelligence. More wars meant less intelligence and less sense. The Goliath of militarism may have been struck down but the energy of David was also spent. Exhausted by the costly campaigns for personal glory, harassed by the Communists at the back, and deserted by sincere and forward-looking comrades who became disgusted with the betrayers of revolutionary ideals, what remained of the Kuomintang armies and their satellites deviated from the original path of the revolution and turned for support to the hitherto recalcitrant bourgeoisie. The socialist-democratic revolution had come to an end.

The Kuomintang seemed to be meeting the fate of the Committee of Union and Progress in Turkey. A bourgeois revolution, however, would probably fill the immediate needs of China, and Kuomintang leadership was fit for the task providing it was sincere and honest. But a series of rollicking comedies of politico-military civil wars waged purely for factional reasons seriously impaired the dignity and authority of the party. In the eyes of the merchants of Shanghai and Nanking whose pocket-books sustain the national government the Kuomintang seemed guilty of a breach of promise. They became distrustful of Kuomintang sincerity. Meanwhile, the masses whose yearnings and hopes were unfulfilled expressed their discontent in open revolt.

The cancer that eats deeply into the vitals of Kuomintang and of the political life of the nation is the low standard of honesty and decency in the conduct of public office and officials. Effeminacy and corruption seem to be the concomitants of a reformist movement in an oriental society. The so-called modern educated men are no less responsible than the bandit-generals whose minds are still feudalistic. Lacking discipline and moral courage, educated but untrained, the majority of public officials find it to their advantage to become interpreters, stewards, and co-conspirators of the military chiefs.

The revolting circumstances of the last decade have produced in China a new type of young radical intelligentsia. To these independent thinkers the actions and declared policies of the Kuomintang appear ludicrously contradictory. They do not challenge the historical claims of the Kuomintang to being the political trustees of the people's welfare, but they strongly demand adequate safeguards for personal freedom. In matters concerning good government and public decency they are aggressively outspoken. The narrow-minded ruling power of the Kuomintang, however, brooks no criticism, helpful or otherwise. A veritable reign of terror has been inaugurated against young writers of talent and courage. Many of the most promising young Chinese have been destroyed. These wanton persecutions have alienated the sympathy and support of the intellectual class for the Kuomintang and recently elicited the just protest of Western writers.

Meanwhile, there are endless intrigues and chicaneries, perpetual haggling over spoils, constant bickerings and double-crossings, and increasing animosity and bitterness among factional leaders within the party. But Nanking and Canton, with their charges and counter-charges, are regarded as the kettle and pot calling each other black. The people have become estranged. To the masses, the Kuomintang, which was once a cult, is now a disease to be endured and got rid of, if possible. The time for the party to organize its victories and to consolidate its power is lost forever.

While the Kuomintang stews in its own juice the Communist backfire gradually spreads in the neglected areas of southwestern China. Whether a Communist revolution is a historical necessity for the Chinese people at the present stage of their development is, of course, a debatable question. But it is undeniable that the Communist Party has become a vital force in China, biding its time and gaining strength to contend for the supreme power of the land. In their struggle for power they must encounter the same historic forces and national traits of the people which stand in the way of innovation and progress. Both the Communist Party and the Kuomintang have sent thousands of men to death. The difference, however, is that the Communists have capitalized their gains and tried to make life anew, if no better temporarily, for those who survive, while the Kuomintang squanders its gains in perfunctory political luxuries and leaves the survivors in old misery.

Launching its revolutionary undertaking openly in 1927 the genuine Communist Party is now in absolute control of an area of 250,000 square miles with a population of 50,000,000. The Red Army consists of 400,000 able-bodied men assisted by a number of auxiliary units including young boys and girls. Sufficient information and statistics have not yet come to light to present a reliable picture of its inside workings but the following excerpts from the letter of a middle-aged peasant in the interior of Kiangsi gives an impression of what life is like under the Communist hammer and sickle:

Much more has happened here in the last four years than in the preceding forty.

My woman [his wife] died shortly before they [the Communists] came. Ping Heng [probably his brother] was shot on the morning of Wednesday. It was a continued nightmare for all. Ting Tze Lord's [a wealthy landlord] mansion was turned into a yamen [government office] and even the Hu-taos disappeared mysteriously. The back temple [an isolated place for the cripples and feeble-minded] was burned and no one left. On this site now stands a new building where young folks often gather for meeting. Life is strangely new and I have not seen half of the faces of the old days.

I am still plowing my own lot but I had to turn in the title deed in exchange for a yearly lease which is also revocable at any time. Everybody obtains his share of manure from the common pile but we keep our own cows and chickens. Except during the working season [the average working days for a Chinese farmer vary from 150 to 200 a year] we all dig roads, carrying dirt and building dams under supervision. It is said that we will soon have more water than we need for our cauldrons and more roads than our feet can walk.

The incense shop in Pi Ying [a small town] is closed and in its place is now a printing shop with all kinds of pictures, booklets, and pamphlets which are given free. All may sell to and buy from the general store but not between ourselves. There is nothing to buy and sell and no money.

The women folks keep ancestral tablets in their bedrooms and under their beds and worship at night. My two sons and two daughters seem to be busy all the time. They eat and sleep where there are others of their age together. What the girls do I don't know, but the older one seems to be happy. She says she does not need any go-between and she is married already! She is eighteen. The sons join the Young Vanguard and have drill and study every day. They do not study "Great Learning" or the "Four Books" but many others which I do not understand—less do I care to read. We are better off in one way and worse off in another.

Ironical though it may seem, communistic political methods operate most effectively in an economically backward country. If revolutionary disintegration continues in China, time is in their favor. Extremist, self-confident, optimistic in their outlook, cruelly scientific and diabolically energetic, the Communists, zigzagging though they must on account of inferior resources, are superior in human organization. The northwestern provinces are fast being drawn within the Communist vortex and it is their hope that they may eventually establish contact with Moscow through the mainland.

A group of national celebrities have openly demanded partial abdication of political power by the Kuomintang. Out of this may rise a new movement, less idyllic and romantic than the Kuomintang, more direct in methods, definite in purpose, and fascist in character. The situation is complicated by the interests of Western capitalist powers in China which have always played an invisible hand in the making and unmaking of government and which are now in conflict with the Japanese general staff. If a general conflict results, any government in China will be buried in a maelstrom of international politics, and anarchy will help the Communist Party to victory. If the repercussions in Japan continue toward internal revolution there while the world situation gradually improves, the Kuomintang Government may have another lease of life.

The Arena

By GEORGE S. KAUFMAN

DIFFERENT times, different customs. Were John Wilkes Booth to shoot Abraham Lincoln today, he would be prosecuted for failing to make an income-tax return.

Mayor Walker, if put out of office, will run for the New York governorship. This suggests an interesting possibility. Let Governor Roosevelt, if defeated for the Presidency, run for Mayor of New York. Mr. Walker could then put Mr. Roosevelt out of office, Mr. Roosevelt could run for governor again—why, it could go on for years.

And now if the racketeers will give up a month's pay, everything will be fine.

Suggested added feature for the Olympic games: the monkey-wrench throw. Throwing the wrench into the works at 500 meters. To be participated in by only our leading bankers and politicians.

Governor Roosevelt's nation-wide tour will wind up in California. In the event of defeat he can be in the movies in twenty-four hours.

Speaking further of California and the Olympics, no less than three men broke the record for the 100-meter dash. Let's see—isn't that criminal syndicalism out there?

Governor Eely seems to be slippery.

Progress is being made toward the five-day week, which will be five days more than the workers are getting now.

Since our soldiers are not wanted in either Washington or Johnstown, why not send them to France? They used to be wanted there.

Why doesn't one of the big chain stores build a string of de luxe poor houses around the country?

Mr. Hoover says that no group must be permitted to intimidate the country. The racketeers won't stand for any competition.

If Patrick Henry were to make his choice today, he'd certainly stay right where he is.

If the Olympic athletes, while they are in California, would take up the problem of debt cancelation, and if the Lausanne statesmen, when next they meet, would confine themselves to pole-vaulting—but no, it's too much to expect.

Isn't it about time for some press association to send out a false report of the end of the depression?

Gene Tunney will run for United States Senator. For Ambassador to England: John J. McGraw.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has discovered a document of immeasurable value to the (non)working man which he prints below in the belief that it should be framed and hung in every working-class home (if any). It is a "Special Letter" issued by Roger W. Babson, and reads as follows:

HOW TO GET WORK WHEN THERE IS NO WORK!

First, always keep in mind that the sign, No Help Wanted, is always a lie. . . . When men and women are laid off, it is because they are of no help to the concern employing them. . . . Anyone who can be of real help can always get employment. . . .

When applying for a position never tell your prospective employer about your own troubles. He probably has ten troubles to every one you have. Do not talk about your family or wife, especially if she's about to have another baby! Surely these things are not the fault of him whom [sic] you are hoping will employ you. Never talk against your former employer nor attempt to make an alibi for your losing your last job. One of the first things every employer wants is loyalty in his employees. Talk well of your acquaintances, be an optimist on business and life in general. . . . Better business will come when the millions of unemployed change their attitude toward life. . . .

The country will never get out of the present depression by any of us working less. Only by more work and harder work by all of us will prosperity return. Hence these suggestions: If you rent a house and cannot get work, ask your landlord to buy the materials, and offer to paint the house, shingle the roof, or make other repairs in payment for your rent. This would at least create prosperity in the paint and shingle industry! . . . Business is waiting only for more sales. If the millions of unemployed would start out today to sell the products of factories which are running on part time, prosperity would return tomorrow. Hence if you cannot think yourself into a job, then work yourself into a job. The first men and women to be reinstated with pay will be the ones who insist on working even without pay. . . .

Remember that now while unemployed you have a great opportunity to build yourself up physically, mentally, and spiritually. . . . Breathe deeply, drink much water, exercise sufficiently, chew your food, and get a lot of sleep. . . . Spend an hour a day in your public library systematically studying the industry to which you wish to go back. . . . Do not waste time reading the newspapers or listening to the radio. . . . Remember that you have as much time as President Hoover or Henry Ford. The difference between you and them is how you use this time. . . .

Today, with deflation about completed, the need is merely for a determination by us all to go forward and do SOMETHING useful—with or without immediate pay!

■ ■ ■ ■ ■

MR. Babson has neglected one point. If because of lack of food, you are unable to chew it properly; if you faint in the public library from hunger; finally, if you starve to death before the pay begins, remember that you will be making room for some other worker. Remember that "better business will come when the millions of unemployed change their attitude."

THE DRIFTER

Remember Sacco and Vanzetti

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation seems to be the only journal in the United States that has, to date, consistently, conscientiously, and steadfastly fought the battle for Sacco and Vanzetti. In the midst of dirt and corruption, it has held high up before the eyes of the people an unstained ideal of political morality which is based on a long, honorable, meritorious past. It is with a sense of what The Nation is and has been that I appeal to it to continue the fight for Sacco and Vanzetti.

In the first place, let not the twenty-second of August go by this year without the holding of a fitting memorial service in New York and in Boston in honor of Sacco and Vanzetti. In the holding of this service, all contact and friction with the police authorities should, in my opinion, be avoided. This is the best way in which to conquer the respect and the sympathies of the police and in which to submit to the American public, through the press, a dignified presentation of all the new matter which has come to light in the last five years and which goes to prove the innocence of Sacco and Vanzetti.

There is one particular phase of this evidence in which I have been specially interested, relating to the two men who were intimately connected with the case in the beginning and who fled to Italy to escape the reign of terror which prevailed in the State of Massachusetts. The story of Mario Buda and Riccardo Orciani, close friends and comrades of Sacco and Vanzetti, partners in all their undertakings, is a human record which for pathos, mystery, and tragedy has rarely been equaled by anything in fiction or real life. I have received a letter from a lawyer in Kentucky who says:

I have never seen Buda's statement as published in the New York World of December 2, 1928, and I would like very much to see it, as I read the complete record of the trial, both in the lower court and throughout all the appeals. I have often wondered why Buda disappeared: and especially why he waited until after the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti before he made any statement on his own behalf. He must have known from 1921 to 1927 of what was going on in connection with the Sacco-Vanzetti appeals, and it is certainly queer that he should have kept so silent, when his silence tended to create the impression that Sacco and Vanzetti were probably guilty.

After a four years' study of Buda's character, I am satisfied that the reason he did not speak was because he could not speak. Nobody invited him to speak, and nobody connected with the Sacco-Vanzetti case, so far as he knew, seemed to take the slightest interest in whatever he might have to say, or seemed to regard it as of any importance.

If Buda had hidden himself, if he had buried himself in some far-off place where he never could have been found, if he had changed his name and otherwise destroyed all traces of his existence, a presumption would have remained against him. Buda did none of these things. Buda simply went home. I was the first person, so far as I know, to reach Buda, and when I questioned him on the case, he told me frankly and willingly everything he knew about it. I have visited Buda's home in Italy, talked with his mother and his other friends and relations, and I have visited Buda twice, once on the island of Lipari and once on the island of Ponza, where he has been held a political prisoner for nearly five years; for four years I have corresponded with him regularly.

The State of Massachusetts put Sacco and Vanzetti to death on the theory that Buda was a participator with them in the crimes alleged. Why does not the State of Massachusetts, if it has any self-respect or any belief in the honesty of what it has done, make an effort to bring Buda to justice, either in Massachusetts or in Italy? Why execute two of the "murderers" and make no effort to apprehend the third? The case of Massachusetts against Sacco and Vanzetti was that Buda stole a car, that he hid it in his shed, that he invited Sacco and Vanzetti to use this car with which to commit crimes and murders. If all that was true then all three men were guilty. If that was not true, then all were innocent.

Buda wrote me lately requesting me to send him the excellent book on the case written by the New York lawyer, Osmond K. Fraenkel. He has written me: "The statements made by Johnson and his wife are in many ways untrue. I am going to write an answer to these statements." I doubt very much if Buda, when he was in Italy subsequent to November, 1920, followed the case in its details or had any means of doing so. His interest in the testimony seems now to be awakening, and in Fraenkel's book he possesses the whole thing in a truthful, impartial, and convenient form. He is an intellectual man and spends his time in study. He can see now for the first time from Fraenkel's book just where he stands in the case.

Buda's five years will be up on August 20 of this year. He has against him three additional months. A petition signed by the American friends of Sacco and Vanzetti and addressed to the Italian ambassador in Washington, outlining Buda's connection with the Sacco-Vanzetti case, calling attention to the importance of his testimony, and requesting that the Italian Government cancel the extra three months standing against him, would, in my opinion, bring about his liberation.

EDWARD HOLTON JAMES

Geneva, Switzerland, July 15

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Once more my calendar reminds me of that grim night in Charlestown Prison when Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti were led to the executioner's chair, victims of a legal murder. Am I a sentimentalist that despite the intervening years I still rehearse the weeks of anxiety and strain that characterized the struggle for their lives? Or am I right when I look upon my picture of their death masks and tell myself that men forget too easily; that the curse of our times is not our sentimentalism but the ease with which our capacity for sensation becomes dulled? Are we too tender-minded or too hard-boiled? Are radicals, who criticize the mawkish monuments of present-day civilization, inconsistent in upholding their own martyrs, perpetuating their names and deeds, and holding, year after year, as it were, grudges in stone?

It may be true. But as for me, I can perhaps best celebrate this hideous anniversary by once more reliving for a few days, if only that, one of the soundest emotional stirrings I ever experienced. When I joined the radicals of the world in heaping execrations on the cowardly heads of men like Alvan Fuller and Webster Thayer, I was not giving vent to a petty spleen; I was, rather, adding my single voice to the great, age-long chorus of hatred against smug and intrenched intolerance; I was crying vengeance upon the cruelty, not of a few individuals, but of a social system. No, let the complacent, the dilettante, and the casual radical declare that it is fruitless now to raise a protest; let the purely rational reflect, and thus satisfy their frigid souls, that after all the men are dead and we must grapple with the problems of the living. But there are some of us whose radicalism, whose determination to agitate ceaselessly for a new society from the ground up, began with the clanging of the iron doors in the dark hours of the early morning of August 23, 1927. For though these men were never demigods, they were gallant and devoted; and if in our time the books of judgment do not record a reversal of the Bay State's black conspiracy, the day will come when justice will be done. No, my anarchist friends, whose philosophy I do not share but in whose lot of social rebellion I gladly participate, we have not forgotten!

Boston, Mass., August 8

PITMAN WALSH

A Place for Planned Economy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Over the air recently, the editor of the trade paper issued for the daily press described with braggadocio how the news of the big conventions was gathered. He went into considerable detail as to the army of reporters, editorial commentators, announcers, photographers, telegraphers, et cetera, recruited for the purpose and constituting the highest-priced flower of the profession, the millions of words wired out, and the tens of thousands of film feet consumed. He pointed with pride to the matchless enterprise thus demonstrated at a cost of "over $200,000 a day."

Since the two conventions together ran nine days, the outlay for publicity, on the basis of this figure, must have mounted upwards of $2,000,000. At least $1,000,000 of this could have been saved without detracting one bit from the quality of the service. Was this not a good place for a little planned economy?

Philadelphia, July 8

W. H. Y.

Thomas for President

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your readers will not want to be neutral in this crisis. In this year of 1932 they will want to support a fundamental program and a man of outstanding ability for President.

Nation readers are invited to join the Committee of Five Thousand for Thomas for President. By October 1 we hope this will be a Committee of One Hundred Thousand. This committee is composed of men and women not now members of the Socialist Party, who wish to make their indorsement of Thomas for President count in the campaign. The headquarters of the committee are at 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York.

New York, August 6

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Contributors to This Issue

LONG BOW is the pseudonym of a Chinese who has until recently been connected with the Nanking Government.

PAUL ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

WILLIAM SEAGLE is coauthor of "To the Pure" and author of "Cato, or the Future of Censorship."

GEORGE S. KAUFMAN is coauthor with Morrie Ryskind of the Pulitzer prize play, "Of Thee I Sing."

ROBERT P. TRISTRAM COFFIN is professor of English at Wells College.

ALFRED E. SMITH, the former Governor of New York State, was the Democratic candidate for President in 1928.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN is the author of a biography, "Bitter Bierce."

ROBERT CANTWELL is author of "Laugh and Lie Down."

NEW YORK WIGMAN SCHOOL . . . OF THE DANCE

Under Mary Wigman's personal supervision . . . Courses for dancers, amateurs and teachers at the only official American school to teach the Wigman method of the modern dance. . . Hanya Holm chief instructor.

Fall term starts Oct. 3rd . . . Enroll Sept. 26th to Oct. 1st. . . Daily classes during August & September.

113 WEST 57th STREET, NEW YORK CITY

THE NATION ON WEVD RELIEF BREAKS DOWN IN THE CITIES

by Mauritz A. Hallgren

Wednesday, August 17

8:15 p.m.

WHAT WE LIVE BY

THE new book by the author of The Art of Thinking concerns itself with the art of arts—the art of living . . . Ars artium regimen animarum . . . the art of arts is the guidance of the soul.

GRANTING Abbe Dimnet's premise that "philosophy is a human quest carried on at a proper altitude", What We Live By is a truly philosophical work—a contemplation of "the True, the Good and the Beautiful," . . . a serene discourse on "the superiority we call culture."

THOUSANDS of readers who found wisdom winged with wit in The Art of Thinking are finding it again in these friendly and sparkling pages dedicated to first and last things.

309 pages—$2.50—at all bookstores the new book by ABBÉ DIMNET from the INNER SANCTUM of

SIMON AND SCHUSTER

386 Fourth Avenue • New York

Books and Films

The Inner Temple

By ROBERT P. TRISTRAM COFFIN

Every right-run farm should own
A place where men can be alone.

A toolshed will do well as such,
Women would not go there much
To pry into the mysteries
Of plows and harrows. On his knees
A man can get down there and savor,
As all men need to do, the flavor
Of being of the ancient race
Of animals and know his place
Is properly on pungent clay.
And something holy in its way
Will rise out of the earth beneath him
And in a fresh, strange garment sheathe him.
So when he will go indoors,
His wife will look up from her chores
And wonder at him seeming new
As when their courtship was not through.

White Housekeeping

The Diary of an ex-President. By John P. Wintergreen.
Edited by Morrie Ryskind. Minton, Balch and Company.
$1.75.

IN politics I have always found a sense of humor an invaluable asset. There is nothing quite so refreshing, especially in a Presidential year, as the discovery of a book with a real sense of humor about politics. Morrie Ryskind, who I understand was responsible for much of the funny business in "Of Thee I Sing," has continued the Wintergreen epic in inimitable style in "The Diary of an ex-President." My personal opinion is that it should be made compulsory reading for every politician, campaigner, or political office-holder. Some public official should be entrusted with causing such politicians to read a chapter or two every time there seemed any danger of their taking themselves too seriously.

The American political scene grows more complicated almost daily. The grave problems that have been saddled upon our national and local governments by the economic crisis have tended to make self-important political personages even more inflated and, in some cases, demagogic. In reading the naively simple adventures of John P. Wintergreen in the White House, they may find that after all their good fortune or fine public position is usually the result of some special gesture of fortune rather than something which implies any great merit on the part of themselves.

I laughed with John P. Wintergreen and I laughed at him. As a former State executive, I found great humor in some of his White House adventures. No one who has been in public life can possibly escape the humor of President Wintergreen's situation, and I am sure that Mr. Ryskind has manufactured many a genuine laugh for hundreds of thousands who may never sit in the chair of political office and know personally the situations that make a sense of humor so invaluable in such a position.

ALFRED E. SMITH

On Being Repetitive

On Being Creative. By Irving Babbitt. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

AS if to prove his point that there is something fixed and permanent in the midst of seemingly universal flux, Dr. Irving Babbitt publishes a new book which is so much like every other book he has printed since "Literature and the American College" of 1908 that one is at a loss how to review it. It is replete with the same notions, the same prejudices masquerading as ideas, the same antiquated methodology that have been characteristic of him all his writing life. The ways of criticizing Babbitt's work were so thoroughly canvassed during the great humanist controversy of 1929-30 that a new approach is hardly at this late date to be found. One can merely reiterate the objections then brought up in the hope that they may by some wild chance penetrate the protective armor humanists seemingly wear when they venture into the world.

Babbitt still envisages himself as the great Harvard Socrates. He still thinks that civilization is a purely verbal structure that can be wrecked or saved by a definition. He still insists that definition is to be striven for by reference to the past usage of a word rather than by reference to the reality it is intended to symbolize. He is still content to base his case on a purely verbal psychology and to insist with characteristic vehemence that he and he alone is being experimental. He is still able to convince himself that he can, following King Canute, hold back the waves of science by dubbing all those he does not like, particularly those which have to do with the study of man as an individual and as a social animal, pseudo-sciences. He is still willing to scramble the ideas of the world in the hope that by a marvel of verbal prestidigitation he will produce something that will save civilization from the fate he sees ahead for it.

All this ludicrous activity is carried on in this new book, which is ostensibly given over to essays on Wordsworth, Coleridge, Johnson, Schiller, Julien Benda, The Critic and American Life, and the title topic, On Being Creative. Thus in writing about Coleridge and Johnson it is quite obvious he is really using them as foils for an essay on the use of imagination in literature. "In dealing with this problem," he writes with his wonderful solemnity, "it seems to me desirable to bring a Socratic idea into relation with a Buddhistic one and then to use the two ideas thus combined in defense of an idea that is central to Christianity." Thus by shuffling around the notions he has cadged from writers of the past he hopes to get the stage set for a return to what he insists is a sounder conception of the imagination than that obtaining for the last one hundred and fifty years. But he makes not a single reference to the work of the psychologists in the field of the imagination. He simply plays around with his jig-saw puzzle until he is convinced that he has exhausted the patience of his audience, and then announces a conclusion he had arrived at long before he set out on his study of Socratic, Buddhistic, and Christian ideas. Indeed, he has only adverted to them in the hope—vain, to be sure, in most cases—that by invoking such impressive authority for his private notions, his readers will be stampeded into accepting his prejudices as Great Ideas.

Coming back to Dr. Babbitt's verbal gymnastics after almost two years of rest from them, one is impressed by their total irrelevance to contemporary life. There is plenty of room for a critic, even a school of critics, whose sole duty it might be to criticize the modern mind. But no school has yet appeared which has shown itself capable of criticizing the modern mind in the terms in which that mind must perforce operate. The critics who have appeared, like the humanists and the neo-Thomists, simply deny the validity of those terms at the very beginning, and so the points they make are grounded in such a different methodology that they are difficult to apprehend, and when apprehended, usually turn out to be irrelevant. Even the Communist critics are unable to get outside the modern mind in any true sense. They escape, at best, the so-called bourgeois prejudices. They are less bamboozled by certain of the more and less obvious sacred cows of Western European society. The truth is that they are themselves so completely partisans of modernity in most of its phases that they are incapable of criticizing it outside the realm of economics. Personally I have always thought that this is getting pretty near the heart of the matter. It is of the very first importance that we know in what sort of society a given set of ideas was produced, and it may safely be said that the economic system plus the cultural inheritance from the past—the superorganic of Kroeber—will come pretty near to explaining just why certain ideas are held. If this is true, then Dr. Babbitt's notions may be dismissed as a part of the cultural lag. He is still trying to exploit the adventitious and honorific value allegedly inherent in literary or verbal learning as opposed to the learning brought to us by the scientific method. Far from being in advance of the moderns, Babbitt is so far behind them that it is only with difficulty that they can make out what the devil he is talking about.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

The Importance of Henry James

The Prefaces of Henry James. By Leon Edel. Paris: Jouve et Cie. 18 fr.

THE body of comment that has grown up around the work of Henry James is exceptional for the lack of common agreement it reveals among his critics. To the general reader his name has come to stand for a forbidding gentility, for a love of long sentences and of hair-splitting analysis, and for an almost mystical concern with problems of deportment. But even among his critics neither his greatness nor his failure is taken for granted. It is not commonly accepted that he was a great writer in the sense that it is commonly accepted that Dostoevski was a great writer; on the other hand, it is not generally held that his work has lost its meaning to us to the extent of that of Huysmans, for example. There is a deep difference of opinion even among those who begin with an assumption of his failure. To Van Wyck Brooks and to the nationalist critics, James has been principally significant as the great expatriate, the most distinguished refugee from American materialism, and his failure is presented both as a result of his pilgrimage and of the combination of forces that led him to make it. The "serious charge" I. A. Richards incidentally mentions against much of James turns out to be that when "the reader has once successfully read it there is nothing further which he can do. He can only repeat his reading." These are two views selected at random; other critics have offered other objections. In these very pages, not long ago, C. Hartley Grattan added a new note of dissent by characterizing James as "beyond all else the great exponent and defender of the leisure class" as a part of an argument designed to show that James has little of significance to say to the present generation. There seems to me to be less point in disputing these various views than in indicating that those who are agreed that he failed do not agree why he failed. Nor do they show convincingly how he failed. We can be almost persuaded by Mr. Brooks's eloquent argument, for example, until he offers us his proof. When he points to the novels which he maintains indicate James's decline, we learn only that Mr. Brooks does not like the kind of writing in which James had perfected himself. At the opposite extreme, a devoted admirer like Percy Lubbock can give us a clear statement of his belief in James's greatness, but our skepticism is likely to be aroused as soon as we perceive the vagueness and the rather precious quality of his reasons for believing in it.

Leon Edel is among the admirers, which is to say that he communicates his belief in James's greatness more effectively than he communicates the reasons for that belief. There is little in the present volume that is not well-known to readers of James, but it has a genuine value as an introduction to one of the most searching studies we have of the technique of the novel, and to some of the most remarkable of English prose. According to Leon Edel, James, in writing the prefaces to the definitive edition of his work, "took the attitude of a misunderstood author who wishes to explain what he has tried to do, and why." Examining the facts that led to the prefaces being written, this seems accurate, but examining the prefaces, it is misleading. James was in his sixties when he wrote them; he was generally neglected or forgotten; the fate of his greatest works was, as Leon Edel says, "a small sale, a confused criticism, and stupid letters from friends asking for explanations." After a life of industry comparable with that of Balzac, James felt that more was due him, and he wrote the prefaces in a final and pathetic attempt to clarify his writing to his audience. The edition was not a success and the prefaces have remained almost unread—an ironic, a Jamesian fate for them, and one that he expected.

These are the melancholy facts. But turning to the prefaces, the phrase "misunderstood author" has misleading connotations. No body of writing that I know testifies so eloquently to a simple joy in writing; no author has had a keener relish for the difficulties of his craft. Literature still remembers the terrible cries of anguish that accompanied Flaubert's labor pains, and writers, recalling what hell he went through, still shudder as they sit down to write. More than any other individual, Flaubert succeeded in making literature a stern and lonely and unhealthful profession, inviting only to those willing to abandon everything else for it, and his influence has been so paralyzing simply because he changed the emphasis from what is said to the emotions of the individual engaged in the process of saying. James was one of the few who studied Flaubert's spectacular torments and remained unperturbed. He knew very well that he enjoyed his art, and that his enjoyment lay precisely in a knowledge of the difficulties and in his attempted solutions. That the difficulties were enormous, and that they seemed greater the more closely he scrutinized them, became, in the last analysis, the central source of their appeal.

It is a lack of appreciation of the almost Rabelaisian zest with which he approached intellectual problems that renders so much of the comment on James inapplicable to his work. He was not narrow and specialized and sterile; his later works emphatically do not indicate a decline in his creative powers. On the contrary they reveal a startling development in his imaginative resourcefulness, a more daring and more varied use of metaphor, a greater field of knowledge on which the metaphors were based—signs of at least an unchecked inspiration and of a tireless ingenuity. It was peculiarly in the later works that he could heap analysis on analysis and then analyze his analysis with recklessness and with an unparalleled extravagance of fancy. This is not to say that such extravagance is in itself good, or that the conceits were uniformly successful. A comparison between the relationship of two people and a Chinese pagoda, in "The Golden Bowl," involves so great a strain on the imagination that one remains in doubt as to what James was trying to communicate. I merely wish to indicate the injustice of comment which does not take this extravagance into account. In Rabelais we consider a similar extravagance, applied to physical functions, amusing; in James, applied to mental processes, we commonly call it unreal.

Leon Edel does not take up these points; he is principally occupied with repeating and commenting on James's theories of fiction. One impression is clearly conveyed by the prefaces: James was indifferent to what is said, and whole-heartedly concerned with the way of saying it. His descriptions of the initial conceptions of his novels (descriptions, incidentally, which in their range of imagery and precision of statement surpass similar passages in Joyce and Proust, the two who have drawn most from James) reveal that for him the material for fiction might be implicit in any chance remark, however slight, in any casual situation, no matter how conventionally undramatic. He never seems to have considered that this might be more revealing of his general indifference to his subject than of the potential richness of the casual. If I can do this much, he seems to say, with this slight and inconsequential situation, what might be done with some of the intense and urgent conflicts that surround you? He made no secret of the ways in which he gained his effects; he did not credit them to some supernatural power or to special and mysterious gifts. He left a detailed record of his experiments in communication, and they are experiments that no one who feels he has something to communicate to others can profitably disregard.

ROBERT CANTWELL

The Truth about Slavery

Slave-Trading in the Old South. By Frederic Bancroft. Baltimore: J. H. Furst Company. $4.

ONE can rely upon Frederic Bancroft to do a thorough and sound job of historical writing whenever he gives us a book, which is unfortunately only rarely. His latest, a study of slave-trading in the old South, is a notable contribution to the history of the slavery system. It is all the more welcome because of the new cult which would whitewash all the leaders of the Confederacy and has now discovered that all the Republicans, who steered the country through the Reconstruction days, were a set of unmitigated rascals without a single redeeming trait or defense. This cult is, of course, primarily carried on by the Daughters of the Confederacy, the Confederate Veterans, who have recently declined to meet with the survivors of the Grand Army, and by other professional Southern patriots who have even erected a monument to the jailer of Andersonville. Without in the least desiring to wave the bloody shirt, or to arouse sectional antagonism, it is none the less vitally important that the actual facts as to the institution of human slavery in America should be on record beyond question, lest they be buried under a mass of sentimentalism, in a deliberate, almost nation-wide effort to gloss over the horrors and to give to the whole of the institution the glamor surrounding the petted house slaves in Thomas Nelson Page's novels.

As a trained historian and scholar, Mr. Bancroft has, of course, built his book on contemporary facts, taken wherever possible from Southern sources, with photographs of advertisements and other documents which cannot be gainsaid. He has had recourse also to the testimony of foreign visitors to the United States, and where he has used contemporary Negro testimony he has gone to great pains to find corroborative evidence. It is a dreadful chronicle that he has set forth of wanton human misery; of the destruction of families; of the tearing of little infants out of their mother's arms, and their sale at twenty-five dollars or more to anyone who would take them; of enforced violations of marriage ties, indeed, of the reduction of the marriage rite among colored people to a mockery and a sham. Mr. Bancroft also deals at length with the fate of the Octoroons and Quadroons who were sold as "fancy girls." He records the case of one mother who thanked God when she heard of the death of her daughter, one of this handsome type, as she was being marched South with a coffle of slavehands to be sold to the highest male bidder to do with as he pleased. Mr. Bancroft is also very unkind in bringing out the record of some of the leading Charleston families whose houses are still among the show places of that city, to show that their wealth was founded on the blood and tears of the human beings that were auctioned off on the block.

In other words, Mr. Bancroft has given us a source book of great worth. No one who desires honestly to treat of the slave trade in the old South hereafter can possibly write of the subject without referring to this monumental work. It should be in every library in the country. Certainly no university library can afford to be without it.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Shorter Notices

American Literature and Culture. By Grant C. Knight. Ray Long and Richard R. Smith. $3.

This book is noticed here only as a particularly distressing example of the sort of textbook one piously hopes is passing. If a book of this sort is not accurate it is nothing, and this book is not accurate. Both the text and the bibliographies are full of errors major and minor. But worse by far is the fact that Mr. Knight obviously does not know what it is all about. He has no discernible literary philosophy of his own and as an eclectic he is pretty feeble. Even the rapid reader will soon discover that he is apt at one point to take one approach as the correct one and a few pages later to accept a diametrically opposed viewpoint. Thus on pages 439 and 440 he gives a long, lugubrious quotation from Wordsworth which he says accurately applies to our present diseased literary condition, and then on page 456 he says, surprisingly, "The outlook for the American novel is a cheering one." Sample opinions are the following: "No American author is more unjustly neglected than is William Dean Howells" (page 378). "... we are tempted to select Mrs. Wharton as the noblest Roman of them all" (page 413). "... the dead-cat naturalism of Zola and the prying naturalism of George Moore" (page 423). "Here and there groups of idealists like the New Humanists or the Fugitive Poets at Vanderbilt University strive to make headway against the confusion of bad taste..." (page 445). "Mr. Lewis shares the common inability of so many contemporary writers to see life steadily and see it whole" (page 449). It is in organizing his material on the literature since 1914 that Mr. Knight exposes his incompetence not only in judging literature but also in assigning relative proportions and defining relations. The students who are given this as a text will certainly get a sorry picture of the literature of their own time. And of the literature of the past they will get the conventional academic view. When will academic pot-boilers cease to clutter publishers' lists?

The Dark Land. Poems by Kathleen Tankersley Young. Ithaca, N. Y.: The Dragon Press. $1.

Miss Young's poems have a certain distinction. They are for the most part written in one mood, the modern mood of despair. The meaninglessness of life, the measurelessness of time, the flux and change of all things are stressed. Miss Young tends to use an imagery which is so unvaried as to become symbolic: rain falling on the streets and on the passers-by dims lives of which the outlines in the early light were real; snow follows rain, and under its falling all things die into motionlessness. The background of these poems is the city: the streets fade from red into gray blue.

Shall we walk forever in the streets
Shall we walk forever under the awnings
And emerge to rain falling, and wade through
The green lights without remembering
Why we are here?

Miss Young's form is a kind of free rhythm, basically five-beat but used often with alternating lines of three and four beats. Her poetry is the poetry of statement, of the fine line; it is not musical. Her influences seem to be the Imagist school, the poetry of T. S. Eliot and of Ivor Winters.

The Life of Horace Walpole. By Stephen Gwynn. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.50.

Here is one of the most pleasant kinds of biography—a running account based on voluminous correspondence, filled with the gossip and color of an age and the ring of its great names. Mr. Gwynn's latest study in literary biography is written with charm and distinction as well as with fairness and good judgment. The great dilettante of his day, son of a powerful Prime Minister, amateur in politics, in publishing, in literature, author of that absurd but influential romance, "The Castle of Otranto," confirmed bachelor with his extraordinary friendships with women—he who blighted Chatterton's hopes and made the grand tour with Thomas Gray—Walpole comes to life more satisfactorily in this pleasing volume than in any other single-volume account, perhaps, that has been given us. This is owing in part to the delightful selections from the correspondence and in part to the charm of Mr. Gwynn's prose. It is a biography that may be recommended alike to the student of the period and the general reader who does not ask for sensational psychological disclosures (for which Horace Walpole might prove a tempting subject) or a romantic legend.

They Call It Patriotism. By Bruno Brehm. Translated from the German by Margaret Goldsmith. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

Herr Brehm has told the story of the Pan-Serbian movement which carried through the assassinations in 1903 of the ruling Serbian family and the assassinations of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his morganatic wife at Sarajevo, and ended with the execution of "Apis," the Serbian leader, in 1917. The tale resolves itself into a swiftly moving narrative based, every step of the way, on historical evidence. Nearly all the conversations are founded directly on transcripts of testimony. No spurious facts or details are added and no important ones omitted. The result is history in narrative form which does not, as historical novels have always done, distort the truth. Professor Sidney B. Fay contributes a Foreword and has supplied two maps from his own "Origins of the World War." As pure story for the general reader the book is dramatic and exciting.

Hindoo Holiday. By J. R. Ackerley. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Mr. Ackerley's visit to Chhokrapur, to act as tutor for the two-months-old child of the maharajah, was evidently a pleasant, somewhat limited experience; at least the information he gives about it is all of one kind. The maharajah's personal idiosyncrasies, his difficulties with the language, his cryptic sense of humor, provide most of the amusement, while the rest of the book is given over to the author's relations with various natives, to inquiries and answers about native beliefs and customs. The information so conveyed must evidently be accepted with reservations; Mr. Ackerley seems willing to sacrifice everything, including the white man's burden, for whatever is picturesque. The comparisons, by Van Vechten and Priestley, between this book and "Passage to India" are unfortunate, for the difference is between a frivolous skipping about over the scene and a serious study of a racial problem.

They Never Come Back. By William Plomer. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

This is the story of the visit of a young English artist to Japan, his friendship with a hypersensitive young Japanese student, his relations with the English wife of his Japanese host, and his departure. The externalities of the novel are simple, but the content, which manages to localize the disparateness of races without distorting any of the relationships into a black-and-white relationship of national types, is complex and even profound. The novel is as good as if not better than E. M. Forster's "Where Angels Fear to Tread"; certainly it is more direct than Forster's novel. Though it may not prove a popular success, it should attract the attention that any novel as well written as this one deserves.

Films

Concerning Dialogue

THE talking picture has been in existence for four years and is now so firmly established that even the old enthusiasts of the silent picture have lost all hope of ever restoring their favorite to its former glory. And yet criticism of the talking picture as a talking picture goes on unabated. By many of the supposed champions of cinematic art dialogue is still held to be an abomination.

The stock argument against using dialogue in a film is of course well known. Dialogue, we are told, is the natural medium of the stage; but it is wholly foreign to the screen whose appeal is directed to the eye and not the ear. It may come as a surprise to the film enthusiasts of this generation, but will hardly be news to those who remember the history of the modern theater, when it is recalled that barely twenty-five years ago there was a very similar outcry against dialogue. Only then it came from theater reformers such as Gordon Craig and his followers, who voiced the belief that dialogue intellectualized the theater, whereas the true art of the stage expressed itself primarily through visual forms which appeal direct to our senses. Perhaps, after all, the present opposition to screen dialogue is rooted in the same old aesthetic of non-intellectual and "mystic" art, for it certainly cannot be justified on any other grounds. Speech is an integral part of man's being. In a silent film, with its necessary convention of a soundless world, pantomime is appropriate and legitimate. In the sound film realistic pantomime in a realistic setting is a deliberate artifice condemned by its own contradictions.

But, if we must be honest with dialogue, if we must face squarely its particular problem in the sound film, what are we to think of the popular practice which takes a dialogue written for the stage and puts it on the screen in its original form, except for some pruning and compression necessitated by consideration of time?

Obviously, those who resort to this practice fail to see, or pretend not to see, any important difference between the function of speech on the stage and its function on the screen. To them speech is speech, no matter where it is used, provided they can weld it to physical action and set both tripping through their allotted number of reels. The result is the Hollywood picture, something that is neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring, and that inevitably leaves a rather queer taste in the mouth.

Now, we all know that a stage play, no matter how realistic, never reproduces life as it is. It must needs shape it to fit the mold of the stage. Whatever its material, it remains a play or, in other words, a version of life informed with theatrical pretense and made to unfold itself within the walls of the theater. Speech is the principal handmaid of this theatrical pretense, and the enormous work it does in translating life into the terms of the stage is indeed something to be marveled at. What does it not do? It informs the audience of events that have taken place off stage. It elaborates and fills out action. It makes thinking habitually loud and explicit. It swells and keys up emotion. It decks argument with sparkling wit. And sometimes, as in Shakespeare, it comes forward and glories in its own imagery and music.

It is perfectly natural that stage speech should perform all these various duties. For the stage is limited in its means and, moreover, cannot disguise its fundamental artifice and conventionality. But is it equally natural for this theatrically inflated speech to appear in the real world which is the province of the talking picture? After all, the material of the film is not an acted life, a life on the stage, but the real, honest-to-goodness life of people as it is lived in natural surroundings. And yet what does Hollywood do? It takes a life that has already been fashioned to fit the stage, transplants it back to its original soil, and then leaves it there to swell with all the exuberance of stage verbiage.

No representation of life in a talking picture can ever be convincing so long as it carries the hall-mark of the stage battle of words. Even the so-called "natural" stage dialogue is too inflated to appear natural on the screen. To be used at all it has to be stripped to the bone, reduced to the normal function of speech, which in nine cases out of ten is only a concomitant of action and not its source or substitute.

And yet even deflated dialogue is not enough. Years of slow development have gained the film a freedom from set scenes, and a power to select and order its primary material that are peculiarly its own. The stressing of dialogue as the main vehicle of dramatic narrative has thrown the film back to the long scenes of its early youth. To be sure, lately the talking picture has been trying to recover this lost flexibility and freedom of movement. But it is not really in earnest about it. It still pays infinitely more attention to the running stream of conversation than to the arrangement of separate units of speech in significant combinations.

More could be said of the use of dialogue as an element of a purely conventional screen art, an art that without violating the essentially realistic nature of its material, would provide means for establishing an intimate contact with the audience, and would rival the stage in imaginative interpretation of life. But this would require a radical change in the accepted form of the motion picture, and the prospects of any such revolution in Hollywood are too remote as to call for immediate consideration.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

PLAYS

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN With GLENN ANDERS
DOROTHY STICKNEY, MARGARET WYCHERLY, JOHN BEAL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."

—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

BOOTH THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

OPEN SHELF

CURIOUS BOOKS

Send for Catalogue of Privately Printed
Unexpurgated Items
Exotically Illustrated
Limited Editions

THE FALSTAFF PRESS

Dept. N, 260 Fifth Avenue, New York

EDUCATIONAL

CONVERSATIONAL FRENCH

Spanish - Italian - German

Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

FRENCH

Spanish, Italian, German
Russian, Conversational.

Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c. Daily 9-9.
Fisher School of Languages, 1264 Lexington
Av. (bet. 85-86 Sts.) Est. 1905. AT-water 9-6075

POSITIONS WANTED

YOUNG WOMAN, experienced piano teacher, desires position as resident or visiting governess or companion. References. Personal interviews in New York City after September fourth. Write Box 734, c/o The Nation.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

ANGLO-AMERICAN wants several congenial persons with $2,000 for equal partnerships in beautiful resort 50 miles from Manhattan. Rare opportunity. Box 736, c/o The Nation.

FOR RENT

A TERRACE OVERLOOKING THE HUDSON

Three-room apartment for rent in cooperative apartment house with large terrace overlooking Hudson River; corner living room with an eight foot casement window facing south, and woodburning fireplace; completely equipped kitchen and dining alcove; large closets; in thoroughly modern fireproof house; roof and garden available to tenants; cooperative cafeteria and store on ground floor makes housekeeping easy, while other cooperative features help to reduce the cost of living; all modern conveniences including electric refrigeration and incinerators. Moderate rental. October occupancy. See Renting Agent, 423 West 21st Street (in the old Chelsea district between ninth and tenth avenues) or call Chelsea 3-7631.

FOR RENT

TO LET, on club property adjacent to a large nudist park, a five-room stone bungalow, equipped with modern plumbing and all electrical appliances, including an electric cooking range. The bungalow is completely and attractively furnished. Tenant or lessee must be qualified for, and desire, membership in the nudist club which owns the large wooded, surrounding estate, distance two and one-half hours by train from New York City. Address Box 731, c/o The Nation.

8 ROOM COTTAGE, 5 room bungalow, furnished, secluded. For rent monthly, reasonable. A. F. Hofman, R. F. D. 1, Westport, Conn.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

79th ST. SUBWAY—Drive. Elevated, surface, bus. Widely travelled newspaper woman share with business woman or couple, 6 sunlit, attractively furnished, front rooms. Newly decorated. Frigidaire. Piano. Privacy. Unusual opportunity. Susquehanna 7-8725.

FOR SALE OR RENT

HOME—year round, CROTON-ON-HUDSON, N. Y. Complete comfort. 5 rooms, tile bath, heated garage attached. Lawn and garden space. Village water. Electricity. Pyroflux gas, one third acre. Box 726, c/o The Nation.

TO THE LANDLORD:

Do you want tenants for your house or apartment?

THE NATION has a select reliable group of readers who look to our real estate columns to help them find new living quarters.

We know this from the many letters received telling us how pleased they are with the results from their advertisements.

Why Not Try These Columns?

Rates: Minimum, 1/2 inch, $3.08
1 inch, $6.16

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 24, 1932

No. 3503

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	153
EDITORIALS:
Bootstrap Economics	156
Mr. Hoover Stands Pat	157
Little Wonder Houses	157
Mr. Stimson on Peace	158
PRIVATE PROFITS IN RUSSIA. By Louis Fischer	159
GUESSES FOR SALE. THE RECORD OF THE PROFESSIONAL FORECASTERS. By W. H. Garfield	162
THE MEXICAN RETURN. By Robert N. McLean	165
CIVILIZATION AND THE POET. By Joseph Wood Krutch	167
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	170
CORRESPONDENCE	170
BOOKS:
Mural for Evening. By Leslie Nelson Jennings	173
A Compact Encyclopedia. By Henry Hazlitt	173
The Decline of the I. W. W. By Norman J. Ware	173
Midwest "Cherry Orchard." By Horace Gregory	174
Chinese Puzzles. By Lewis S. Gannett	174
More of Milton. By H. W. Garrod	175
Mr. More's Catholicism. By Felix Morrow	176
Second Act. By Kenneth White	176
The First German Fascist. By Mauritz A. Hallgren	177
Simian Social Life. By Melville J. Herskovits	178
Shorter Notices	178
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	180

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

MARGARET MARSHALL

DRAMATIC EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN

H. L. MENCKEN

MARK VAN DOREN

LEWIS S. GANNETT

NORMAN THOMAS

CARL VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON

ARTHUR WARNER

MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE PRESIDENT CLEARLY BELIEVES that he can continue to get along very well with the same tactics that he has pursued ever since the depression began. He continues to speak of that depression always in the past tense. He has still not a single fundamental remedy to suggest. He continues to throw the blame for everything on Europe; he completely fails to see that Europe's depression could cause depression here chiefly through a diminution of foreign trade—and Mr. Hoover has set his face against tariff reduction or any other measure that would help to revive that foreign trade. Instead, he now puts forward one more scheme for raising ourselves by our own bootstraps. He has called a national conference of the business and industrial committees of the twelve Federal Reserve districts to meet in Washington on August 26. The program for this conference is, as usual, extremely vague; but, in Mr. Hoover's favorite terminology, it will aim toward the "coordination" of this and that, and the "expansion" of that and this, particularly, of course, of "credit facilities." Elsewhere in this issue we remark on the very serious dangers of the desperate gamble that the Administration is now making with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Mr. Hoover's latest proposal is merely to gamble a little more, and while he talks brazenly of the depression as if he had already stopped it, the New York Times business index for the week ending August 6 fell to 52.2 per cent of "normal," the lowest point it has yet reached.

A DOLPH HITLER HAS ASKED FOR ALL or nothing, and until now he has received nothing. He demanded of President Hindenburg that he be given not only the chancellorship of Germany, but also that he be clothed with as much real power as Mussolini had after the fascist march on Rome. In brief, Hitler wanted the present government to step aside and let him establish his "legal" dictatorship. Although there was some indication that General von Schleicher, Minister of Defense and boss of the army, was inclined to favor the fascist leader, Hitler's audacity failed to impress Hindenburg. The President, Chancellor von Papen, and former Chancellor Brüning were themselves disposed to let a few of the National Socialists enter the cabinet, but Hindenburg would accept them only on a non-partisan basis, that is, as representatives of the President and not of their party, while Brüning, speaking for the Catholic Party, wanted them in only in order to tame them by compelling them to share in the responsibility of government. Forced on by the more fanatical of his followers, Hitler was in no position to compromise. It was probably against his better judgment that he attempted to bluff his way to a fascist dictatorship. Having failed, he is today more than ever under the influence of those among his lieutenants who prefer direct action to Hitler's "legal" tactics. Thus, talk of a fascist Putsch is being revived, but it is doubtful whether a march on Berlin could succeed, for the fascist leaders have delayed so long that the government and the Reichswehr are now apparently in an excellent position to suppress a revolutionary attack from the right.

ONE OF THE CONTROVERSIES that had been dividing Russia and Japan and which many students believed might lead to war has been amicably settled. This was the dispute over the fisheries agreement of 1928, which was intended to regulate the operations of Japanese fishermen in Russian waters and their use of Russian port facilities. But so vague was the language of the agreement that it immediately gave rise to a quarrel between the two governments. Several times relations between Moscow and Tokio approached the breaking point as each country continued to accuse the other of having violated the treaty. The controversy was at its height when Japanese troops invaded Manchuria and appeared to be threatening Russian interests in that area. But the good sense exercised on both sides prevented an open break during the Manchurian crisis. Now, by yielding on most of the points in dispute, the Soviet Government has reached a new agreement with the Japanese, and another possible cause of war in the Far East has been removed. This action is, of course, completely in accord with Russia's policy of peace, for the Soviet Union must guard itself against all controversies that might result in hostile interference with its industrialization program. The policy has already borne fruit in the form of the several non-aggression pacts Moscow has concluded with its neighbors, the latest being that with Poland. Only Japan and Rumania, among its more important neighbors, have thus far refused to sign such treaties.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
18

WHEN THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT announces its long-heralded scheme for the settlement of the communal problem in India, its specific provisions, whatever they may be, are likely to be overshadowed by the declining prestige of Britain's policies both in India and at home. Sir Samuel Hoare's announcement in the House of Commons on June 27 that the procedure previously followed with regard to the Indian question will be abandoned has, in particular, damaged the British cause. No longer are practical matters to be worked out by large committees and used as a basis for a bill; rather, a joint select committee will be set up, representing both houses of Parliament, and before this committee the various questions will be threshed out. The effect of the new procedure is to reduce to a minimum the opportunities for the expression of Indian opinion and greatly to enhance the power of the British, a state of affairs which even the most moderate Indian opinion can not tolerate. Thirteen outstanding Indian Moderates have given notice that they will no longer cooperate in the making of a constitution unless and until the government resumes Round Table Conference methods. Such prominent delegates to the Round Table Conference as Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, Srinivasa Sastri, and M. R. Jayakar are included among the thirteen. Once more the British authorities have set back their own cause. And the Congress policy, which formerly seemed too extreme for many Indian Moderates, now stands vindicated in their eyes. As the Manchester Guardian has said, the action of the Indian Moderates "leaves the government cut off from politically conscious India. . . . Once again the cleavage between the Government of India and those whose support it must have if representative institutions are to prove workable, is complete."

SPAIN'S MOST SERIOUS MONARCHIST revolt seems to be completely crushed, its instigators in ignominy, and the revolutionary government stronger than before. Let us hope that the energy the new regime has been obliged to expend in thwarting such attempts to stage a royalist come-back may soon be completely diverted to constructive ends. With the plotters of monarchist reaction the new regime has been comparatively tolerant—as Premier Azaña says, it has been "legal and lenient." From now on it will be "legal and severe." That a royalist rule could return seems impossible to any but such disgruntled militarists as the defeated General Sanjurjo and his satellites, many of whom live prudently along the French Riviera or in the region around Hendaye and Biarritz, mourning the collapse of the good old days and smuggling counter-revolutionary funds across the Pyrenees.

OUR DISMAL RECORD OF BANK FAILURES continues, with 808 reported in the first six months in 1932. The tendency nearly everywhere will be to ascribe these bank failures to that anonymous depression which takes the blame for everything on its broad shoulders. But the figures, even on the surface, do not bear out this facile explanation. As the National Industrial Conference Board points out, there were only 714 bank failures in the ten years preceding the World War; during the war there were 456; but during the eleven and one-half years since the war, or from 1921 to June 30, 1932, there have been 10,093. Certainly this is an ironic commentary on the Federal Reserve Act, one of the great aims of which was to make bank failures impossible. It is true that by far the greater number of failures has occurred outside the Reserve system. Of the 808 banks to close in the first six months of this year, 204 were members of the system, and 604 were non-member State banks. In the period from 1921 to 1929 State bank failures constituted 86.5 per cent of all bank failures. The lesson of this is obvious. Not until our banks are welded into a single unified national banking system is real progress in averting bank failures likely to be achieved. Branch banking for national banks should be freely permitted at least within State lines and probably within Federal Reserve regions. One of the earliest duties of Congress will be to use its powers over taxation and interstate transactions to compel all banks to become members of the Federal Reserve system. Following that, its duty will be the much more difficult one of seeing that that system is not used as a political instrument.

MR. HOOVER MAY STOP HIS EARS against embarrassing criticism of his action in calling out regular troops to drive the bonus army from Washington, but neither the President nor the country has yet heard the last of that tragic event. When a committee of writers headed by Sherwood Anderson called at the White House to protest against the use of military force Mr. Hoover was too busy to see them. One of his several secretaries, Theodore G. Joslin, received the Anderson group, not to hear their protest, for he refused to listen to that, but to ask them to give further currency to the falsehoods which Administration spokesmen have been spreading concerning the causes of the Washington "disturbances," the details of which Paul Y. Anderson related in The Nation last week. As though to answer these spokesmen, who have been attributing the "rioting" to unidentified "Communists and criminals," a commander of one of the bonus camps, J. W. Wilford, filed with the District of Columbia grand jury on the very day that the writers were visiting the White House an affidavit declaring that secret service agents had deliberately provoked the trouble which led to the eviction order. He further charged that "the events of the day of the battle" had been carefully planned at a White House conference a week before July 28. In his statement Mr. Anderson asserted that the President had "set the seal of official approval" on the use of force against workers and the unemployed. The Wilford charges go much further. It is absolutely imperative that Senator McKellar of Tennessee carry through his plan for a Congressional investigation of the tragic affair.

THE UNEMPLOYED ARE DEFEATING themselves by dividing their strength among such a multitude of "movements" and "armies." No sooner had the bonus army, composed primarily of jobless workers, been driven out of Washington than a campaign was launched to organize these men into a "Khaki Shirt" movement. Through this chauvinistic organization the unemployed were promised that their rights would be protected and their interests promoted. But the "Khaki Shirts" do not stand alone. Among their more important rivals are the "Blue Shirts," led by Father Cox of Pittsburgh. As we write, thousands of members of the "Blue Shirt" army have assembled on the outskirts of St. Louis for the convention of the "Jobless-Liberty" Party. Like the bonus-seekers, the "Blue Shirts" came afoot, by freight train, and by automobile. In St. Louis they no doubt expected to hear Wall Street, the bosses, and the government roundly criticized and denounced, and to be told that only by organizing themselves could they ever hope to obtain just treatment from the bankers and industrialists. It has been the history of the American worker that he has had little to do with older and more experienced working-class organizations when times were good, and has been only too ready to turn to demagogues when times were bad. Or is it that the older liberal and radical organizations have not yet learned enough about American labor to enable them to speak intelligently and convincingly to the workers?

COAL-DIGGERS IN SOUTHERN ILLINOIS have been betrayed once more by the reactionary leadership of the United Mine Workers of America. Mining operations in Illinois were suspended on April 1 when the operators and United Mine Workers failed to agree upon a new wage scale. Subsequently the officials of the miners' union negotiated a contract providing for a 25 per cent reduction in pay. The contract was submitted to a referendum of the workers, who rejected it by a vote of more than four to one. Undismayed, the union leaders again called for a vote of the miners, and again it appeared that the contract would be rejected by an overwhelming majority. But before the votes could be counted, and in fact while the ballot boxes were being transported from the Ridgely Farmers State Bank in Springfield to the district headquarters of the United Mine Workers where they were to be opened and the votes tallied, the boxes were stolen by two armed men. John L. Lewis, international president, promptly declared that an emergency existed and that under his emergency powers he would have to order the new contract to take effect immediately. Obviously, nothing was said in the Lewis announcement concerning the fact that ownership of the automobile in which the two thugs were riding had been traced to Fox Hughes, vice-president of the Illinois district of the United Mine Workers and one of Lewis's henchmen. It is not surprising that a new revolt against the Lewis-Walker leadership is spreading among the Illinois miners, who are continuing the strike despite the Lewis order.

THE VOTERS OF NEW YORK STATE will have an excellent chance this fall to reward an admirable public officer if the Democratic Party is wise enough to nominate Herbert H. Lehman, the present Lieutenant-Governor, to succeed Franklin Roosevelt. Lieutenant-Governor Lehman, who gave up a highly successful banking career to enter political life, has steadfastly refused to play politics and has continued to devote a considerable portion of his private means to furthering public-spirited enterprises such as the construction of adequate homes for the white-collar class of workers on the lower East Side of New York. He has at all times taken an intelligent and sympathetic attitude toward labor and has recently averted, through his mediation, a serious strike in the garment industry. Whether Tammany will consent to his nomination is something still to be decided; it may, indeed, be influenced by the action which Governor Roosevelt will take in regard to Mayor Walker. We are quite aware, of course, that the mere election of even as good a man as Mr. Lehman will not improve the Democratic Party or make it worthy of public confidence; we abate not one jot of what we have said heretofore about this organization. Those of our readers who feel that it is no longer of any value to vote even in State elections for a good man running on the ticket of one of the old parties will doubtless cast their votes for Louis Waldman, the Socialist candidate. We think it only just, however, to put in print the admirable record which Mr. Lehman has made and the dignity and modesty and freedom from anything like business or political control which he has displayed while at Albany during the last three and one-half years.

MAYOR WALKER is getting that hearing he so jauntily demanded before Governor Roosevelt should act upon the charges of malfeasance pending against him. To the accompaniment of welcoming crowds, brass bands, wisecracks, and roses strewn along his path, the best-dressed of all mayors has kept his public entertained by his state journeys between New York and Albany. But against the dignified background of the Executive Chamber, where hearings have been conducted with admirable calmness and directness, the Mayor, stripped of his admiring public, cuts a far less engaging figure, while the picture there being drawn of the way in which America's greatest city has been governed for the past half-dozen years appears even more sordid than it did in the bustling New York courtroom where Judge Seabury first brought it out. As for the Mayor's defense of himself, his reply to the Governor's inquiry into his connection with a certain profitable oil pool is not untypical of the weakness and equivocation of his answers throughout the hearing:

I don't know that—if I did know—but I—my understanding was—in view—there were no questions asked about it. In fact, if I never heard of it again it would have been all right with me. I wouldn't have probably complained about it. I mean, there was no definite agreement about it. "We are in it" was one of those things amongst gentlemen. From the amount that I got could be computed the amount they had, and the amount that I participated in, ascertained—I mean the percentage.

THE DEATH OF GRAHAM WALLAS at the age of seventy-four removes a fine seminal mind from the realm of political thought. A member of the famous Fabian Society, along with such brilliant writers as Shaw, Wells, and the Webbs, Wallas was never inclined to solve problems by facile epigram, but had those same qualities of earnest and passionate devotion to truth and conscientious open-mindedness that distinguished John Stuart Mill. His political books, "Human Nature in Politics," "The Great Society," and "Our Social Heritage" emphasized the weakness of mere abstractions in dealing with political questions and the constant need of keeping in mind all of man's attitudes, impulses, and traditions. He tried to find a scientific basis for politics, and if he did not quite succeed in that, he at least succeeded in approaching politics in the scientific temper. In his last volume, "The Art of Thought," he turned back to the need for examining the thinking process itself, and he contributed a very stimulating analysis of the means by which that process leads to new discoveries. His careful and penetrating work, let us hope, will continue to influence social thought through the coming decades.

Bootstrap Economics

HOW good are the chances that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's gamble with $3,800,000,000 of the people's money, along with all its related gambles now afoot, will bring back prosperity? Not a fragment of respectable evidence has been produced to show that the scheme is likely to succeed; on the contrary, whatever reading of the economic indices is possible in these confused times points toward ultimate failure. Yet the project is almost universally acclaimed, almost nowhere challenged. A veritable plague of "pools," credit corporations, and the like is under way. There are plans, at least on paper, to take over the Farm Board's wheat and cotton, to finance the purchase of raw materials for manufacturers (who are presumed to be itching to buy, though they cannot sell their finished goods), and to do various things, always with the suggestion that business stands ready to help the R. F. C. get rid of its money and thereby break the back of the depression.

There hangs about this whole theory of business revival an atmosphere of make-believe and hypnosis which the newspapers are doing their best to promote. Clinton W. Gilbert telegraphs the New York Evening Post that Mr. Hoover intends to stay in Washington and "personally supervise the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Home Loan Bank Board." The deep impropriety of placing any sort of pressure upon the Federal Reserve, which stands in a fiduciary relationship to the entire country, apparently does not occur to commentators. The New York Times, in the spirit of the occasion, puts a two-column head on a front-page story to the effect that trade with Russia is to be revived through the sale of 10 per cent Russian bonds in the United States, without bothering to name the sponsors of the plan or to estimate how much money could be raised on the apparently unsecured obligation of a country, millions of whose defaulted bonds are locked up in the vaults of American banks, when the bonds even of countries not in default are selling in the open market at less than 50 cents on the dollar. Credit, which brought us to the verge of ruin in 1929, is king again; confidence, which was smothered under billions of uncollectable debts, is to be resurrected by more debts; and the public, having tasted once more the profits of a stock market which had seemingly solved the problem of lifting itself by its bootstraps, acclaims this newer New Era, either ignorantly and hopefully or with its tongue in its cheek and a shrewd resolve to cash in on the delusion while the going is good.

The maladies which afflict business are numerous and deep-seated, but it is probably true that the existence of a mass of debt which cannot be supported by current income is the most obvious and pressing one. Since there is no possibility of dealing with the organic difficulty, the practical course is to meliorate the distress caused by debt. One way of doing this would be through outright devaluation of our gold-standard currency—but this proposal, which might make it possible to restore commodity prices to the 1929 level, has not received serious consideration, nor does it now seem likely to. The alternative is to attempt to whip up prices and business activity to a level where the debt can again be sustained. It is this program on which we are embarked.

Ordinary business prudence would dictate that, before the attempt is made, the chances of success or failure should be carefully weighed, for the consequences of failure may gall the nation for years. If the sponsors of this plan have any reasonable grounds for expecting success they have kept them to themselves, whereas the obstacles cannot be mistaken. One of these is the existence of well-equipped, powerfully financed, and highly competitive industrial units, now 40 to 85 per cent idle, which stand ready to produce additional goods the moment the market can absorb them. An obstacle to materially higher prices for primary materials is the stubbornness with which producers of such materials continue to produce in spite of ruinously low prices. We are raising as much cotton this year as in 1919, more wheat than in 1925. On purely theoretical grounds, the swarm of economists in the departments at Washington could have pointed out to the Administration and to Congress the probability that prices will not advance materially. Professor Frank G. Dickinson of the University of Illinois has recently called attention to the fact that since 1790 wholesale prices have alternately moved upward and downward over approximately 25-year periods. If this cycle continues to hold, the latest decline, beginning in 1920, will have some thirteen more years to go. Depressions occurring during a downswing of the price curve are hard to overcome; stubborn attempts to maintain price levels only serve to prolong such depressions.

Successful or not, no government has a right to engage in such a gamble. No effective protest can be expected from the newspapers or from a public drugged with propaganda and generally ignorant of the facts. Executive heads and directors of corporations, sitting behind closed office doors and speaking in low tones, say that none of the conjured-up prosperity is reaching them. They are still laying off employees, cutting dividends, and refusing to produce beyond the immediate needs of the market. There is not the slightest question that the best interests of the country would now be served if an immediate halt were called on the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as now conducted. It represents the most dangerous gamble, in terms of peacetime expenditure of money, in which our nation has ever engaged. What will happen if that gamble fails? The special viciousness of those operations at present is that they have no clear terminus; no hint has even been given as to what the government intends to do when, as seems probable, the Treasury cannot any longer furnish the billions that will be needed to continue them. If the aid now being given is withdrawn next year, through exhaustion, and if the prices now being supported through that aid are allowed to slide, conditions are likely to be chaotic. With the failure of the Farm Board, it was widely asserted, the artificial attempts to support prices had come to an end; we had "learned our lesson." But the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is now engaged in precisely the same type of enterprise to the accompaniment of almost universal support. The tragic fact is that we have learned nothing.

Mr. Hoover Stands Pat

HERBERT Hoover offers his record and his personal philosophy as the two principal reasons for his reelection. The country knows him so well both for his faith and his works that it seems hardly necessary to discuss either at length. The man has learned very little in the last three years, except, perhaps—as is suggested in his speech of August 11 accepting renomination—that flag-waving may get him a few additional votes. And so today he is somewhat more nationalistic in his attitude than he was in 1928. Four years ago he favored a “scientific” tariff; now he comes out “squarely for the protective tariff.” He strongly opposes cancelation of the war debts, though he would swap the debts if he “were offered some other tangible form of compensation.” This offer he merely mentions in passing; what he emphasizes is his unyielding opposition to cancelation. “These burdens,” he declares, using the language of every spread-eagle politician, “must not be transferred to the backs of the American people.” He insists “upon an army and navy of a strength which guarantees that no foreign soldier will land on American soil.”

There are probably many votes in such campaign tactics, for there is some evidence of a rising wave of patriotism in this country, not among the unemployed and the dispossessed, of course, but among those citizens who still have jobs and a little property. But to clinch his argument Mr. Hoover launches another tirade against the radicals, meaning John Garner and Franklin Roosevelt as well as the Socialists and Communists. The President is against “haphazard experimentation,” and refuses to “turn to a state-controlled or state-directed social or economic system in order to cure our troubles.” He remains inflexible in his narrow devotion to that which he calls “the American way.” We must, he declared, “preserve the fundamental principles of our social and economic system. That system is founded upon a conception of ordered freedom. The test of that freedom is that there should be maintained equality of opportunity to every individual, so that he may achieve for himself the best to which his character, his ability, and his ambition entitle him.” If this is a true test, then the twelve million or more of our unemployed must be so lacking in character, ability, and ambition that they are entitled to nothing better than the protracted misery and privation they are now enduring. According to Mr. Hoover, the American system owes these unfortunates nothing more than his illusory “equality of opportunity.” At the same time he asserts in the face of widespread hunger and distress that he has “provided methods and assurances that there shall none suffer from hunger and cold among our people.”

It must be conceded that Mr. Hoover in this speech spoke more pointedly than has his Democratic opponent thus far in the campaign. We know now approximately in what manner Mr. Hoover intends to meet—or to evade—the issues of the campaign. We know how to answer him; we can never be sure just where to find Mr. Roosevelt. Only on prohibition does the virtue of plain speaking clearly lie with the latter. He is “100 per cent for repeal,” and so is the Democratic platform on which he stands. President Hoover, like the Republican platform plank on which he insisted, faces both ways. He has undergone an eleventh-hour conversion; he does not want to miss the wet bandwagon; but it is still only a half-conversion, and he is still trying to keep one foot on the wagon and one foot on dry ground. The Republican platform, it will be remembered, favors an amendment “which, while retaining in the federal government power to preserve the gains already made in dealing with the evils inherent in the liquor traffic, shall allow the States to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine.” Nobody, of course, can possibly know what this means; it is a flat self-contradiction. If the federal government really allows the States “to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine,” it must relinquish the power “to preserve the gains already made”; if it retains that power, it cannot allow the States to deal with the problem “as their citizens may determine.” Mr. Hoover’s position is only slightly less dishonest than that of the Republican platform. He believes that “each State shall be given the right to deal with the problem as it may determine,” but “that in no part of the United States shall there be a return of the saloon system.” As a test of President Hoover’s good faith, let him draw up and submit to discussion a new amendment to the constitution which would embody these aims. Let him tell how a constitutional amendment would define “saloon.” And as his own Wickersham commission recommended that the present mandatory Eighteenth Amendment be replaced with a merely empowering amendment—the only feasible way, we think, of achieving Mr. Hoover’s present ostensible aims—let him tell us why he dismissed that recommendation curtly and flatly, without condescending even to give his reasons.

Little Wonder Houses

AN enterprising New York department store has put on exhibition a complete and full-sized dwelling. It is called “The Little Wonder House,” and surely there is in it much to be wondered at. It is a two-story, six-room “French Norman cottage.” From the outside one approaches a medieval house of beams, plaster, and shingles. The shingles on the roof are “hand-riven,” of all shapes and sizes, as if our age had never learned how to turn out uniform shingles by machine. They are laid in crooked lines, higgledy-piggledy, as if carpentry had not yet learned to lay shingles in straight lines. The architect apparently would have preferred a thatch roof, as historically more correct, but these shingles, we are told, give the same “delightful effect.” The house professes to be built of rough-hewn beams, as if straight, machine-cut beams were not obtainable, and as if we had never learned any better method of construction. The beams profess to be held together by wooden pegs which project an inch or so from the beam construction, as if steel nails were not obtainable, or even saws to saw off the wooden pegs, or even competent joiners or fitters. And why all this elaborate dishonesty, this extravagant forgery? So that the house might be “picturesque,” so that it might be “quaint,” so that its occupants might play at living in the fifteenth century. All they would need to make the masquerade complete would be fifteenth-century costumes.

But inside—once they have got past the hammered wrought-iron lamps over the front door, the dove-cote, the "peasant" open fireplace with its great hood, the swinging crane for the kettle, "the random-width oak-plank floor," the alleged "French provincial type" furniture—inside, the inhabitants can begin to play furiously at living in the twentieth century. They are not, thank Heaven, expected to cook in the open fireplace. The kitchen has an electric stove, with electric clocks to regulate it automatically; it has an electric ice-chest, electric fans, electric toasters and waffle-irons, an electric mixer, a built-in electric dish-washing machine. And wonder of wonders, as you approach the kitchen door it swings open for you, automatically, because it is equipped with a mysterious photo-electric cell. In the rest of the house are, of course, not only electric lights, telephone, and radio, but air-cooling and conditioning units. And the bathrooms are 1932 design.

So complete a reductio ad absurdum of all historical forgeries is this fifteenth-twentieth-century house that it is difficult not to believe that it is simply a deliberate hoax perpetrated by one of the new international architects. "Here am I," the cottage seems to say, "I represent the zenith of what is now possible in twentieth-century living convenience. I could not have been as good as I am even a year ago. Isn't it ridiculous that I should be so up-to-date inside and so completely medieval outside? Wouldn't it be just as sensible to build a fourteenth-century state carriage around one of the new V-8 Ford automobile engines? By emphasizing and caricaturing this childish historical reminiscence now so rampant in domestic architecture, maybe I can persuade you to get rid of it once and for all."

And yet it may be that the "new international" architects, the "functionalist" architects, themselves have something to learn. The Little Wonder French Norman Cottage is fake picturesque, post-card quaint, and yet it recalls historically a style that did have authentic beauty. How much authentic beauty has the average factory, which is structurally "honest" and built according to "functionalist" doctrine? Or how much, even, have the more pretentious houses designed in accordance with the latest dogmas of the "functionalist" architects? Those that do not suggest a sawed-off section of an ocean-liner remind one of a packing box with windows or a good hen-coop on stilts. The code of the functionalists, it should by this time be obvious, rests on an ill-digested half-truth. Utility and structural honesty are, unquestionably, tests of good architecture. But they are tests which ought for the most part to be applied negatively, and not erected into fetishes or allowed to become exclusive aims. "Honest" architecture is as much to be desired as honest statesmanship, but architecture that is merely honest is no more necessarily great than a merely honest statesman is necessarily a great statesman. To know that any structure or design or detail is useless, tricky, or misleading is to find real aesthetic enjoyment impossible. But it does not follow that because any framework or mechanism exists or is necessary it must be revealed and pronounced ipso facto beautiful. The steel skyscraper might be no more improved by exposed ribs than the Venus de Milo. It is not necessary that the outer shell should reveal the framework or structure, but merely that it should not belie it. If the functionalists want to make such monstrosities as the Little Wonder House impossible in the future, let them, without retreating in their courageous battle for sound design, be not ashamed of frankly aiming for beauty in design also.

Mr. Stimson on Peace

SECRETARY Stimson's admirable address on the present status of the Kellogg Peace Pact, before the Council of Foreign Relations in New York on August 7, has very naturally echoed around the world, for it is a remarkable statement of what the United States Government thinks has been accomplished thus far by the Pact of Paris. It has especially stirred the authorities in Japan, and well may they be aroused if Mr. Stimson's words are taken at their face value. For he has made it clear once more that the American Government has not the slightest intention of recognizing the validity or legality of a single act of Japan's in Manchuria. Indeed, Mr. Stimson recalled that on March 11 last forty-nine out of fifty nations, constituting the Assembly of the League of Nations, with Japan alone dissenting, indorsed the action of the United States. No one could have been more careful than was Mr. Stimson in his every reference to Japan. But it is the facts and, let us hope, a guilty conscience, which make Japan wince whenever this matter comes up.

For the rest, Mr. Stimson's speech was extraordinarily well reasoned in its analysis of what has thus far been accomplished by the new attitude of the world toward war. It was not in the least a partisan or a campaign utterance, but merely a careful lawyer's analysis of the gains achieved. It is impossible to have heard it or to read it without being convinced that the Secretary desires to bring this new policy to complete fruition at the earliest possible time. And though the nations affected have not yet given the highest proof of their approval of the treaty by wholesale disarmament, it is none the less a momentous happening when an American Secretary of State solemnly reiterates his belief that war is not only outmoded, but impossible at the present state of the world's history as a means of settling international disputes. The Kellogg Pact, he stated again and again, "rests upon the sanction of public opinion, which can be made one of the most potent sanctions of the world."

Mr. Stimson pointed out that the old conception of international law was based upon the idea that each war was a private fight from which every neutral was barred. Now, instead of a war being nobody's business, it is everybody's business. A neutral nation not only has the right to speak out if it chooses but even has a duty to do so in order to preserve peace, lest even a tiny blaze again become a world-wide conflagration. Again, Mr. Stimson asserted that as long as the signatories of the pact support the American policy which the Hoover Administration "has endeavored to establish during the past three years of arousing a united and living spirit of public opinion as a sanction of the pact . . . consultations will take place as an incident to the unification of that opinion." We unqualifiedly agree with Mr. Stimson that if this policy is carried on by the nations in the spirit in which he spoke, the world will have taken a tremendous step toward peace. At the same time we must point out that as long as there are a million more men under arms than in 1914, and disarmament conferences lead rather toward increase of armaments than genuine disarmament, Mr. Stimson lays himself open to the charge that he is describing rather an ideal state than an existing one.

Private Profits in Russia

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, July 17

RECENT reforms which legalize the sale of agricultural products by Soviet collectives are regarded in some quarters as a Neo-Nep or a resurrected New Economic Policy which will pave the way back to private capitalism. The peasants, whether they are individual cultivators or banded together in kolhozi or collectives, are now permitted to retain a greater part of their harvests and to sell it at uncontrolled prices on the open market. The government has encouraged the selling operations of collectives by exempting them from taxation and by urging communities to supply market stalls, tea rooms, night lodgings, legal protection, and cultural facilities to peasants who come into town to dispose of their wares.

Very pressing circumstances impelled the government to introduce these far-reaching reforms. During the winter and spring of this year many districts in the Ukraine and in other republics lacked sufficient food and fodder. Horses and cattle died in large numbers. Thousands of peasants have been coming to Moscow and other large cities for work and nourishment. Such acute shortages are transitory. In fact, within a fortnight—by the end of July—the crops will have been harvested in most stricken areas, and the problem of feeding men and animals will have been solved for the time being.

But the issue is much more fundamental. The deficiency in bread was not due solely to a bad harvest last year. The depleted meat supply cannot be explained only by the death of cattle from hunger. Policy plays an important role in these questions. The root of the trouble lies in the faulty conduct of the state's grain-procurement campaign. Grain procurements are the purchase of the country's annual agricultural surplus by the state. That surplus has totaled as much as one-fourth of the entire crop. Its collection is the Soviet Government's largest single economic activity. But it was woefully mismanaged last year. The total seeded area in the Soviet Union in 1930 was 98,500,000 hectares; in 1931 104,500,000 hectares. This may justly be recorded as an achievement of collectivization and of Communist propaganda and organization. Weather intervened, however. Five large regions experienced drought, and the 1931 cereal crop fell sharply from the total of 83,700,000 tons in 1930. The government overlooked this fact. Despite the smaller yield, it took more out of the villages in the bad year than in the good year. The figures of state purchases of grain were 22,900,000 tons in 1931 against 22,100,000 in 1930. Despite the smaller yield, moreover, the government exported more in the bad year than in the good year. The figures are 5,058,000 tons of grain for 1931 as compared with 4,768,000 tons in 1930.

Now I know all the extenuating circumstances. I know that the Soviets must export in order to buy foreign machinery for the continuation of their successful industrialization program. They had to create a large military reserve to meet any contingency in the Far East. They had to feed the cities. Just at present, however, I am interested in the result of Bolshevik policy. The result was that many peasants who had given up their grain to the state at a low price immediately after the harvest were without bread later in the year and had to purchase it at higher prices than they had sold it—if they could get it at all. Peasants buying bread—that is the anomalous picture which Russia presented in recent months. Peasants, moreover, were deprived of so much grain through the state's procurements that they lacked seed for the current season, and when the government subsequently lent them seed they ate at least part of it. The practice of taking every last ton of cereals out of the village in order to meet the state's needs is destructive of the government's best interests, and will have to stop if agriculture is to progress. Moscow must curb the zeal of young Communists and rural administrators whose greatest pride is the execution of the plan of grain procurement irrespective of whether or not the given kolhoz or individual remains without food, fodder, and seed. Heretofore, too, shortsighted officials have compelled the peasants to sell to the state every additional ton which a good harvest brought them. This killed the peasants' initiative. The Communists tolerated such tactics for two years—to their own hurt. Today they are thundering against them. Improvements have been ordered. Most important is the May decree which reduces the volume of grain procurements from 22,900,000 tons in 1931 to 18,000,000 tons in 1932. (One can only hope that a bumper crop, which is unlikely, will not tempt the Kremlin to raise the figure.)

Now the peasants will not only keep more of their grain. The government has also been procuring meat, eggs, poultry, vegetables, fruit, etc. Previously, the peasants had to sell to the state their entire surplus of these products as well. Now the government's meat-procurement schedules have been reduced even more drastically than those for grain. A larger proportion of all agricultural goods, in fact, will stay in the hands of the peasants. They can market as much of it as they do not want themselves. This is the greatest innovation introduced by the May reforms.

The objection of the peasants to procurements was not merely that the state took all they did not eat and often much of what they should have eaten, but that it paid them a very low, cooperative price varying, last season, from one ruble twenty kopeks to two rubles per pood (thirty-six pounds) of grain. At the same time, however, the small quantities of grain that reached the open market brought anywhere up to twenty rubles a pood. The peasant felt that he was being cheated. The peasant, moreover, complained bitterly that though he sold his produce to the state at cooperative prices, he had to buy the little city goods he could lay hands on at highly inflated prices.

The May reforms enable the peasant to ask inflation prices for that part of his crop which he retains. A queer situation results: a kolhoz has a harvest of 10,000 poods. It keeps 7,000 poods for itself. It gives 2,000 poods to the state and gets only 4,000 rubles for them. It sells 1,000 poods on the market in free trade and gets 20,000 rubles for them. I have asked a score of Soviet agricultural experts here whether the mujik would not protest against such an arrangement and demand the total abolition of federal grain collections so that he could obtain a commercial price for his entire marketable excess instead of only for the smaller part of it. The answer was invariably in the negative. The peasants, I have been assured, will simply regard the state agricultural produce procurements as an exorbitant tax and will be content if the Bolsheviks let them take a reasonable price for what remains after the procurements have been sliced off.

Nevertheless, the tendency under the recent reforms will be for the government to procure less from the collectivized and individual peasants. The volume of goods going to market will therefore increase. But the state has very definite requirements. It is the sole exporter. It must feed the army. Heretofore, it has borne the responsibility of supplying the cities with bread and other articles of food. It procured the country's surplus produce and distributed it to the population on ration cards at low cooperative prices. Bread cards seem synonymous with scarcity. As a matter of fact, the ration system functioned, crudely to be sure, when relative plenty existed. It broke down this year in consequence of insufficient supplies. Many smaller towns have been taken off rations and must depend on the city markets and bazaars. Even in Moscow, which is favored above most other localities, rationing brings little more than bread, except, and the exception bulks large, in the case of important factories which have fairly well-stocked cooperatives. In giant construction centers, too, and at scores of big and pivotal plants throughout the country, the state is still feeding its employees and workers on the ration system. But quite a number of these industrial enterprises are taking steps to secure an independent food supply. They are organizing their own grain, dairy, rabbit, and vegetable farms which produce for them and only for them. They are making contracts with collectives for direct agricultural sales in return for manufactured commodities which they undertake to obtain for the peasants. The future promises further progress along this line. Rationing of everything but bread will probably disappear very soon. Ultimately bread will likewise be released for exclusive distribution through the collective and private markets that are quickly springing up in the cities. This will take time but it is the only logical possibility if the present policy is maintained.

The fact that the state grain farms are expected this year to yield the government 2,474,000 tons as compared to 1,770,000 tons in 1931 indicates the probable line of development. The government will try to obtain more and more grain and other produce for export, for the army, for the canning industry, and for isolated industrial enterprises from its own state farms. This will reduce the contributions which the collectives and private cultivators will be called upon to make to the state's procurement totals. If some day the state farms or sovhozi can meet all the government's needs, grain procurements can cease entirely, and the peasants will market everything they do not consume.

As involved as all this must sound, the reality is much more involved. It is complicated, for instance, by the problem of technical crops (cotton, flax, hemp, etc.) and leather. If the state procures less grain or meat or fish the general public pays a higher price for them on the market. But if it procures less of the technical crops and leather it must itself go into the market and pay the peasants inflation prices. For the government textile and shoe factories are the chief consumers of these articles. Will the government pay the growers of the technical crops a new price above the present cooperative level or will it satisfy them by distributing sufficient quantities of commodities to them at low prices which stand in normal relationship to what they obtain for their crops? The policy has not yet crystallized itself. I am inclined to believe that Moscow will adopt the latter course and keep price standards down; the Kremlin fears further inflation.

Inflation is an excellent focal point from which the whole Soviet agricultural situation can be viewed. The Soviets will stubbornly refuse to admit in so many words the existence of inflation in the U. S. S. R. Nevertheless, the ruble is greatly depreciated and the authorities recognize this fact by selling goods in Torgsin stores and accommodations in certain hotels for foreign valuta instead of Soviet currency, and by charging either 30 cents (the par equivalent would be 60 kopeks) or 2 rubles—200 kopeks—for the same glass of coffee in the Metropole Cafe. To be sure, the distribution of goods through cooperatives has protected considerable sections of the population from all the evil effects of an enlarged circulation. But now that the cooperatives sell less and the markets more—at inflation prices—every family's budget tends to rise. One would naturally deduce, therefore, that the circumstances attendant on the new agricultural reforms will force the government to increase wages, print more paper currency, and give free rein to inflationary tendencies. Wages have been mounting steeply and so, incidentally, has the maximum salary in the Communist Party. Yet the recent decrees with all the accompanying changes should, in the end, check inflation and improve the purchasing ability of the ruble. The chief weapon of the Soviet Government against inflated currency is not fiscal manipulations or additions to the gold supply but an increase in the volume of merchandise. Indeed, most of the Bolsheviks' economic difficulties will disappear the moment the goods famine is eliminated.

The government is making heroic efforts to swell the volume of consumers' goods. This is one of the aims of the second Five-Year Plan, but before the first is finished, circumstances are compelling the Bolsheviks to reach out for the goal of the second. Foundries built to manufacture locomotives or rails are devoting part of their time and all of their scrap metal to the production of pails, anvils, nails, knives, forks, spoons, etc. Heavy industry, in other words, is coming to the assistance of the light industries which were neglected between 1928 and 1931. All light industries have increased their production appreciably this year. Small artels of artisans and even individual private artisans are being encouraged to stimulate their output. Every possible source of manufactured commodities is under official instructions to raise production. And the more goods that come to market the more prices will fall. At the same time, the government's decrees favoring collective and individual peasant trade in agricultural produce have already increased the supply of foodstuffs. Even in a bad year, when the peasant is inclined to keep the little he has for his own table, the May reforms have started a considerable flow of village products to the city. Prices, naturally, are dropping. Reduced prices of agricultural and factory foods must check inflation, because the population will need less paper money for its purchases.

City products are called upon to perform still another function: to persuade the peasant to sell. He is pleased to receive more rubles for his surplus. But if he cannot convert these rubles into goods he does not want money at all. He may boycott the new bazaars unless the state offers him its most effective inducement: goods. The order has therefore gone out from highest quarters that every available shred of factory product is to be shipped post-haste into the villages. At least 40 per cent of the output of light industry, and 80 per cent in some branches, has been earmarked for rural consumption. The cities, formerly favored by the Bolsheviks, are being denuded of goods for the sake of the countryside. Yet that which the city surrenders disappears quickly in the great Sahara of the peasant goods scarcity.

The government is the chief producer of factory goods and can, through its trusts and syndicates and through the cooperatives (all of which have revised their prices upward) distribute these goods in the villages without the intervention of a middleman. But the revival of the small independent artisans, and above all the appearance of peasant trade, provide a fertile field for private merchants and "speculators." Moreover, given the present scarcity, any article can be sold at 100 per cent profit if its purchaser is ready—and many are—to step just around the corner into the arms of another person who wants the same commodity but cannot buy it. There is a great deal of this petty speculation in the Soviet Union. In winter, when the peasant may not wish to drive into town for the sake of a few eggs or a hen or two, the function of the middleman will broaden.

The recent innovations leave the business of distribution of food products in a state of chaos. Again the most effective solution is a plentiful supply. In the meantime "bagmen" carrying food into the towns will multiply. They will not dare to open stores. The collectives are being urged to shun the "speculator" and to organize new forms of marketing. Today, each kolhoz and individual farmer comes into the city market. They may prefer the services of a "speculator." But if the village cooperative stores evolve an efficient substitute for the "bagman" and themselves engage in gathering up the village surplus (unless the village wishes to send its own representatives to the city market), the evil of surreptitious, petty private trading may be crushed, especially since these same cooperatives, as chief distributors for the state's factories, provide an excellent means of compelling the peasant to use them as his selling agency. If he speculates he will not be allowed to buy in the cooperative. A system of barter may develop.

It is too early to say whether the right to trade, recently granted anew to the peasants, will strengthen the private capitalist elements within Soviet economy. There is nothing essentially un-socialist or anti-socialist in kolhoz merchandizing. Previously, the kolhozi sold to the state which then sold to the ultimate consumer. In the future, to a greater extent than before, the kolhoz will reach the consumer directly. But if the new system is permitted to breed a class of go-betweens then, of course, private trade will have been given a fresh fillip.

The balance between the socialist and private-capitalistic factors in Soviet economy is affected by yet another change introduced by the May reforms. Communist policy now discourages the collectivization of the cattle, sheep, poultry, and truck garden which constitute the peasant's own barnyard household. Originally, when the kolhozi were formed, machinery and working animals were communized, but the less important items of the farmer's property remained his private possessions. Subsequently, however, local Bolsheviks proceeded to collectivize cows, chickens, vegetable plots, etc. The central authorities connived at their deeds. This is a charitable judgment, for ignorance of such a widespread practice would put the Soviet regime in an even worse light. At any rate, the peasants reacted to the collectivization of cattle and other animals by slaughtering them wholesale. The country witnessed a repetition of the events of 1930, when a similar move by the authorities provoked a similar extermination of livestock. Apparently, the Bolsheviks learned too little from that costly lesson. Perhaps they will take this second lesson more seriously. On paper, at least, they have strictly interdicted further collectivization within the kolhozi. If the new order is observed, the peasants will object less to the collectives.

Eighty per cent of the area sown this spring in the Soviet Union is collectivized or state farm land. This is greater progress than the most sanguine Bolshevik ever expected. I do not believe that free trading will stimulate a flight from the collectives. The kolhoz will be favored over the private peasant in the distribution of consumers' goods, and of tractors, combines, and other agricultural equipment. Assuming, as I do, that collectivized farm economy enjoys innumerable advantages over the primitive private-capitalist tilling of the Russian mujik, there can be no doubt that the peasants will themselves prefer to stay in the kolhozi, especially since the kolhozi may now grow rich through the sale of their excess products. A rich kolhoz will not be persecuted; a rich private peasant or kulak will.

The objection to Bukharin's 1925 summons to the individual peasants to "Enrich yourself" was that it threatened to create a well-to-do class of peasants whose fundamental interests would be anti-Soviet. But bolshevism does not prohibit the enrichment of socialistically organized citizens. In fact, its chief aim is the prosperity of all persons whose economic activity is not private-capitalistic. Proletarians and collectivized peasants, since they earn by working and not by exploiting, may own as much property as they can legally acquire without contravening Communist principles. Through the machine-tractor stations, through Communist members, and through the consumers' cooperatives in the village, the Soviets exercise a decisive influence on the kolhozi, and there is no danger, I think, of their becoming capitalist bulwarks.

The New Economic Policy of 1921 created a class of rich peasants, a larger class of peasants who wanted to become rich, and a considerable class of private merchants or Nepmen. Yet such was the strength of the "proletarian heights"—the foreign trade monopoly, the government ownership of industry, etc.—that private-capitalistic tendencies were reduced to insignificance in the cities beginning in 1927, and in the villages after 1929. The "proletarian heights" are today much higher and better fortified. The number of enemies on the plains is smaller. In fact, large armies have descended from the heights to occupy the plains. A reversion to capitalism is altogether unlikely.

Guesses for Sale

The Record of the Professional Forecasters

By W. H. GARFIELD

NOT the least flourishing business of the New Era was that of "investment counsel." Between 1925 and 1929, as more and more people with less and less knowledge of securities became interested in security speculation, there was an increasing demand for advice. Bond and brokerage houses would have liked to furnish it themselves, for to be both adviser and merchant is very profitable. But they, too, needed counsel. The market had become so broad that it was impossible for them to keep informed on all the issues. What was needed was the advice of experts who professed knowledge of what prices would do, as a result of devoting their full time to the study of securities, instead of part of it to selling them.

This began to be provided by the organizations already engaged in advising on business. It is true that their success in this latter field had not been conspicuous, but that only furnished more reason for trying another which promised to be more lucrative. At any rate, under their auspices a union was arranged between the brokerage-house market letter and the business forecast. The resulting offspring inherited traits from both parents. Market letters left an unmistakable imprint on the financial advisory organizations. From the other side of the family, the services took the assumption that security prices as well as business activity move in cycles.

All the leading stock market advisers—the Babson Statistical Organization, the Brookmire Economic Service, Moody's Investors Service, and the Standard Statistics Company—subscribe to the "long-pull" plan of investment. They believe that the investor makes best of his funds by placing them in stocks when business is recovering from a depression, holding these stocks (for years, if necessary) until prosperity arrives, and then selling to realize the appreciation. At least that is what they profess to believe. It sometimes seems as if the advice "hold for the long pull" means really "hold and hope that everything will come out all right in the end in spite of everything." Certainly the record of the advisory services in the last three years casts considerable doubt on their complete acceptance of the long-pull cycle theory. Buying recommendations have been numerous and frequent, but advice to sell has been conspicuous by its almost complete absence.

During 1927, 1928, and most of 1929 buying recommendations, whatever they were, were of course hugely successful. But as September 3, 1929 (the high point of the market, measured by the Dow-Jones index of industrial stocks) approached, few of the advisory services gave any evidence of realizing that the bull market was nearly over. It is true that the Babson organization, whose leading spirit had been gloomy for almost two years, headed its comment of August 19, 1929, "No Time to Buy Inflated Issues," which raises the interesting question of whether there is ever a time to buy inflated issues. Be that as it may, the organization added: "Not that we think a panic is right around the corner. We do not think so."

The same day, Standard Statistics was assuring its clients: "We do not anticipate a major setback in the general market." Two weeks before, Moody's was singing this paean of progress: "It would appear that the financial and industrial leaders of the country are imbued with extraordinary energy and conviction, each endeavoring to outdo the other in the conception and execution of gigantic projects of consolidation and development, designed to effect economies in operation and increase the productivity and wealth of our industries." The Brookmire Economic Service said, on August 26, 1929: "There is no reason yet to liquidate well-chosen stocks, although for the present new positions should be taken with great caution."

The index reached and passed 381 (the highest point on record) on September 3, without any further expressions of caution. Three weeks of declining prices which ensued failed to shake the faith of the services. They continued to recommend purchase of various issues.

By September 30 Standard Statistics seemed to sense danger and published a vigorous warning. "We would seek," it said, "to further augment cash reserves. We would go through portfolios with a fine-tooth comb and weed out all issues which are not of first-rank merit." Periods of strength were to be regarded "as opportunities for lightening loads." None of the others was similarly alarmed. Indeed, on the same date Moody's published a list of stocks to buy, advising subscribers to "take advantage of the current period of weakness to round out their list of holdings."

Prices continued to decline during October, 1929. By the 28th Standard Statistics had shifted its position: "We see no justification whatever for disposing of intrinsically meritorious issues at present levels. . . . In the case of high-grade issues . . . we see no reason why purchases should be further deferred." (In its advertising some months later Standard Statistics frequently quoted from its advice of September 30, 1929, but never, to my knowledge, from that of October 28, 1929.)

Standard was not alone in its confidence. "The time has come," the Brookmire said, "to use part of the investor's cash reserves to purchase common stocks." Moody's could "see no cause for alarm whatever for the investor." Only Babson was still skeptical. "Do not invest those liquid funds yet," he cautioned.

The next day the storm broke. Sixteen million shares changed hands in the worst panic in the history of the New York Stock Exchange. The Dow-Jones index closed 30 points lower than the day before. Moreover, in subsequent days there was little evidence of any rallying tendency. This had a sobering effect on the forecasters. Nothing seems to destroy their faith in the "long pull" like a few weeks of declining prices. By November 11, 1929, Moody's thought: "It is better to delay any buying until the situation clears." Standard Statistics suddenly found that it had been advising no buying, and said: "We continue to advise against purchases of the general run of stocks." Babson wrote that "clients should have patience and watch for the bargains which we know still lie ahead." Only Brookmire published a list of stocks to buy. On November 13, two days later, came the lowest prices of the year, with a drop in the Dow-Jones index of 11 points to 198. The initial break in the big bull market, then, caught all of the forecasting services unawares. None of them had considered it sufficiently imminent to make any attempt to have clients sell all, or even any substantial portion, of holdings. They failed in the first test.

They were allowed several other chances. Between November 13 and December 7, 1929, the index of average prices recovered 65 points to 263. In the interval all four organizations advised purchases of stocks. All four failed to take advantage of the December high to counsel sales. More than a week later Standard Statistics ventured this cautious comment: "It is now our opinion that all stocks except those which the holder is willing to carry over a period of at least six months, irrespective of intermediate fluctuations, should be disposed of." Here the exception vitiates what might have been good advice if the organization had not been so anxious to "protect itself." For who would not be willing to hold stocks for another six months if encouraged to believe that a profit could be realized in that period? And the following week the organization definitely advised "against disposing of intrinsically sound stocks."

After a recession to 230 on December 20, 1929, the Dow-Jones index advanced until, on April 17, 1930, it stood at 294, the highest point after the panic. In this interval there were several selling recommendations. Brookmire on February 3, 1930, advised "some selling now," but said, "Hold your best stocks." Standard Statistics commented on February 17: "We . . . suggest that advantage be taken of current strength to sell those issues which in comparison with others in the same category and of approximately equal merit are priced unusually high on the basis of prospective earnings for the first half of 1930." This might have been good advice, had clients been able to figure out what securities were meant.

The Babson organization gave its clients on March 3, 1930, this counsel of perfection: "Don't neglect to take good profits in stocks whenever they are available." On April 14, just before the peak was reached, it remarked: "The buyer must now be prepared for reactions and be very selective in his thinking"—the meaning of which is obscure, but which I cite because of its mention of "the buyer" rather than "the seller" to indicate the attitude. On the same date Standard Statistics said: "We would not disturb strictly long-pull commitments . . . we would, however, accept trading profits during periods of strength on a fairly liberal scale." Unfortunately just three days of strength followed.

Even after the April high point was reached, Brookmire's advised sales, once on April 28, 1930, and again on May 19, 1930. But on June 9 and June 23 they instructed clients to use some of the funds for new purchases. The index declined to 211 on June 24 and subsequently recovered to 240 on July 28. But save for the Brookmire recommendations mentioned above, no sales were suggested by any of the other advisory services. And Brookmire on July 14 advised clients to invest 5 per cent more of their funds.

During the long decline of the index from 240 on July 28, 1930, to 157 on December 16, 1930, the Brookmire service was again the only one to suggest sales. On August 11 it said: "We now believe it is advisable to work back toward the more conservative position advised in April and May," and gave a list of stocks to be sold. The Babson organization advocated the inauguration of a buying program on September 15, 1930, with the heading "Stocks will Advance this Fall," and had suggested investment of 50 per cent of the common stock fund by the end of the year. Standard Statistics, with many qualifications, advised purchases on October 14. Moody's abandoned, for the time being, buying advice and headed their November 10 comment "Tax Sales Ought Now to Be Considered." Otherwise, they warned emphatically against selling stocks held for investment. After August, 1930, the Brookmire service adopted a policy of waiting. No one suggested sales to avoid a further decline, but the market continued to go down until December.

Nor were any sales suggested on the next rally, which culminated on February 24, 1931, with the index of stock prices at 194. By that time the Babson organization had forgotten its enthusiasm of the previous fall. It solemnly assured its subscribers on February 16 that "conditions are not yet right for a stock-market boom. There is no rush, therefore, to buy good stocks." February 23 found Brookmire's saying: "We are not recommending the use of additional reserves now," although some buying had been suggested a week before. Moody's favored "buying investment stocks, just as we have done for several weeks past." Standard Statistics believed that there was "ample justification for the retention of sound equities. . . . We would strive to effect further accumulation for the next major upswing on moderate reactions."

In the valley between the February 24 peak and the lower one of 156 on June 27, 1931, only one sales recommendation was issued—by Standard Statistics. On March 30 they suggested that "at least a portion of profits accrued thus far in 1931 might well be accepted." Babson's informed clients on June 8, 1931, that "these are special buying opportunities—not a time to unload sound values. We are just as sure that we are near the latter stages of the bear market as we were sure the bull market was on its last legs two years before we sent up the danger signals in 1929." This habit of the Babson organization of being two years ahead of time has proved rather costly to its subscribers. A week later, June 15, 1931, Standard Statistics, without qualification, advised "substantial purchases of carefully selected common stocks at or near the current market."

None of the forecasters took advantage of the June 27 high to advise sales, although Moody's on June 29 wrote that "the coming months are fairly certain to see some further periods of weakness and irregularity." Brookmire's advised clients to wait for better conditions before buying, and Babson's warned against following rallies. Thus passed another opportunity to save clients a further depreciation of almost 50 per cent. For between June 27 and October 5, 1931, the Dow-Jones industrial index dropped from 156 to 86. Instead, however, of advising sales, all the organizations except Moody's (whose clients had presumably long since used all their cash in following their numerous previous buying recommendations) suggested more buying.

The Babson organization, on July 5, 1931, advised clients that 50 per cent of the common stock fund "should now be gradually invested." On August 10 Standard Statistics fell in line with the comment: "Any further important weakness will constitute another real opportunity to accumulate desired issues for long-term holding." Reassured, Babson's came out on August 17, 1931, with the following confident statement: "This is no time for fear concerning any stock which is fundamentally sound. The market will gather strength this fall. Prices should be higher." Brookmire's on August 24 said: "Use one-half of your cash buying power for the purchase of common stocks now."

But on October 5, when the market reached its nadir, Standard Statistics said: "We have no hesitancy in continuing to advocate that investors still maintain adequate cash reserves." The Brookmire service deemed it "the part of conservatism to defer additional purchases of common stocks." Moody's recommended that "liquid positions now held by clients be maintained," without explaining how those liquid positions had been achieved. Only the Babson organization was still confident. It headed its advice "Buy—Don't Sell," and urged clients "to take advantage of these convulsively low prices."

As prices started their next ascent, Standard Statistics followed suit. "Without essential qualification," they said on October 13, 1931, "we recommended a substantial further step in the common-stock accumulation program," and published a list of stocks to buy. Brookmire and Moody maintained their position unchanged.

On November 9, 1931, the index of industrial stock prices reached 116.79, an advance of 30 points, or more than 35 per cent, in little more than a month. Here were potential profits to be cashed by Babson and Standard Statistics clients. But that date found none of the services suggesting sales. Standard Statistics thought that "good common stocks . . . are cheap in the long-term viewpoint." Babson was cautioning new clients to "buy only on weak spots." The Brookmire service advised "clients to maintain reserve buying power for use at a later date," but said nothing about liquidation of the holdings bought in August. Moody's declined to recommend the purchase of stocks, but also failed to suggest sales. The idea that profits can be made by purchases alone still persisted!

Nor did any of the advisers suggest disposal of holdings as the index of prices descended to a new low of 71.24 on January 5, 1932, and recovered to 88.78 on March 8, 1932. Throughout that period Moody's and Brookmire's continued to advise against purchase, keeping cautiously silent about sales. Babson advised additional placement of 10 per cent of the common-stock funds on November 30, 1931, and maintained this bullish position up to the next peak. Standard Statistics began recommending purchases on January 18, 1932, again and continued optimistic through February.

March 8, 1932, was the last conspicuous opportunity the organizations have had, to date, to save money for subscribers by sale of securities. Had any of them taken full advantage of it they would, even though almost two and a half years late, have saved their clients a further depreciation of more than 50 per cent. For between March 8 and July 8, 1932, the Dow-Jones index of industrial stock prices dropped from 88.78 to 41.22. Instead, none of them suggested sales of any stocks, Babson suggesting purchases on April 18, April 25, May 16, and June 10, and Standard Statistics issuing buying recommendations on June 6 and June 13.

July 8 found Brookmire and Moody still pessimistic, definitely advising against purchases. Standard Statistics was less gloomy, and Babson was openly hopeful, but even they did not suggest purchases. Not until August 1, after the index of industrial stocks had advanced 33 per cent did they scrape up enough courage to say "buy." Moody's climbed on the bandwagon August 8, leaving only Brookmire advising against purchases.

Thus we bring to a close our survey of forecasters who could not forecast. Having missed the opportunity to have their clients cash in on their profits before the market crash of 1929, they had at least seven subsequent major chances to save money for them by advising complete withdrawal from the market. Not one of these chances was used to the full by any of the organizations. Most of them were completely ignored. Instead, they plunged investors in deeper and deeper with more and more buying recommendations. And then, when the market did turn, they were three weeks late in realizing it.

One can surely find in this record sufficient justification for the irony of Lawrence Dennis: "Thus far, economic forecasters have proved that there are just two ways of making money out of guesses about the economic future. The first way is to sell the guesses to subscribers." For investment advice is expensive. The Standard Trade and Securities Service costs $180 a year, Moody's Investment Letter service costs $150, Babson's financial service costs $120, and the Brookmire Analyst, $60. These are the publications from which I have quoted in this article. It is a curious fact that the record of accuracy appears to have little relation to the cost of the service; if anything, the cheapest service of the four has a little the edge on the others. And it is an open question whether even that has been worth its cost. Would not the average investor, unaided, have done better by following his instinct not to buy on a declining market?

Certainly the foregoing summary can hardly be read as anything but a record of failure. It naturally raises the question why organizations presumably so well equipped for economic research and forecasting should fail so miserably at it. For one thing, until the last three years the difficulty of the task was enormously under-estimated. Despite the advance of statistical technique, the multiplication of available figures, and the development of forecasting practice, economics has not yet, to put it mildly, become an exact science. Even assuming that any one of the organizations could appraise the technical and statistical factors in a given situation correctly, it would not necessarily lead to a correct forecast of what would happen. For the "human element" must still be included, and what a human being will do in any given situation is never entirely certain. Secondly, of the organizations considered, only one has worked out a definite theory of forecasting which it still uses. And the Babson method of forecasting has been for years subject to severe criticisms by students of the subject. The others work on a basis that is but a shade removed from guess and intuition. Thirdly, none of the advisory services, to my knowledge, takes the trouble to keep an objective record of its own batting average. That might be sobering.

The Mexican Return

By ROBERT N. McLEAN

THE train was ready to go. Hand upon throttle, the engineer leaned from his cab. Behind him were ten plush-upholstered day coaches, loaded with six hundred Mexicans who were "going home." The windows were filled with brown faces, some sad, some eager; along the sides of the cars were little groups of county relief agents and workers from various churches and community houses, who under one pretext or another had succeeded in crashing the gates. Outside, a massed wall of humanity pressed against the iron fence. For one who was going, ten had come to say goodbye. It was just like the other trains which had been leaving Los Angeles on Thursday mornings—like the others but different, because inside the red-plush coaches were different people with different stories of suffering, hunger, and heartache. "All aboard!" sang the conductor, and the train began to move out of the station. As one car rolled by, a mother was seen comforting a little girl of about ten. And then these words, spoken in perfect English, floated through the window: "I don't want to go to Mexico! All my friends are in Brooklyn Avenue school, and I want to stay here!" But the train gathered momentum and swept out of the yards.

The press has had much to say during the past few months about the Mexicans who have gone home, but little has been said about the thousands of United States citizens who have been carried away by their parents to a land which they have never seen. Nor have we faced the fact that many of the parents who are taking these United States-born children out of the country, have been here so long that in their habits and ways of living they are far more "American" than Mexican.

The Mexican labor invasion of the United States—and the subsequent return—is one of the largest and most interesting racial movements in all history. In a time of economic stress such as the present we lose all sense of perspective. We forget why the Mexican came and why he has tarried so long, and we are blind to the injustices which are forcibly uprooting him from communities where he has cast his lot, built his home, and begotten his children. All we can see at such a moment as this is bread lines. And men of dark complexion are holding jobs which "white" men ought to have.

In August of 1931 a new law went into effect in California which makes it practically impossible for a contractor to employ Mexicans upon a public job. That, of course, means the bulk of the cement work and the work with pick and shovel—jobs which have been the recognized portion of the Mexicans for a dozen years. Even if the law permitted the employment of the "bronze" laborer, so strong is the social pressure now being exerted that few employers would care to defy it. At least one paving concern has temporarily gone out of business because it cannot carry on without Mexicans and the law will not permit them to be used. In one California community a contractor took refuge in the town hall in order to escape from a mob infuriated because he was using Mexican labor.

Even in times of economic strain and stress the foreign laborer is entitled to a square deal. Back of the lines of race and blood there are certain facts which merit consideration. The Mexican laborer came to this country to render a particular contribution at a time of particular need. The war depleted for a time our labor supply, while speeding up our industries. We had less labor and we needed more. Bursting shells on the fields of France proclaimed copper king. The large companies operating in southeastern Arizona, the greatest copper-producing district of the world, worked their mines to the utmost, leasing mineral land they could not work to other operators. Mexicans poured into Bisbee, Douglas, Miami, Globe, Ray, Jerome, and Morceni, and have been there ever since. At about the same time large areas of new citrus plantings began to come into bearing, and Mexicans by the thousand came to California to pick oranges. It was of prime importance during the war that transportation should not be interrupted, and Mexicans came over to man the section gangs and tamp the ties. Mexicans have been tamping ties on the railroads of the Southwest ever since, and have spread out along other lines into the North and East. The Mexican laborer came because we invited him and because we could not get along without him.

But it might be thought that after the national emergency was passed and our soldiers had returned from France, the Mexicans could have gone home. Not so. A number of new factors conspired not only to hold here the Mexicans already arrived, but to draw hundreds of thousands of their friends and relatives. First must be mentioned the new irrigation projects. The Roosevelt dam, the Elephant Butte, the Yuma project, the extension of the ditches in the Imperial Valley—all brought vast new acreages under cultivation. The lower Rio Grande valley almost overnight changed from a desert into a garden, and hands beckoned across the river for help to work the crops. The Salt River valley of Arizona, feeling the miraculous touch of water, grew long-staple cotton and called for Mexicans to pick it. When the bottom fell out of the cotton market, the growers quickly switched to lettuce and kept their Mexicans to "chop" it. In the Imperial Valley of California the lettuce acreage grew, until last season a total of eleven thousand cars rolled out of the valley to Eastern markets. Vying with lettuce, cantaloupes demanded Mexican labor, and during last May and June it took 21,400 cars to haul the melons to our breakfast tables. There is a common impression abroad that one American can do the work of three Mexicans. But no race can compete with the Mexicans in picking cantaloupes. Even the Japanese employ them, and the growers say that only a Mexican seems to have that sixth sense which tells when a cantaloupe is ready for the crate.

During the time of our agricultural expansion, the growers of oranges, grapes, cotton, melons, and winter vegetables not only invited the Mexicans, but even bid actively and acrimoniously among themselves for the amount of Mexican labor which was available. And whenever anyone suggested that the supply was beginning to exceed the demand and that perhaps society was paying a stiff price for its Mexican labor in the social costs involved, the growers sped their representatives to Washington to lobby against the various bills which were successively introduced to put Mexico upon a quota basis.

One cannot say or write anything about the Southwest without eventually bumping up against the fact that Los Angeles has grown. But while it grew from a city of less than half a million at the close of the war to over a million in 1930, it was compelled to build new houses and school buildings, lay new sewers and water mains, and pave hundreds of miles of new streets. Often it was in such a hurry about it that the streets were paved before the sewers were laid, but the work had to be done in a hurry and Mexicans did it. While the Mexican laborer was needed in both agriculture and industry, we were glad to have him hold the job in which he was employed. We were perfectly willing that he should do our dirty work for us. We became "labor conscious." We developed the phrase "the work no white man will do"! Americans could not stand the heat of the desert, and so Mexicans tamped the ties and built the bridges.

Americans would not pick cotton—unless they were "cheap white trash"—and so the Mexicans did it. Americans would not labor in the heat with pick and shovel, and so Mexicans speedily filled the ranks of all the labor gangs. Americans would not "chop" lettuce all morning and then spend all afternoon trying to find out whether it was the grower or the contractor who was supposed to pay them. And so it was the Mexican laborers who jumped on the trucks at dawn and drove out to the lettuce fields to chop until noon. We developed a racial superiority toward certain types of labor, which came to be thought of as Mexican jobs. Thus the "bronze" man became the hewer of wood and the drawer of water in the Southwest. Simultaneously the large employers contrived to maintain the labor reservoir at a high level. It paid to keep the Mexicans both numerous and hungry.

Some day, perhaps, somebody with a flare for statistics will try to evaluate the contribution which the Mexican laborer has rendered in the building of an empire in the Southwest. He has done all the common work on practically every one of California's two hundred crops. He has maintained the lines of transportation. Every industry has been dependent upon him. And as is always the case with the common laborer, he has put much in and taken little out. Today, under the strain of economic adversity, we forget that during these years the Mexican has become part of our community life. We forget that his children have been born here and educated in our schools. We forget that he has given his best years to our industries and in doing so has forfeited his place in his own land. We forget that by the sweat of his brow he has earned a place in our economic life. We are sending him home. There is little gratitude in our hearts.

But the most amusing thing about it all—amusing were it not so tragic—is the attitude taken by our own border immigration service toward this army of Mexican laborers. When we needed them we forgot our own laws, closing our eyes while Mexicans crossed the line. There were not enough men to patrol the border, there were no funds for deportation, and anyway the crops were perishing for want of pickers. As one official said, "I just have to shut my eyes to keep from crowding them off the sidewalk when I come down to work in the morning." It has been estimated that seven out of ten who came over between 1919 and 1929 came illegally; and most of them found it so easy to come that they are unconscious of any wrongdoing. Hundreds say naively: "I just crossed the bridge and nobody asked me any questions." Now the line is practically closed to the common laborer, and our reinforced border patrol, with plenty of money for deportations, is running up and down roads stopping Mexicans and asking dramatically: "How in the world did you get across the line?" And unless they can prove a legal domicile they are deported or told that they will be deported if they do not go of their own accord. In all this we have done little law-making. We have, indeed, armed our border service with a new law which makes it a felony for a foreigner to enter illegally. Otherwise our laws are as they were. They have been changed only by interpretation. But always more laws have been made by interpretation than by legislation.

Briefly, then, the Mexicans who are going home may be divided into five classes. First, there are those who are being deported—and Mexican deportations have reached as high as half of all those in the country. Second, there are those who are going because they have been told they will be deported unless they go voluntarily. Third, there is the great class made up of those who know they are here illegally, and who tremble every time there is a knock at the door or an American speaks to them upon the street. Composing the fourth class are those whose way is being paid to the border by county relief agencies, which often make their grants of relief dependent upon the promise to return to Mexico at some later date. And the fifth class is made up of those who have long been out of work, and having sacrificed their homes for a fraction of what they are worth, are using the proceeds to go back to Mexico in the hope that things may be a little better and in the conviction that they cannot be any worse. During the first ten months of 1931 the number returning to Mexico outnumbered those entering the United States by 75,337.

Just what effect will this mass movement have upon the Southwest? And what will be its effect upon Mexico? Nobody expects the present depression to last forever. And when it is over the "white" man who has wrenched the pick and the shovel from the hands of the Mexican laborer, in order to drive the wolf from the door, will drop them and turn to other pursuits. Again there will be "work no white man will do." And when that time comes, unless we are willing to let our crops rot in the fields, we shall either beg the Mexicans to come back or import Negroes, Filipinos, and Porto Ricans. We shall find then that we have exiled both producers and consumers. And what about Mexico? Is anyone so simple as to believe in this period of world depression that Mexico is able to absorb an army of new laborers every month? What are they doing? What of the man who barefoot and with his belongings done up in a blanket left his ancestral village ten years ago—a village where life moves placidly along as it did in the seventeenth century? When he returns driving a second-hand car, will he drop back quietly into the niche from which he came? And if not, into what niche will he fit? What will the Americanized Mexican do to Mexico?

Civilization and the Poet

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

“THE world,” said Emerson, “seems to be always awaiting its poet,” and though the saying is a true one we are, perhaps, not wrong in supposing that the need of our particular world for “its poet” is more than usually acute. Emerson certainly intended the term to be taken in its widest significance to mean the possessor of one of those articulate imaginations which can communicate a sense that the world of our experience has a unity and meaning, and it is certainly just from the absence of any such sense that we suffer. Our best writers of verse themselves define rather than triumph over the prevailing mood produced by the feeling that we are lost in a meaningless chaos. But the phenomenon is not merely literary and we lack a satisfactory life for the same reasons that we lack our comprehensive poet. Poems and civilization are alike the result of affirmations sweeping enough to make form out of what seems confusion.

Nor is this analogy between the kind of affirmation which makes poems and the kind which makes civilizations merely an analogy. The poem and the civilization are parallel phenomena—one occurring in the realm of thought and the other in the realm of action, but each the result of some passionate faith inclusive enough to give form either to living or to contemplation. Each implies an imagination powerful enough to interpret in humanly usable terms the data present in the consciousness, but each implies also that these data shall be capable of such interpretation; and the first question which inevitably arises in connection with contemporary conditions is the question whether or not the data of the contemporary consciousness is susceptible of such a humanly usable interpretation.

It has long been suspected—justly or not—that an “Iliad” was easier to write in the year 1000 B. C. than it would be today. The anthropomorphic religion and the naive patriotism of the primitive Greeks were in themselves so simply human, so in harmony with instinctive human thought and behavior, that they made easily possible the attempt to see human life as ample, significant, and harmonious. But this religion and this patriotism were themselves possible only because these primitive Greeks knew so little of nature that they could construct a universe made almost exclusively from the materials which they found in themselves and could people it with gods made in their own image. Since their time, knowledge has been constantly busy with the criticism of every structure erected by the human mind. It has been posing ever more difficult problems to the imagination which would arrange that knowledge into a humanly satisfactory pattern, until men have begun at last to wonder whether or not any imagination is equal to the task, whether we have not been overwhelmed by knowledge (or what seems like knowledge) and compelled to witness a triumph of Nature over Art.

Many of the data which the imagination has found it so difficult to find a place for in any humanly useful conception of the universe as a whole are, of course, scientific. The pattern into which we have arranged what we know of nature is obviously incompatible with those conceptions of man’s place in it which underlie some of the noblest poems as well as some of the noblest civilizations. Science has also encouraged certain tendencies of thought which increase the difficulty since it has promoted, for example, a general distrust of the validity of spontaneous conviction and a tendency to seek out the prejudice behind what seems to us at first sight our most inevitable affirmations. But it would be a mistake to suppose that all knowledge of the sort which makes epic poetry or epic culture difficult has been the result of scientific thought.

The artist himself, hardly less than the scientist, has peered into many dark and unlovely corners. He too has the passion, perhaps ultimately fatal, for knowing; and that passion has led him on, horribly fascinated, from discovery to discovery. Hence the satirist and the realist, no less than the astronomer and the biologist, stand between us and any Homeric conception of the world amidst which we live. Zola, Baudelaire, and Ibsen; Gissing, Hardy, and Dostoevski—these men, hardly less than Darwin and Freud, have disillusioned mankind with the universe and with itself. Though perhaps none of them actually discovered anything, all called our attention to much and made it an inescapable part of our consciousness. Doubtless there are, in all their works, few ugly facts which Shakespeare did not in some sense know. But there was a meanness in human nature and a sordidness in human fate which he could somehow disregard, which he could blithely ignore in a fashion no longer so easy. This meanness and this sordidness have been examined with a care and described with a force which rendered them no longer negligible. Art has acknowledged them; and for that reason they have become, not merely facts, but facts which have taken their place solidly in the human consciousness.

For this reason, also, they must be dealt with, and any imagination which proposes itself as competent to make art out of the modern world must find a place for them, whether the work which it is endeavoring to create be literary or social. There is no golden age of faith, of simplicity, or of ignorance to which we can return—unless, indeed, society as we know it should suffer some overwhelming catastrophe which would break the whole continuity of its development and return the few straggling survivors to savagery. Those eccentric converts to fifth-century paganism, thirteenth-century Catholicism, and seventeenth-century Anglicanism, who propose to live and write as though they were in the heyday of the culture which they have chosen, are mere refugees whom few will follow.

Few would seek to deny that modern life has its compensations, or that many of the experiences peculiar to it are delightful. The very sense of freedom associated with it, even the sense of having escaped the restrictions and the burdens which convictions impose, seems sometimes more than enough to compensate for any losses entailed. But few would refuse also to admit the curiously disjointed or fragmentary character of this life. Whole sections of our experience, both pleasurable and the reverse, seem not only unconnected with one another, but positively incompatible. Some—like those which arise out of the cultivation of romantic love, of honor, and of our personal integrity—are apparently survivals from a world already dying; others—like those connected with power and speed and freedom, with our plunge into the material richness of the modern world—seem to give us hints of a way of life still imperfectly organized and imperfectly understood; but these two classes of goods are mingled without being combined.

The very cynics, whose documented relativism mocks any attempt to spell Duty or Justice or Right with a capital letter find themselves passionately devoted to defending Communist victims of police clubs or denouncing the Society for Suppression of Vice with bursts of oratory whose appeal is wholly moral. Lovers who rediscover the value of those illusions which are very old nevertheless change mistresses or wives with a facility which is very new and seem determined to live several lives for the very reason that they are incapable of leading one. Even humanitarianism, perhaps the most characteristic of our attempts to live nobly, does not dare to examine the foundations upon which it rests for it is devoted to the task of saving human lives without being really sure that human lives are worth saving.

What appears to be lacking is any logical or even any emotional connection between our various motives, various beliefs, and various impulses; any sense that they are a part of one whole or that they could be put together in any fashion which we enable them to reinforce one another. We are overwhelmed, not only by the diversity of knowledge, but also by the diversity of possible deeds, of possible values, and of possible judgments. Such artists as we have offer us constructions whose essential deficiencies arise out of the fact, not that they are artificial or partial, but that this artificiality or this partiality is so glaringly, so unforgettably evident. And if we babble of the necessity of seeing life steadily and seeing it whole we babble without conviction because we are struck by the fear that the more steadily we see it the less will it appear to be any whole which we can comprehend.

We may realize that the wholeness which seemed to characterize certain previous philosophies or civilizations was illusory, and that the connections between the parts of any previous peoples' experience were purely imaginary connections whose existence was merely assumed. But that realization does not help us very much because it is the inability to imagine or assume any such connections for ourselves which constitutes the difficulty and we do not know even where or how we ought to begin.

But let us grant that art, in the broad sense in which it has here been defined, is still possible; that the apparent triumph of diverse and alien nature is only temporary. Let us assume, that is to say, that a modern world, complete and unified, will emerge. Is that world close enough for us to imagine, even vaguely, what it would be like?

Certainly the prophets who proclaim its coming differ widely enough among themselves, but probably the most polite and respectable among them are those who assure us that civilization is not to be remade but only salvaged and that the new world will be more like the world of the past than the world of this present. Some of them, like Mr. Chesterton, are sure that if only beer flowed as freely as it once did in Merrie England we should all very happily put our trust in the Pope and all would be well again. Others, like Professor Millikan, have faith in telescopes and confidently expect that we shall some day construct one which will discover the ten commandments written in letters of fire a hundred thousand light years away. But they agree in the essential, which is that we need only to recover a few principles which we have lost in order to get along very nicely in the world we now know. But polite and reasonable as these prophets seem, there is, nevertheless, something singularly tame about their gospels, something plaintive and elegiac about their pleading, something which seems hardly adequate to influence very effectively a world which may not know where it is going but which is certainly going somewhere under the force of impulses not to be controlled by the pious suggestions of frightened respectability. The men who speak most earnestly of the claims of authority are the very ones whose voices most conspicuously lack its ring and it is, paradoxically, those who tell everyone to do as he likes who have achieved the largest following. If leadership is to be recognized by the confidence with which it asserts itself, if art is to be known by the power and the persuasiveness we feel before we can analyze, then the beginnings of the new world which may be forming are to be sought among those who are concerned with nothing less than with mere conversation.

Wherever this world of ours competes directly with the past, it loses. Its religions are anemic and foolish; its poems and its pictures often seem to be trivial and feeble; just in so far as their aims and methods are identical with those of the past. But in certain other activities it exhibits a competence which seems, in comparison with previous efforts in the same field, as nearly superhuman as the competence of Shakespeare seems superhuman in comparison with the efforts of our contemporaries to write tragedy in blank verse. Its instruments for measuring the stars, its machines for hurtling through space, are successful beyond the wildest dreams of previous ages; and the most significant thing about them is not that badly articulated or rationalized faith in their importance which is sometimes expressed by philosophers or humanitarians, but that passionate and implicit faith in the immediate, unassailable value in the thing itself which made them possible.

Whatever else we may say of it, we know that the ecstasy of the pilot is authentic and that it is communicated unreasonably to society. Crowds carry trans-Atlantic fliers in triumph from the field just as crowds are said to have carried Cimabue's Virgin in triumph through the streets of Florence; and each crowd acts for the same reason—because it has recognized a kind of achievement which it can understand. The world is not interested in machines because they save labor or because they increase production. These are the excuses which it makes to itself. It is interested because it is interested, because its heart is there. Concerning them it has made one of those affirmations which really count because the affirmation was made spontaneously and does not need to be defended. In that case the will to believe did not explain its rights; it believed.

Even those of us who are, by temperament and education, most attached to values of another sort and, for that reason, least capable of feeling what many of our contemporaries feel, catch at moments some hint of it. We drive in their cars, fly in their aeroplanes, and live in their cities. We are caught up by this world, gasp with its excitements, and, by moments, we too, forget the other world to which in quieter moments we feel that we belong. But we cannot completely identify ourselves with the representatives of the present. The very inarticulateness of their philosophy, of their poetry, if you will, baffles us. The world of speed and power and exactitude in which they live is a world which still exists only upon the periphery of the consciousness. It is known chiefly through instincts and reflexes, not through ideas. It is, in other words, a world not yet given form by art, a world which has been directly experienced but never successfully thought out. Since no symbols have been found for its aims or its joys it cannot be substituted for—it cannot even take its place beside—those worlds which have a different kind of existence in the consciousness because they have been symbolized and interpreted in terms appropriate to that consciousness. Yet the materials may possibly be there. Art has, in the past, many times revealed to mankind perceptions, emotions, and valuations of which it had not known itself capable.

No one can say beforehand whether or not the new interests and the new ecstasies are capable of being thus humanized. Certainly it is difficult to conceive any connection between them and those which a Shakespeare celebrated. Certainly they seem less outgrowths of previous interests than something radically different, and it may be that they are entirely inexpressible in terms similar to those which literature uses. Perhaps the tendency of the plastic arts to abandon the imitation of nature for pure geometry is merely one relatively comprehensible sign of a break with tradition which is destined to be more complete than even the most extravagant of the "post-," "neo-," or "sur-" schools can imagine. Perhaps the wildest eccentricities of the "modern" poets may be taken as evidence either that poetry is beginning to grapple with the problem or that it is disintegrating under the realization that the problem is not capable of being grappled with.

But in any event there is no escaping the fact that much of the old world has grown dim. The academicians who plead for standards in art, the versifiers who talk of taste in poetry, the moralists who plead that we still can believe what our fathers did—there is not one of them whose voice has more than a spectral quality. Even those who believe them righter than their opponents must confess that the conservators are, at least, no match for those who do not bother even to answer. Vitality is all on the other side and those of us who confess our inability to accept the modern world without reservation or to say what can ultimately be made of it, do feel sure, nevertheless, that vitality of some sort is as indispensable to art as it is to life; and we shall take courage again when we find somewhere some evidence that the values which are dearest to us can be affirmed with a passion equal to that with which scientists, technicians, and mere sportsmen daily make the affirmations by which they live.

It is only in the sense which has been here implied that there can be any meaning to the statement that life is art and that aesthetics can take the place left vacant by religion and morality. To say that is to say only that one work of art may be replaced by another; but the other must still be found. Some unified aim, some hierarchy of values, some sense that something is supremely worth-while, must impose itself upon us with a self-justifying inevitability.

What we seem to have is an embarrassing profusion of almost equally unsatisfactory possibilities. What we lack among the advocates of each is an imagination strong enough to make that possibility seem inevitable. Nor is it, so long as this is true, worth-while to affirm any abstract faith in art. If love and honor and duty can be salvaged then someone must write about them in a fashion which carries conviction. If we are to get along without them, then someone must describe a world from which they are absent in a fashion which makes that world seem still worth the having. And it is just its failure to do either of these things quite adequately which reveals the weakness of contemporary literature.

This latter has enjoyed, at moments, its triumphs of honesty and accuracy. It has even, at moments also, transcended these virtues in order to achieve beauty—that quality which we attribute to anything when it makes reality seem identical with desire and convinces us that what ought to be is the same as what is. But contemporary literature is too fragmentary and too varied to rank among the supremely great literatures, much less to assume unaided a task which the literatures of other times could perform only with the help of philosophy and religion. It is—like ourselves—doubtful, divided, eclectic, and experimental. It has never succeeded in making us believe anything wholeheartedly or for long. It has given us no self-justifying image because its creators have achieved no self-justifying vision.

We know that this world of ours is interesting. The very vividness of its never-failing stimuli and the very richness of the possibilities which it is continually suggesting, make us unwilling to sacrifice any one of them. Even its distresses are so exciting that we are not convinced by those who long for a return to the good old days and none of the unities which have been proposed seem to include enough. What we long for is the ability to function in this complicated world as easily and as freely as others seem to have functioned in a simpler one; to find life, not merely exciting, but satisfactory and meaningful as well. We want to see it whole but we want also to see it all; to find a name for every one of its sensations, an explanation for every one of its phenomena, and a justification for every one of its values. We want a philosophy which is more than merely cold and reasonable, a philosophy whose ultimate expression is one of those works of art which seem not only to sum up but also to justify a civilization.

Perhaps some of these desires are incompatible with others. Perhaps all satisfactory affirmations are partial, and perhaps they seem satisfactory only because they make us forget what they are not able to include. But if this is so, the very fact that we are not able to forget anything about the world in which we live is proof that such an affirmation has not been made. And, at least until it has, we shall continue to long for some attitude which would unify the modern consciousness without depriving us of any of those fragmentary goods which it affords. Only one thing is certain. We shall know what artist we ought to accept when we find ourselves accepting him and we shall know what authority ought to be obeyed when we find ourselves obeying it. Life may be an art—but only when it is characterized by art's spontaneous inevitability.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter recently spent part of a Sunday visiting a woman who, it seems to him, has gone far toward solving the problem of living—except that she does not drift. Drifting, after all, is the best part of life. The Drifter admits gladly the fascination of the soil; he yields to none in his adoration of the New England countryside, and his heart yearns for many beauty spots. But though he has been tempted to settle, like a former New York woman school teacher he knows, right at the base of the Tetons and live all by himself the year round, as she does, he knows that he has drifted too long for this to be possible. To return, however, to the woman whom he saw the other day. She lives on a Connecticut hilltop in a little old farmhouse well on into its second century, with the old red paint still on it, a single carefully centered chimney, and the old clapboards falling off here and there. The owner lived for years in the great city, where her profession carried her into the homes of the wealthy. Then there came a day when her health made outdoor life necessary and all by herself she picked the little old red house with its huge maples. Nearby is a glorious view; one could fancy oneself in Wyoming, for one can look and look and see no sign of habitation, and the hills are wild and rugged.

AS the years have passed, the Drifter's friend, especially lately, has felt the pinch of the times. No longer is she able to spend the three bitterest winter months in the city, and more important than ever is the need of getting some dollars out of the little nursery and the flower garden which she cultivates so assiduously. She has no car, no horse and wagon. Her faithful friend and only companion is the dog that guards her. Together they pass winter and summer, with the telephone to call friendly neighbors through whose help there come the necessary provisions from the nearby town. But the doctor, the Drifter believes, has not been called in years, for life in that garden on that lovely hilltop has brought energy and strength and health. Lovely white hair surmounts cheeks of a ruddy hue which any flapper ought to envy, if flappers did not believe in the superiority of hand-painted complexions. "I find," she says, "that I can do physical labor, now that I have to, that I never dreamed was within my power." She has now come to a system of barter, and that, she says, is characteristic of the community round about her under the stress of Hoover prosperity. She gives trees for firewood to townspeople out of work in return for their labor. One farming neighbor has carried off a tumbledown carriage house with some very old lumber in it in return for many hours of work carefully computed by both. Three men who have helped her by the exchange of labor for wood are living with a fourth and his mother—thus have the workless doubled up to pool their scant resources and labor and to wait for the coming of the promised two-car garage.

SO there this tiller of the soil dwells the year round—radiantly happy, content, always ready to remind you that others are far worse off financially than she and finding her enforced habitation anything but exile or punishment.

The beauty of the changing seasons never loses its appeal, the bird life, the occasional animals that stray into her domain—the Drifter ran across a gay old fox nearby—the sunsets, the radiance of the sky by day and by night, all these fulfil and satisfy. But above all, there is the work in the garden itself to prove anew that the nearer to the actual soil, the richer the life. This tiller does not even feel the need of a radio and the movies know her not. The Drifter feels that there are few whom he knows who have won such happiness for themselves, unaided and with such dauntless courage. He always finds inspiration when he enters that house or sees that sturdy figure at work in the garden. Always for a moment he swears that he, too, will find a lonely hilltop in New England and then he remembers, with a start, that after all, he is and must be until the end

THE DRIFTER.

Correspondence

Sidney Hook's Rejoinder

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a review of Mr. Briffault's "Breakdown" in The Nation of June 8, I wrote:

To be sure, the direction of scientific research and the uses to which its discoveries are put are dependent upon the larger, telic, social whole of which science is a part. But the meaning and validity of a scientific proposition are completely independent of whether science functions in a capitalist or Communist order.

In his letter to The Nation in the issue of July 13, Mr. Ashley-Montagu quotes only the second of the two sentences given above and then adds:

This statement is typical of many made by Mr. Hook in his review, and like them it is entirely untrue. If Mr. Hook is not philosopher enough to be aware of this, then he is not worth arguing with. What really matters, it seems to me, about the validity of a scientific proposition is not so much the name of the State in which it has been determined as that it shall gain acceptance. Does Mr. Hook really believe that the willingness with which scientific propositions are accepted is independent of the form of the society in which they are proposed?

Whatever may be the case in the social disciplines which have a class axis, it is clear that the propositions of physical science and mathematics, in so far as their meaning and validity are concerned, cannot be affected by a change in the mode of economic production. That people should be interested in science at all is a function of the social order in which they live. But granted that they are interested in science, the truth of the propositions they then discover no longer depends upon them or their interest, but upon the objective structure of the physical world. Socially we can only explain why the teaching of the proposition, "the earth moves and is not the center of the universe," was proscribed in the past and why it can be taught today. Surely, Mr. Ashley-Montagu will not maintain that the movement of the earth is affected by the change from one society to another. Let him recall the words of Galileo and make the proper substitutions:

In these and other positions certainly no man doubts but His Holiness the Pope hath always an absolute power of admitting or condemning them; but it is not in the power of any creature to make them to be true or false, or otherwise than of their own nature and in fact they are.

In this connection I wish to observe that even propositions of historical fact in anthropology and sociology (i. e., those which do not involve value judgments) have an objective validity independent of the social purposes for which they are used. I do not believe, however, that a hypothetico-deductive social science is possible.

Both Mr. Ashley-Montagu and Nelson Morris have failed to appreciate that the dialectical approach to the question of culture consists in realizing that, even if we would, we could not build a new culture in complete disregard of the old. Whoever affects a sophisticated barbarism and in the name of communism talks as if it heralded the destruction of all the art and science of the past, is, objectively considered, playing the role of a cultural agent-provocateur.

I cannot see the relevance of Mr. Briffault's rejoinder to the points I made in my review of his book. Nor do I feel that the question of my "unamiable" personality has the slightest bearing upon their validity. It was not Mr. Briffault's sincerity I impugned but his logic. I had even hoped that he would be convinced that he had overstated his position. I am consequently all the more disappointed that he should have seen fit to drag in a red herring about my being inspired by sympathy with the Communist Party "to attack those radical thinkers who are most in accord with its aims but who are not members of the party." In justice to the Communist Party and the readers of The Nation I wish to state that I am not a member of the Communist Party and that I do not know whether my views would be indorsed by it. None the less, I believe my views to be in conformity with the Marxist philosophy. What is more important, I believe them to be true.

New York, July 13

SIDNEY HOOK

Edward Levinson and the New Leader

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As editor of the New Leader I protest against your editorial in the issue of July 13 regarding the dismissal of Edward Levinson from its staff. The assertion that Mr. Levinson was "summarily dismissed" is absurd, considering that he had been under fire by members of the board of directors for more than a year.

In the complaint I made I did not even mention his article in The Nation to which you refer although two other members did. If the New Leader has not published the few "letters of protest" received against Mr. Levinson's dismissal, neither has it published the many other statements received approving the action taken.

New York, July 18

JAMES ONEAL

Is It a Futile Gesture?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Running on a noncommittal platform in 1928, Al Smith gave you pause; in 1932 you cannot brook Roosevelt although his party platform is distinctly superior to that of 1928. What is this if not that choice of men rather than measures to which you object in theory?

As for supporting Norman Thomas, you indeed put the liberal in a difficult position. Were the Socialist candidate in the position of parliamentary leader of a minority party striving to gain control as in France or England, all those who agree with him would have no difficulty in voting effectively. In this country, however, a vote for Thomas will be only a vote of protest. He will no doubt conduct an intelligent and vigorous campaign on a better platform than that of either of the two old parties, and he will probably poll a larger vote than he did in 1928. But he will have no direct voice in the government, even as leader of an opposition group, and all of the energy expended in his behalf will be wasted in so far as immediate practical results are concerned. I am altogether in favor of a campaign by the Socialists to gain some foothold in Congress, but I cannot understand why any small minority party should put up a candidate for the Presidency. To do so is to ignore the realities of our cumbersome political system and to seek to plant the capstone in air before the foundation has been laid. Surely a campaign of education in Socialist principles need not depend upon such a futile gesture.

Canyon City, Ore., July 24

ARTHUR C. HICKS

"Dishonest Propaganda"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial, Is It to be Murder? is typical of a man who lives in the foreign city of New York. It is either the product of a twisted mentality or for the purpose of dishonest propaganda. You could not afford to print all the facts as to the communistic or criminal character of the ring leaders in the Washington disturbance, nor the fact that the man who did the shooting acted in self-defense when these men attacked him with bricks in their hands.

You would evidently be satisfied with further unrest which you rather encourage in your writings. It is typical of your writers, who have never accomplished anything, that you have the egotism to tell really able men how to do it.

You are professional disturbers with the purpose of earning dividends. May your circulation grow less!

Chicago, August 3

E. R. M.

Moral Suasion and the League

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is now quite the fashion to criticize the League of Nations for its seeming weakness and indecision in a time of crisis; "it touches nothing that it does not adjourn." May I submit that such criticism is based upon misunderstanding of the technique of the League? I should like to cite briefly a review printed some time ago in the United States Law Review of Professor Edmund C. Mower's volume on "International Government." The review quotes Professor Mower as follows, regarding the League of Nations:

In no case has the Council appealed to force. Its method is that of counsel and conciliation; it endeavors to stimulate in the contending parties a sense of responsibility for international peace and of their obligation under the Covenant to seek a rational peace. This technique of the Council in dealing with international disputes often gives it the appearance of weakness, indecision, and procrastination; it tenders advice when the international peace seems to require the exercise of power. But its procedure in this regard has been as wise as it has been necessary—wise because international government has not yet advanced to the point where legalized resort to force by its constituted agencies can confidently rely upon the backing of public opinion, and necessary because, as the Covenant now stands, the League commands no force except what the member states endow it with at the moment.

Boston, August 1

WARREN O. AULT

FOLLOW NORMAN THOMAS IN THE CAMPAIGN OF THE SOCIALIST PARTY

Special Campaign Offer

To New Subscribers

ONE DOLLAR FOR ONE YEAR

THE NEW LEADER

Weekly Organ of The Socialist Party

Every Week

"Timely Topics" by NORMAN THOMAS

Frequent Contributions by

JAMES H. MAURER
MORRIS HILLQUIT
PAUL BLANSHARD
UPTON SINCLAIR

HARRY W. LAIDLER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR
LOUIS WALDMAN
HENRY ROSNER

All The Socialist And Labor News Of The World

THE NEW LEADER

JAMES ONEAL, Editor

7 E. 15th Street

New York City

(This special campaign offer expires Nov. 15th)

AMERICA FOR ALL

Official Thomas and Maurer Campaign Organ

Weekly Contributions by

NORMAN THOMAS	HEYWOOD BROWN
McALISTER COLEMAN	W. E. WOODWARD
JOHN M. WORK	ART YOUNG

EDWARD LEVINSON, Editor

A PLAN FOR AMERICA—The Socialist Campaign Handbook—Articles by Norman Thomas, James H. Maurer, Devere Allen, Paul Blanshard, Morris Hillquit, Mayor Daniel W. Hoan and others—Illustrated by Art Young—120 Pages—Price 10 cents (add 5 cents for postage).

SOCIALIST PARTY OF AMERICA

549 Randolph St., Chicago, Illinois

16 Issues for 50 Cents

Sample Copies
Free on Request

Fadiman and Goethe

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Fadiman's article on Goethe has just come to my notice. If Mr. Fadiman so cruelly belabors Goethe with the cudgel of his wisdom because that poet has no specific message for the I. W. W., other citizens may have an equally justified grievance against Goethe for failing explicitly to give the two-seed-in-the-spirit predestinarians his moral support. Clearly, Mr. Fadiman should not turn for inspiration to Goethe when there are such enthusiastic champions of his ideals as Upton Sinclair and Emma Goldman.

Chicago, August 2

E. M. FORTGANG

Training the Military Mind

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: With interest and approbation I read Robert Wohlforth's article, "The R. O. T. C. as a Peace Society."

I submit the results of my observations as a member of a high school R. O. T. C. unit during the last year: The young man, when he begins his course in military instruction, has an open mind; he is ready to accept anything he is told at its face value. Under the guidance of an army officer the militaristic mind evolves rapidly. The student soon becomes strongly biased in favor of the military system. He is taught that pacifism "must be stopped, or you'll have a war on your hands" (words used by officer in charge of unit of which I was member). He learns that national security may be had only by a large army. If asked whether he desires peace he replies, "Yes, of course." But he is ready to fight for his country "right or wrong."

Militarism is an insidious thing. Rare indeed is the student who does not acquire it if he is exposed to its influence for any length of time. Unfortunately, there is ordinarily no factor that serves to counteract its effect. So, after three years of such instruction, the graduate is a thorough militarist.

Atlanta, Georgia, July 7

WOODRUFF W. BRYNE

The Two Youngest

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Roy Wright, 15, and Eugene Williams, 14, the two youngest Negro boys of the nine victims of the attempted legal lynching in Scottsboro, Alabama, are still in prison. There was a mistrial in the case of Roy Wright; in the case of Eugene Williams the Alabama Supreme Court reversed the death verdict, on the ground that he was a juvenile. But the State of Alabama makes no move to bring these boys to trial again. They remain caged, as they have since April, 1931.

These youngsters have suffered enough. We must see that they are brought to a speedy trial. But defense funds have been exhausted by the long legal struggle for the other seven boys. Recent contributions have had to go to prepare for the October Supreme Court hearing.

We must have a special sum of $1,500 immediately for the defense of the two youngest boys. We appeal to men and women of imagination and humanity to help us raise this imperative sum. Please send your check to John Dos Passos, Treasurer, National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, St. Denis Building, Broadway and Eleventh Street, New York City.

New York, August 3

JOHN DOS PASSOS

Books

Mural for Evening

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

Earth turns toward evening and the white swan is Motionless marble on her onyx pool;
Thick darkness gathers in the cypresses.
These are the colors of sleep: spent violet, cool
Silver of momentary dusk that lays
No siege to starlight. Better were we lost Forever in the tortuous Cretan Maze
Than that this final threshold had been crossed!

For we are come upon a world that lies
Deeper than Ys, far deeper than the drowned
Atlantis, from whose gardens none shall rise.
Coffined in crystal, cloaked in the profound
Purple of night, we watch the white swan fade,
And give the musky leaf-mold to the spade.

A Compact Encyclopedia

Everyman's Encyclopedia. General Editor, Athelstan Ridgway. Science Editor, E. J. Holmyard. American Editor, Milton Bronner. E. P. Dutton and Company. Twelve volumes. $30 the set.

THE first edition of "Everyman's Encyclopedia" appeared some twenty years ago. The present edition, now completed, has been entirely reedited and reset, and published in a larger format, with the number of pages in each volume increased from 640 to 768. The volumes, however, are still cheap in price and still compact: to say that they sell at less than one-third the price of the cheapest edition of the "Britannica", and that each is no larger in the hand than the ordinary novel, is to answer the question of whether there is need or a place for them. For those who have the means and the shelf space the new "Everyman's" is no substitute for the "Britannica"; those less fortunate in either of these respects, however, should be grateful for its appearance.

For its outward bulk the new encyclopedia is remarkably comprehensive: it contains some 7,000,000 words, the equivalent of a hundred novels of average length. Compression has been in part secured by the courageous use of abbreviations. The type is small for sustained reading but not for reference. In the two thousand illustrations the line cuts are in general much more satisfactory than the half-tones, which suffer partly from their diminished size, and partly from the use of too coarse a screen, probably necessitated by the paper.

The three functional tests of an encyclopedia—granted accuracy—are, first, whether a sufficient number of separate references are included—and this the "Everyman's" meets admirably; second, whether the individual articles contain enough to be reasonably informative; and third, whether they direct the reader adequately to further information. The second of these requirements is extremely difficult to meet in a work of the present scope. To meet it requires both great compression in writing, which the articles often achieve, and a fine sense of the proper relative lengths of articles. Which is more important—logic or London? It is an idiotic question, and yet the encyclopedist must answer it, and a thousand others like it—the relative importance of Agriculture and Aristotle, of Marriage and Massachusetts, of Rabelais and Railways. Probably he never can decide these questions to anyone else's satisfaction, or even to his own. Yet even so, some of the decisions of the editors of "Everyman's" seem to me particularly puzzling. Logic, for example, gets less than two columns, and London thirty. It is instructive to compare this space allotment with that of the Encyclopedia Britannica, in which Logic is assigned fifty-five columns to London's forty-four. It would be unfair to suggest that this particular comparison implies anything beyond itself—any general lack of proportion in the "Everyman" articles. It is simply one of those things that happen in any encyclopedia.

But on the third test of an encyclopedia—whether it direct the reader adequately to further information—a general criticism of "Everyman's" may, I think, be made. No one can possibly learn anything from less than two columns on Logic, yet no bibliography is offered. Nor does any accompany the article on the important subject of Currency. On the other hand, appended to the article on Economics, which receives seventeen columns, is an excellent brief bibliography. On biographies no consistent policy seems to have been followed. There is a good short list of reference books on D. H. Lawrence, and none on Anatole France or Henry James or Melville. There is one on John Stuart Mill, and none on Francis Bacon. In other cases the bibliographies are careless or haphazard. It is here, I think, that the new "Everyman's" is weakest. It appears, on the other hand, to be well proofread. I stumbled—in my necessarily sketchy reading—over only two errors: Occam appears as "Occian" in the article on Logic, and T. E. Hulme as "T. E. Hume" in that on Criticism.

But such selected and detailed criticism inevitably gives an unfair impression. I have said nothing of how remarkably well written most of the articles are, particularly those on literary figures, nor of the astonishing up-to-dateness of the political and other topical articles. Altogether, the editors have carried through an extremely difficult task with commendable success.

HENRY HAZLITT

The Decline of the I. W. W.

The Decline of the I. W. W. By John S. Gambs. Columbia University Press. $4.25.

NO labor union in the United States has been given more attention, favorable and otherwise, than the Industrial Workers of the World. It has had the careful and sympathetic study of Hoxie, Brissenden, and Parker, and, from others, more than its share of abuse. Now it has declined, and Dr. Gambs writes an obituary.

Unhappily Dr. Gambs is not chiefly interested in the I. W. W. His interest is in sociological theory, and to justify his use of the I. W. W. as a case history, he makes the brash assertion that "The historian always has a moral up his sleeve." The moral here is that the I. W. W. declined because there is no place for revolutionary unions in the United States today. This sounds plausible enough, but the trouble is that we might leave out the "revolutionary" and it would still be plausible. We would then have to explain the decline of the A. F. of L. unions by their conservatism; of the company unions by their "companyism"; of the "independent" unions by their independence. . . .

The I. W. W. was organized in 1905, and in 1917 it became an outlaw organization. Back of that outlawry was a state of public hysteria which found in the Wobblies an object upon which to vent inhibited spleens and phobias and to gain those illusions of power so necessary to noncombatants at war. This, it would seem, is a story worth telling, but our author makes little attempt to describe and none to explain it. He does, however, give an excellent account of the reaction of the I. W. W. to attack. It becomes clear that the I. W. W. was wiped out by this wartime struggle. It might, of course, have declined anyway. It might have become less revolutionary. But so far as we know the war and later persecutions destroyed it. There were other factors—chief among them, the disappearance of the migratory worker.

The surprising thing is not that the I. W. W. declined but that it lasted as long as it did. There is something about a philosophy, whether it be revolutionary, idealistic, or what not, that is better than a war chest, a machine, or gangsters. This something has been lost to the American labor movement, and while the I. W. W. has declined with its philosophy, the labor movement has declined without one.

One of the best chapters in Mr. Gambs's book describes the attempt of some of the Wobbly leaders to tie up with engineers. They employed Howard Scott to give them information about the copper industry, and seem to have listened to his advice. He told them that sabotage, instead of hastening the disruption of capitalist industry, only delayed it. Accepting the Marxian theory of crises, he advised them to push production on to overproduction and stoppage. That has been done, but not by the Wobblies. Perhaps some other engineer can tell us what to do now, that is better than what Marx said we would have to do.

NORMAN J. WARE.

Midwest "Cherry Orchard"

House of Vanished Splendor. By William McNally. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

FOR the past ten years the literature of the Middle West has been repetitious or barren. After the appearance of Sinclair Lewis, Edgar Lee Masters, Carl Sandburg, Vachel Lindsay, and Sherwood Anderson, the soil was temporarily exhausted—Glenway Wescott may be regarded as an exception. If for no other reason than to explain a surprising sterility, "House of Vanished Splendor," written by a Minneapolis newspaperman, deserves special attention. The social implications of this first novel are broad enough to define the nature of its own faults and merits and to suggest a number of reasons why the so-called "literary renaissance" of the Middle West came to an abrupt conclusion in the early years of the last decade.

The very plot of the book is ambitious and of genuine social significance, for it traces the decline of a wealthy and large family on the shores of the upper Mississippi—the Knott family—who may be accepted as a prototype of Middle Western civilization. The Knott fortune, based upon real estate and the rapid industrial growth of the Middle West following the Civil War, is characteristic of many apparently accidental foundations of American wealth. The original John Knott was a pioneer in the literal sense: it was he who founded villages and towns, traded with the Sioux, and fought in the Civil War as a mere incident to his general activities. His son, John Victor, was a pioneer of a different order—the shrewd business man who was ready to gamble on the future of the railroads and the infant industries springing with mushroom-like growth at his feet. This activity did not demand unusual intelligence to master, nor great strength of character, merely boldness and the ability to make rapid decisions. The boom was on—and the Knott fortune was made overnight. John Victor found himself a director in a bank, owner of a prosperous flour mill, and master of a huge house overlooking the great river. The time had come for him to worry about his family, two grown sons and two daughters: he died before he could protect their interests with an intelligently worded will.

The rest of the novel is a study of disintegration. There is the eldest son Dwight, a Yale graduate, scarcely more than a half-wit, virtuous, dull and in charge of his father's flour mill. There is Todd, who earned the distinction of running away from Harvard before he was expelled. There is Betty, the beauty trying to imitate the career of Alice Roosevelt in a Middle Western environment, and Mary, who finds a substitute for sexual frustration in religion. Altogether they comprise a cast of characters for an American version of "The Cherry Orchard"—not one is fit to assume the responsibility of managing an estate.

This family of adult children, from the superficially brilliant Todd down to his idiot brother Dwight, are all doomed: their heritage of material wealth is meaningless, for like a large number of Middle Western families they have not become firmly rooted in their environment. What they have inherited is not a culture at all, but a vague sense of a historic past, a feeble strain of New England Puritanism, and a totally unpractical form of hand-to-mouth pragmatism. Even at best (for we find in Todd an appreciation for music and an underdeveloped and generalized aesthetic sense) their talents for living are second rate. All lack the drive, the nervous energy that propelled the father, John Victor, forward into a life of material activity. Their pretensions to aristocratic leisure are absurd and merely spendthrift.

The flaws in Mr. McNally's novel are obvious: the book lacks a definite philosophy that might well have raised it above the level of intelligent reporting, and the prose bears the marks of rapid journalese, of too much hasty writing. But Mr. McNally has gifts that compensate for these defects. Like Sinclair Lewis, he possesses the ability to create full-bodied characters, each highly individualized and convincing, and again, quite in the tradition of both Dreiser and Lewis, he has chosen material that readily lends itself to social analysis.

HORACE GREGORY

Chinese Puzzles

The Tinder Box of Asia. By George E. Sokolsky. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Problems of the Pacific, 1931. Edited by Bruno Lasker. University of Chicago Press. $5.

Business and Politics in the Far East. By Edith E. Ware. Yale University Press. $3.

GEORGE SOKOLSKY probably knows more Chinese more intimately than any other foreigner in China; and he thinks and writes about China in terms of human beings rather than of abstract principles. His book about China has the intimacy and the freshness of his own breezy, gossipy conversation. He is dogmatic, informed, and often brilliantly informed and penetrating. If he is often prejudiced, no one can be sure in what direction his prejudices may lead him, for they are the product of a singularly diverse and adventurous career.

Born in up-State New York of devout orthodox Russian Jewish parents, Sokolsky drifted to New York, made Republican campaign speeches and consorted with Emma Goldman, had a tempestuous career at the Columbia School of Journalism, got an assignment to report the Russian Revolution for an agency which sent him to Petrograd and then blew up, lived off the revolutions cheerfully, drifted East, functioned as an impassioned Western sympathizer with Chinese students in the disturbances of 1919, helped organize a Chinese government Bureau of Economic Information, and became in time the featured correspondent of the leading British die-hard organ in Shanghai, adviser to various commercial companies, managing editor of a monthly engineering journal noted for its sympathy with the Japanese, correspondent for American and British newspapers, and an unofficial participant in sundry phases of Chinese political life. Foreigners in Shanghai, thinking in terms of loyalty to principles and causes, tend to distrust "Sok"; Chinese, of various political camps, love him as a human being and, respecting his shrewd intuitions, consult him.

Sokolsky today wastes no time with futile ideals. He appraises force and respects power. He admires almost equally Chiang Kai-shek, the present "Strong Man" of China, General Araki of Japan, and Borodin, the Russian adviser in the early days of the Nationalist Government; and he criticizes all of them sharply. Also he knows them; he gives intimate pictures of them which light up as a lightning flash the murky Chinese scene. His sketches of the various members of the "Soong dynasty" which has dominated Chinese politics for six years, particularly of its behind-the-scenes women, are superb. He is contemptuous of ignorant League of Nations gestures and of talk of "law" and "government" in China. He knows that China is and will long remain in what seems to the Westerner sheer anarchy; and that nevertheless China is a mighty entity, moving perceptibly and integratedly in the midst of a chaos of constant civil wars. He knows that it is well to be careful when using that word "China."

"China" fought Japan at Shanghai, the world says. Sokolsky says that a Cantonese general, defiant of the head of the Nanking Government, fought Japan. . . . Sokolsky thinks in human, personal terms. "Bandits?" "Bandits in China are only hungry people," he says. But he is more concerned with the Communists; he takes them more seriously than most treaty-port foreigners. For they express something more than themselves; a mass discontent. The issue, as Sokolsky sees it, is between such strong-man nationalism as Chiang Kai-shek represents, and a Russian communism tinged with Chinese tradition. He fears this Russian communism; but he is not afraid to recognize that its savagery has been less than that of Chiang Kai-shek's White Terror.

So Sokolsky has written a personal, chaotic, sometimes prejudiced, always revealing book about China. A more orderly mind might have omitted some of the details of Chinese intrigues; the professors who write most of the books about China would never have known of them. "The Tinder Box of Asia" is Sokolsky's book about China, and, as such, valuable. The observer will note that in recording the recent conflict with Japan Sokolsky adopts a cautious, documentary, neutral method of narration foreign to his own nature; he argues half-heartedly that China must come to terms with Japan and recognize Japan's domination of Manchuria.

"Problems of the Pacific" is a summary of the round-table discussions held by the Institute of Pacific Relations in China when the Manchurian row was hottest. A mass of information upon road building, industrialization, international migration, and kindred problems is here assembled. The Chinese-Japanese debates regarding the treatment of Koreans in Manchuria shed light on the current conflict; the figures showing that Japan has in the last decade been a land of immigration rather than of emigration are striking; the papers on racial assimilation and cross-breeding in various parts of the Pacific are suggestive.

Miss Ware's "Business and Politics in the Far East" consists of two studies: one of the effects of the imminent abolition of extraterritoriality in China upon business relations; the other of the new "democracy" in Japan. Both reveal the inadequacy of the liberal academic mind. A profound believer in international cooperation, Miss Ware repeatedly lets her wish be mother to her thought. She recommends an international agency to bridge the extraliterary difficulties, as if any machinery could really bridge the gulf between the Chinese pragmatic conception of justice and the Westerner's respect for paper law; and she sees cheerful prospects in Japan which subsequent events have knocked out of the reckoning. Japan is still, evidently, a feudal nation ruled by a military clique to whom the constitution means nothing, even among friends. Miss Ware, like most of the ardent proponents of League action, cannot quite face that unpleasant fact. Sokolsky's sometimes brutal cynicism has its points.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

More of Milton

The Works of John Milton. Volumes III-VI. Columbia University Press. Sold on subscription only. $105 the set.

IF the third, fourth, and fifth volumes of the Columbia Milton are less exciting than the first two, that is mainly because prose is less exciting than poetry. The new volumes have the same dignity of good scholarship that characterized their predecessors. If a critical grumble must be made about them, it will be that the editors exercise a too great talent for self-effacement: that they are, in fact, more concerned to reprint than to edit. They give us in every case what may be called Milton's final text—the last published during his lifetime, that is—with an appendix setting out the variants from earlier texts. But there they stop. That the text which Milton passed for the press can here and there be faulty (beyond a few mispunctuations and occasional misplacement of letters) they are unwilling to believe. Happy in the consciousness that they are making, not a commentary, but a text, they may be thought, at a good many places, to have forgotten that the foundation of textual criticism is still "just interpretation." Even so, this over-reticence is better than critical babble; and these beautifully printed texts at least furnish all the data for critical divination.

The four volumes under review present, if we except the unfinished "History of Britain," a practically complete corpus of Milton's English prose works. We begin in ecclesiastical controversy—with the three anonymous tracts of 1641, followed in the next year by the "Reason of Church Government." These occupy the first part of Volume III, the two major pamphlets filling it with the sound of greatness. But in the second part the devil gets Milton, and leaves us with the "Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce." The fourth volume opens with the other three divorce tracts, but ends with "Areopagitica" and the tractate "Of Education." Without the divorce tracts we should perhaps never have had "Areopagitica." But already in "Church Government" there shines forth the lofty temper of moral freedom which makes "Areopagitica" the one work of Milton in prose which is still read by everybody. The fifth volume is political—the "Tenure of Kings," in view of its occasion (it was written during the days of the King's trial) reads oddly academical; "Eikonoklastes" is practical and personal, written to the order of the Council of State. The Columbia editors leave on one side its two rather sordid sequels, the first and second "Defensio Populi Anglicani." For these we must await the section reserved for Milton's Latin works: the second Defensio (unpleasant as parts of it are) abounds in noble passages, the eloquence of which lives even in the English of Fellowes. At present the Columbia Milton presents a blank for the decade 1649-58, and omitting the whole of the long controversy with Salmasius and More, offers us, in Volume VI, rather uninteresting matter—a miscellany of religion and politics in which the most considerable items are the "Readie and Easie Way" and the "Means to Remove Hirelings." Why one or two items in this volume are placed where they are, to the disturbance of what would seem to be in general a chronological order, I do not know.

The greater part of the third volume is the work of Morgan Ayres, the divorce pamphlets have fallen to Mr. Powell (assisted in the first of them by Mr. Patterson). For the last part of the fourth volume ("Areopagitica"), and for nearly the whole of Volumes V-VI Mr. Haller is responsible. Uniformity has been studied everywhere; and all these editors are justly praised when it is said no one of them is better than the others. The work of all of them is characterized by dignity and restraint. If they gave us a little more of themselves, we might like them better. But they are resolved to take no risks; and very likely they are right.

H. W. GARROD

Mr. More's Catholicism

The Catholic Faith. By Paul Elmer More. Princeton University Press. $3.

MR. MORE is known to the general reader as one of the leaders of the humanists—a sect which in its two short-lived periods of notoriety, just after the war and again last year, was exceedingly misunderstood by enemies and friends alike, being taken as a movement which had something to say about literature and philosophy. As a matter of fact, its axis was immediately and unreflectively social, the literary and philosophical ideas of its proponents being thoroughly heterogeneous, their common basis being, simply, similar reactionary attitudes in morals and politics. The same heterogeneity, even more pronounced, is found in Mr. More's religious camp; his present work is one of a considerable number of recent attempts, strenuous but ineffective, to crystallize an Anglo-Catholic theology.

The attitude behind Anglo-Catholicism may be stated in this wise: It is felt that in the Protestant rejection of the sacraments as "mysteries," particularly in reducing the Eucharist to a mere memorial, there has been lost the very life-principle of religion and, equally important, a ritual which by its non-verbal character could mean many things to many people and thus act as a unifying force. The Anglo-Catholic envies the Roman Catholic unity, and sees that the central place given to the sacraments promotes that unity: the most brutalized peasant's literal eating of Christ's blood and body, and the philosopher's sophisticated acceptance of the mystery come to the same thing in that they both go to the same mass. The Anglo-Catholic would like to improve still further on this unifying factor by widening the latitude of meaning which the sacrament may have: in Mr. More's nice language, protesting against Rome's outright imputation of magical efficacy to the sacraments, "surely the more reasonable way is to admit the possible virtue of a sacramental act without inquiring too strictly into the relation of matter and spirit or into the method of its efficiency." Thus would the Anglo-Catholic keep the satisfying magical efficacy of the sacraments, at the same time assure the more rationalistic that it may mean something a little different to them, and, further, ward off the skeptical queries of science. To the irreverent it may seem an amusing attempt to eat your cake, have it, and deny you ever saw it. From the same desire for unity by way of non-verbal practices springs perhaps the most heartfelt of all Anglo-Catholic objections, that against the sermon.

This yearning for unity is understandable enough. What is hard to understand is the kind of mind which thinks that a lost unity can be recovered by rigging up the old formulas with new trimmings. I should be the last to deny that religion can be a unifying factor. One has only to look around and see the amazingly heterogeneous mass of people who use the same local parish church; one has seen essentially decent workmen sullenly but obediently leave a picket line at the command of a priest in the name of their common faith. But such phenomena require a vast and powerful institutionalization; the living generations must have been indoctrinated and molded from babyhood up. Once that institutionalization has actually decayed to any extent, and one or two generations have grown up sensitive to outside influences, no refurbishing of the furniture of a church can be sufficient to win them back. It is then no question of finding some minimum of beliefs and practices which can be agreed to. Then the problem is one requiring actually existing common beliefs, common ways of life, common interests and desires. In short, there has to be a considerable group of necessary conditions similar to the situations out of which the great religions sprang. Then the religion was the expression, the result, of a communal life, not a formula out of which to concoct it. And Mr. More and a great many people to the contrary, it cannot be done the other way around.

The fact is that Anglo-Catholicism is merely an expression of the present disunity of Protestantism; its adherents want unity, but all they have in common is their distaste for Protestant decay. Examined more closely, Anglo-Catholics turn out to be an exceedingly heterogeneous group—archaistic monarchists like T. S. Eliot, reactionary landowners, refinement-hunting bourgeois, shopkeepers tired of the chapel, sections of the London proletariat worshipping the earnest young priest who, as Dean Inge said, carries incense in one hand and the red flag in the other. For all these Anglo-Catholicism is a temporary stop at a point where many roads cross; they or their children will separate in very different directions. As for Mr. More himself, the most cogent reason I can think of for his not being in the Roman Catholic church is that its communicants in Princeton are all Wops and Polacks.

FELIX MORROW

Second Act

The Store. By T. S. Stribling. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

"THE Store" is the second novel in a trilogy about the South; "The Forge," which ended with the death cries of the old South, was the first. When "The Store" opens the new South is already under way. Grover Cleveland, who will later send troops to put down the Pullman strike, is preparing to be elected President; the errors that Northern capitalism had a chance to commit slowly are being repeated at an accelerated pace in the reconstructed Southern States.

No trilogy can be judged in its entirety until all three sections of it have appeared; but it is possible to get some notion of the plan behind T. S. Stribling's trilogy now that two-thirds have been published. What might be expected are three extraordinary documents, wealthy in incident, character, political, social, and moral meanings, profound survivals and profound changes. The least that could be expected would be another "Forsyte Saga." Then, too, the novel is a fortunate medium for such a plan; for the novel will distend to accommodate a variety of supposedly heterogeneous materials. Neither "The Forge" nor "The Store" meet any of the expectations reasonably aroused by an author who has chosen to show the South at three of its most important moments. They are old-fashioned novels, melodramatic and "plotty," whose décor is Southern. Their settings are as minutely done as Belasco stage sets, and, as far as the novel's content is concerned, fundamentally as unreal.

The characters in "The Store" possess a good many Southern prejudices. Negroes roam all the pages. Trends of the times are illustrated: a postmaster tries to frighten Negroes into believing that their freedom depends on the Republicans, so that he may keep his job; a Negro is lynched to complete a mob's holiday; a white tenant farmer burns down a Negro school. But it turns out that the postmaster is really a spiritualist who gets messages from the dead about missing papers, and the Negro would not have been lynched if the deed to a farm had been found sooner. Stribling tries to make these incidents more than illustrations by tying them all together in an elaborate plot with symbolic overtones. But a clumsy symbolism is not enough.

The Vaiden family, and the particular hero of "The Store," Colonel Miltiades Vaiden, are interesting enough in themselves. It is easy enough to see why the author has chosen to follow their fortunes more closely than anyone else's in the novel. They are middle-class, neither wealthy nor downright poor; they have to have money and get it by fair means or foul; they are not the usual characters of Southern fiction. As a nucleus, the Vaiden family would have served very well, and, perhaps, it was intended that they be only a nucleus. The result, however, is that not the South but the Vaiden family, with its people and its problems, its dramas that, in actuality, reflect a central social conflict, but seem to take place in isolation without any immediate after effects, receives all the attention. The rest, including the South, is symbolism and off-stage noises. The elaborate plot has swamped what ought to have been the purpose and ambition of the trilogy. The novel that lies in the extraordinary fertile South has yet to be written, and it looks as though T. S. Stribling were not the man to write it.

KENNETH WHITE

The First German Fascist

Lassalle. By Arno Schirokauer. Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul. The Century Company. $5.

HERE is the story of the man who is generally considered the founder of the Social Democratic Party of Germany, the party of Bebel, the Liebknechts, and Rosa Luxemburg, and also the party of Noske, Wels, Kautsky, and Hermann Müller. It is not a pretty story, whether we judge it by bourgeois or by socialist standards, but it is magnificently written and superbly translated. It is the story of a fop, a Narcissus, who in the end destroyed himself, though in his self-adoration he allowed another man to pull the trigger. But the man in love with himself also possessed remarkable intellectual power:

In three weeks he swots up 620 pages of French history, and makes an index to them; reads all that Darwin has as yet published; makes abstracts from old folios, thirty-six quarto pages of his small, concise handwriting. He gobbles up a thousand pages of Tooke's "History of Prices," and he begins Teulet's work on the French codes.

Lassalle was a Jew, and this he regretted, perhaps not consciously, yet very definitely. He sought escape from his Jewishness in playing the swell, in gambling on the stock exchange, in his sensationally dramatic court trials. His appetite for power, the form in which his "escape" expressed itself, was insatiable, but his power was illusory, it had no substance, for he was never sincerely accepted in high society and in the intellectual circles which he tried to enter. He was a glorious rebel, had perforce to be just that, but except among the working people his rebellion found no response whatever.

Ferdinand Lassalle was the son of Heymann Lassal (Ferdinand gallicized his surname after a brief visit to Paris) who was in turn the son of Feitel Beraun of Loslau, a small town in the Rybnik district of Upper Silesia. Heymann was first called Chajjim Wolfssohn, but with the emancipation of the Jews in 1812 "Chajjim of Loslau became the Prussian citizen Heymann Lassal." With this change Heymann moved to Breslau, where, on either April 11 or April 13 of 1825, his son was born. Ferdinand early showed his rebellious nature. He bulldozed his father—who saw in his son the liberation of his people, and wished to do nothing to compromise that miracle—and he tyrannized his mother and his sister Riekchen. In school, first at the Magdalen Gymnasium in Breslau and later at the Commercial Academy in Leipzig, he was arrogant, impertinent, and often collided with the school masters. He wanted to impress people with his importance; he wanted power, not learning. And his father, without any desire to cross the young Ferdinand, was aggrieved because the son would not follow him into commerce, the profitable pursuit of which enabled Heymann in later years to finance Ferdinand's gambling and scheming.

We may pass up his reputation as "a woman-eater of insatiable and indiscriminate appetite"; his private war against Count Hatzfeldt, the defense of whose wife consumed most of his years and led him into strange and melodramatic court trials; his authorship of the truly phenomenal work, "Heracclitus." His fame rests upon none of these. Rather is it founded upon his championship of the under classes. They were the persecuted, just as his own people had been the persecuted. Their rebellion was his rebellion, though their interrelation was never apparent to him. But he must be king, all-powerful, demanding complete obedience. He founded the General Union of German Workers—forerunner of the Social Democratic Party—and by this device sought to deliver the working class into the hands of Bismarck, to the greater glory, not of the people, nor yet of Bismarck and the monarchy, but solely of Ferdinand Lassalle. "He is the party. The party belongs to him." And what sort of new state did he seek to erect in this deal with Bismarck, avowed enemy of socialism, which never came off? In the words of Schirokauer:

Lassalle, who is not so much a Marxian as a Hegelian, does not think in terms of a class struggle. What he wants is not the socialist state, but the social state. . . . To the communist state, which is the property of one definite class, Lassalle contraposes the state of all.

In brief, Lassalle was the first social fascist. With him the producers were not to rule the state; the state was to rule the producers, but its rule was to be good and of benefit to all the people—the slogan of all fascists. Addressing a group of workers, Lassalle declared that they must "not even shrink from entering into an alliance with the monarchy"—whereupon Wilhelm Liebknecht, who was present, "sprang to his feet in a rage." Lassalle's socialism was that of Pilsudski, Mussolini, and Adolf Hitler. And this is the man regarded as the godfather of the present Socialist Party of Germany. But is it really, one may ask, such a far cry from Lassalle, "opponent of democracy" and co-plotter with Bismarck, to Comrade Noske, whose reactionary troops, armed by the Majority Socialists, shot down thousands of working people during the "March massacres" in Berlin in 1919, and foully murdered Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Liebknecht? Or to the Socialist Party of 1920, which, by smashing the Kapp Putsch by means of a general strike, showed that it had complete control of the country, but meekly surrendered that power to General von Seeckt and the counter-revolution? Or to the Socialist police of Berlin, who murdered thirty-three working people in the May day "riots" of 1929 solely for the purpose of protecting a bourgeois government? Or to Karl Kautsky, who, while the fascists are rampant in Germany, can still devote most of his time to bitter, unrealistic attacks on the socialization of Russia?

Lassalle's colossal conceit carried him through to the end, to his own tragic end. Bismarck had snubbed him, his political game was up. In his thirty-ninth year he flung away the love of Helene von Dönniges. Another man wooed and won her. His vanity cut to the quick, Lassalle first attempted to bully Helene and her family into accepting him, and, failing in this, he challenged the successful suitor to a duel, for which he was equipped neither temperamentally nor physically. He knew when he issued the challenge that he was to die, though he ridiculed the thought "that I shall fall before this fellow's bullet. That is not my destiny!" Yet he deliberately allowed his opponent to fire first, and four days later the fop, the prodigal rebel who wanted to dictate, died of a disease called self-destruction.

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Simian Social Life

The Social Life of Monkeys and Apes. By S. Zuckerman. Harcourt, Brace, and Company. $3.75.

INCREASING interest in the behavior of the non-human primates has stimulated much psychological work of the past decade. In recent years numerous investigations have resulted in a great acquisition of knowledge of the psychology of these forms. However, man is a social animal, and it is not strange that the findings of the psychologists have carried their stimulus to students of society so that, as never before, there have been attempts to study social behavior in ape and monkey society. Yet interest in the social behavior of simians is not entirely of recent origin. The historical section of the monumental work on the great apes by Robert and Ada Yerkes, demonstrates to what extent attention has been paid to the social order of these sub-human, yet startlingly man-like forms. This literature is almost entirely folkloristic, it is true, but it attests to a vivid interest. In recent years Alverdes's work, "Tiersoziologie," and scientific papers by Miller, Kroeber, and others, have been published. It was inevitable that a comprehensive study of simian sociology should appear; it is fortunate that the one that has appeared is of the quality of this book by Mr. Zuckerman.

The author is an anatomist, and he attacks his problems with all the rigorous methodology of his discipline. To a keen critical ability are added a happiness of phraseology and a sense of humor that make his finished work, though carefully thought through and closely argued, an exciting narrative. His book is not only based on a wide acquaintance with the literature, but also on detailed observation of the Hamadryas baboon colony maintained by the Zoological Society of London in conditions approximating as nearly as possible those of the wild, and finally on observations made on the same variety of baboon living in its natural habitat in South Africa. Mention must also be made of the pictures with which Mr. Zuckerman has illustrated his book. The photographs of baboons, taken mainly by J. E. Saunders, must certainly rank as some of the most vivid presentations of monkey life ever made available to students.

Mr. Zuckerman approaches his data from a point of view that is entirely mechanistic. He has little patience with anthropomorphic explanations of behavior, and although he eschews behavioristic terminology, it is not unfair to say that he considers the genesis and development of the social life of animals to be a function of their reflexes, conditioned and unconditioned. He begins by reviewing our knowledge of the processes of reproduction in mammals—we are told that our knowledge of the ecological factor is such that it does not permit of treatment at this time. The experimental, controlled work that has been done on sexual periodicity in mammals, and the nature and significance of the oestrous cycle in the lower mammalian forms and the menstrual cycle in the sub-human primates, are gone into thoroughly and critically, though always in such fashion as to be intelligible to the interested layman. And this discussion prepares the reader for the detailed description of the baboon colonies studied by the author, which occupies the latter half of the book.

Out of this consideration, documented by numerous illustrations observed by Mr. Zuckerman in the wild and in zoological gardens, certain conclusions are demonstrated. The "intelligent" character of the monkey's responses, which is accepted by the author, is shown to be correlated with the maculate vision possessed by the animal, plus the tactual stimuli derived from the fact that his anterior extremities are hands. The reader is told how the sexual responses are of the greatest importance in maintaining position in the simian social scale, and the phenomenon of "prostitution," which consists in the utilization of movements that arouse sexual response in order to divert an anger-reaction on the part of an aroused more powerful fellow, is described, it being indicated that this occurs among all the simian forms which have been studied. Another conclusion the author derives is that baboons, other monkeys, and the apes do not live promiscuous sexual lives, but that their matings, which may be either monogamous or polygynous, are based on force, or dominance, as it is termed, a given mating enduring as long as the "overlord" can maintain his possession of a given female or females against the assaults of non-attached adult males. The manner in which the sexual behavior of monkeys is a function of their early social experience, rather than an inborn set of unconditioned responses, such as characterize the sexual behavior of the lower mammalian forms, is indicated; while finally, in a consideration of the "altruistic" behavior of apes and monkeys, so often reported by travelers and other observers, the "mutual aid" they manifest is shown to be of a nature that partakes of the automatic character of reflex, and not reasoned, behavior.

Mr. Zuckerman's book should go a long way to focus the attention of students of society on what has been, as far as scientific approach is concerned, a neglected field, and to start a tradition of rigorous methodology in a field where such rigor is too often lacking. If further work is carried on in as critical and careful a spirit as this, we shall be a long way toward a scientifically valid "mammalian sociology."

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Shorter Notices

Trafton Helen. By Jonathan Leonard. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

In this, his latest novel, Jonathan Leonard again displays his wilful determination to waste his talent for powerful invective and original imagery upon trivial subject matter. It is a story of how two well-to-do people, man and wife, city-bred and bored, try to recapture youthful emotion in the environment of a New England village. The man attempts a brief love affair with a farmer's daughter, and the woman yearns for attention from a dancing teacher and her son's tutor, lately expelled (with her son) from a fashionable boys' prep-school. Both parents are frustrated in their middle-aged revival of carnality by the prankish intervention of the son and two villagers. This résumé of an insignificant plot seems almost unfair to what must have been Jonathan Leonard's original intention when he sat down to write the book—but like his earlier book, "The Meddlers," "Trafton Helen" suffers from the use of inadequate symbols, or rather, unimportant characters and situations, that collapse under the weight of a brilliant imagination, an excellent prose style, and a profound criticism of human relationships. There is scarcely a page in the present novel that does not contain a rich poetic image concealed in a paragraph of strong, unyielding prose. The casual conversation between characters is often remarkable: one remembers in particular a savage satire on the value of human knowledge—but this fine passage is hidden in a general attack upon the methods of education in secondary schools. Mr. Leonard's single but serious flaw as an artist seems to be that of a man who attempts a Miltonic theme within the technical and emotional range of a French triolet.

Spears Against Us. By Cecil Roberts. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

This novel about the World War is quite different from most novels on that subject in that it is free not only from any nationalistic rancor but also from any of the anti-martial bitterness that has been so popular of late. Mr. Roberts's position is humanitarian and pacifistic, but his manner is entirely too mild to permit the strong feeling that we find in Remarque or Aldington. The story concerns the special rapprochement that exists between an English and an Austrian family, the Crawleys and the Edelsteins. The War divides them for four years, but even while it is in progress they manage to write secret letters, assuring each other of their undisturbed affection. The scene is mostly Austria. First, we see the English being entertained by the Edelsteins in their picturesque Tyrol castle during the summer of 1914; after the Armistice we see the Crawleys coming to the rescue of their sorely distressed friends with money and soup-kitchens. Mr. Roberts's intentions are worthy enough; his execution is another matter. As a work of art "Spears Against Us" is on such a plane that it could be converted into a movie almost without change. The only value it could have for sophisticated readers would be to amuse them with certain romantic inadvertences of style.

The Phoenix Kind. By Peter Quennell. The Viking Press. $2.50.

In spite of the remarkable abilities Peter Quennell displays as a poet, and the complexity of emotion manifested throughout his poems, this novel about two brothers—one, introspective, physically weak, sententious; the other, handsome, irresponsible, superficial—and a nauseous girl, Virginia, who supposedly brings the story of the two brothers' complementary dissimilarities to a head, possesses no vigor and only an attempted emotional quality. The elaborately conscious style never pierces to the heart of the matters so lengthily discussed; it moves round them obscuringly. The real possibilities of the theme are rarely touched. Elements in the story have an occasional true ring, like the zoo episode, which has been done, unfortunately, much better in Hemingway's "Hills Like White Elephants"; But the quality of the novel as a whole is a great disappointment.

John Wesley. By C. E. Vulliamy. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

In the eyes of his present biographer John Wesley was not a hell-breathing preacher but a brilliant executive whose conduct was a literal definition of "Methodism." Picture him a small, neat man, scarcely five feet six, who spoke deliberately, almost without gestures, was formal and austere in manner and, but for his great energy, somewhat effeminate. He rose at four in the morning and often worked till midnight—nothing could stop his constant drive toward a single purpose, a reform of Protestant Christianity throughout the English-speaking world. Though somewhat stern and dogmatic, he was noted for his impersonal kindness, his unworldliness, his credulity. The times were ripe in eighteenth-century England for a John Wesley to arrive. The godlessness of the average clergy was an open scandal; and the lower middle classes as well as the peasants were completely neglected by wine-drinking, card-playing divines. It was to these lower classes that Wesley made his appeal, scarcely by choice, but because his services as a reformer and a critic of the Church of England were in actual demand. Not the least among his extraordinary adventures was an attempt to perform missionary work among the company of jailbirds who colonized Georgia under Oglethorpe. His failure opened the way for the success of George Whitefield, who later became his associate in a series of revival meetings that shook all England. Mr. Vulliamy's biography is a refreshing book. Well written and intelligently planned, it presents a vivid panorama of lower-middle-class life in eighteenth-century England.

The Journey Inward. By Kurt Heuser. Translated from the German by Willa and Edwin Muir. The Viking Press. $2.50.

This book is called a novel, but it bears the stamp of authentic experience, lived or shared by the author. The reader gains by this circumstance. Mr. Heuser not only writes well, but he has also the gift, in a high degree, of rendering atmosphere. The uncharted regions of the East Coast breathe with a mysterious life in these pages, and we are drawn under a spell from which we are not released until we reach the last page; even then its mood lingers. A comparison with Conrad's "Heart of Darkness" is inevitable, and Mr. Heuser does not come off badly. There is a Germanic element in the philosophical reflections of the central character, Jeronimo, which, coming from a disillusioned young man, fleeing from sick post-war Europe and his own past, have some interest. There is a sense of nightmare about the series of images flitting past us against the background of African night. And the primitive blacks are

Still the Indispensable Book

THE SACCO-VANZETTI CASE

by OSMOND K. FRAENKEL

With 6 portraits and 3 maps cloth, 6¼ x 9½ inches, 584 pages, $5.00

ALFRED A. KNOPF PUBLISHER · N.Y.

☐ PLAYS ☐ RADIO ☐

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN With GLENN ANDERS
DOROTHY STICKNEY, MARGARET WYCHERLY, JOHN BEAL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."
—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

B O O T H THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

The Nation's Radio Hour on WEVD
Literature and the Marxians
by Joseph Wood Krutch

Wednesday, August 24 8:15 p. m.

like angels beside the conquering, corrupt whites. At least, the newcomer, Jeronimo, almost envies them. They carried only their loads forced upon them by the whites; "but he carried a burden of memories and regrets . . . his portion of the curse which every Occidental must bear. And he knew that he bore it."

We Begin. By Helen Grace Carlisle. Harrison Smith, Inc. $2.50.

The author of "Mothers Cry" has, upon the basis of a wide amount of research, written an account of the founders of the Plymouth colonies, using three characters to tell the story: two brothers and a woman who marries the younger brother. The plot has to do, mainly, with the religious fanaticism of the older brother, who so unsuccessfully sublimates his sexual urges that he finally commits murder and rape; but the story is the life of the dissenters in England, Holland, and America. The result is not an inspired one, but the novel's steady preoccupation with the every-day life of the people gives it an air of hum-drum reality heightened by danger and hardship; in this respect it is quite unlike most historical novels. The debt the author owes to Elizabeth Madox Roberts is an obvious one.

Chaos Is Come Again. By Claude Houghton. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $2.50.

Another eccentric English family reaches the end of its fortune amid complications of love and sacrifice, and a great deal of talk from smug individuals, obviously the author's mouthpieces, about the Loss of Faith, Post-War Madness, and so on, and so on. There is a great deal of sneering at modern literature, which is, fortunately, quite unlike the insipid conventionality of this latest novel by the author of "I Am Jonathan Scrivener."

Tropic Seed. By Alec Waugh. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

The illegitimate son of a French seventeenth century nobleman goes to sea, leads a mutiny, and is stranded with the captain on the coast of Haiti, among a group of freebooters; later he takes a wife, founds a family, and thereby precipitates a series of consistently interesting incidents about his descendants who play various roles in the curious history of Haiti. The novel is not extraordinary, but it has a firmness to it lacking in most chronicle novels that are more ambitious. Unfortunately, it ends with a loud cymbal-crash of comment. Both Waugh brothers seem addicted to the vice of such endings.

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, is the author of "Machines and Men in Russia."

W. H. GARFIELD is the pseudonym of a financial writer.

LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS contributes verse to various periodicals.

NORMAN J. WARE is professor of economics at Wesleyan University.

HORACE GREGORY, author of "Chelsea Rooming House," will have a new volume of verse published in the fall by Harcourt, Brace, and Company.

H. W. GARROD, fellow of Merton College, was formerly professor of poetry at Oxford University.

FELIX MORROW has contributed articles to the New Republic, Symposium, and Menorah Journal.

KENNETH WHITE is a writer of book reviews for various literary periodicals.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is in the department of anthropology at Northwestern University.

□ OPEN SHELF □

Henry George's Books
Soid here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men - sent free.
None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.
ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
15 Park Place, New York City
SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

□ EDUCATIONAL □

CONVERSATIONAL FRENCH

Spanish - Italian - German

Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

FRENCH Spanish, Italian, German, Russian, Conversational. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c. Daily 9-9. Fisher School of Languages, 1264 Lexington Av. (bet. 85-86 Sts.) Est. 1905. AT-water 9-6075.

HELP WANTED

ENGINEERING SALESMEN. Two young men, preferably with knowledge of steam engineering, wanted to sell in New York on liberal commission well advertised specialty in industrial field. Write fully Box 737, c/o The Nation.

POSITION WANTED

COLLEGE WOMAN, returned from Orient, secretarial, literary, teaching experience, seeks positions. Speaks Chinese, French, German. Box 739, c/o The Nation.

□ FOR RENT □

FURNISHED APARTMENT

35th ST., 32 E.—To responsible literary couple or 1 or 2 ladies, sublet at substantial reduction for part-time literary work: attractive three room apartment, real kitchen; roof. Aug. 15 to September 3. $25.00 with free electricity and gas. Phone mornings CAledonia 5-6967.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

Widely travelled newspaper woman, share with business woman or couple, 6 attractively furnished sunlit front rooms. Newly decorated. Frigidaire, piano, privacy. 79 St., subway, drive, elevated, surface, bus. Unusual opportunity. Susquehanna 7-8725.

ROOMS—FURNISHED

TWO ROOMS, kitchenette and bath. Home-like atmosphere for steady tenant. Convenient location. Reduced rate. Mrs. Norf, 47 E. 30th St., New York City.

STUDIO WANTED

LARGE skylight studio wanted: ceiling 15 ft. to 20 ft. high; bedroom, bath, kitchen. Within easy communication of Hudson tube to Newark. Price about $60 monthly. M. Friedman, 265 Seymour Ave., Newark, N. J.

PERSONAL

THE American Gymnosophical Association offers membership to intellectual men and women of cultivated taste. Our facilities are a private gymnasium and swimming pool in New York City; a lovely 60 acre farm in New Jersey; calisthenics and games under expert teachers. Kindly send 10c postage for further particulars. Address Box 705, c/o The Nation.

"OUT OF step with the world!" mourned an isolated intellectual. Since joining Contacts, he found hundreds of mentally isolated, debunked freethinkers, unwilling to gosestep to predigested beliefs. Rare books loaned. Send 3c stamp to Contacts, 211 East 11th Street, N. Y. C.

□ SUMMER RENTAL □

WESTPORT, CONN.

Bungalow to Labor Day or longer. Suitable party of adults. Unusually attractive rental. Also Cottage and garage, Oct. to May. Tel Westport 6397.

TO THE LANDLORD:

Do you want tenants for your house or apartment?

THE NATION has a select reliable group of readers who look to our real estate columns to help them find new living quarters.

We know this from the many letters received from advertisers telling us how pleased they are with the results from their advertisements.

Why Not Try These Columns?

Rates: Minimum, 1/2 inch, $3.08

1 inch, $6.16

10% discount for ten insertions

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street New York City
Tel. COrtlandt 7-3330

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 31, 1932

No. 3504

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	181
EDITORIALS:
Rebels Without Ideas .....	184
Free Trade at Ottawa .....	185
Mr. Hoover Economizes .....	185
TROUBLES IN INDIA. By Richard B. Gregg.....	186
REPUBLICAN HANDSPRINGS. By Paul Y. Anderson.....	188
CAN PHILOSOPHY COME BACK? By Benjamin Ginzburg.....	190
LISTEN, MR. PRESIDENT— By Sherwood Anderson.....	191
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .....	193
CORRESPONDENCE .....	194
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Time of Mountains. By Thomas Hornsby Ferrill .....	195
The Case of Paul Scheffer. By Louis Fischer .....	195
Mr. Priestley Spreads a Net. By Alice Beal Parsons.....	196
Toward Decent Housing. By Clarence S. Stein.....	197
"He That Endureth." By John Cournos .....	197
Shorter Notices .....	198
Films: Madness from Hollywood. By Alexander Bakshy.....	198
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE .....	199

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

DRAMATIC EDITOR

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

MARGARET MARSHALL

LITERARY EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN H. L. MENCKEN MARK VAN DOREN

LEWIS S. GANNETT NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

JOHN A. HOBSON ARTHUR WARNER

MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT HAS WON himself many friends in recent weeks by the calm dignity, skill, and thoroughness with which he has conducted the investigation of the charges against Mayor Walker. It would be impossible to imagine Mr. Hoover conducting a similar investigation with equal ability. As a campaigner, the Governor has also shown himself quick to take advantage of the rich opportunities for exposing the inaction, the hypocrisies, and the absurd assurances and prophecies of his opponent in the past three years. When in his speech at Columbus the Governor turned from criticism to his own program of remedies, however, he revealed the weakness and vagueness that have characterized him in this direction from the beginning. He proposed more drastic regulation of securities and of holding companies, but did not say what specific measures he would recommend. Even the New York Stock Exchange is more strict in its requirements for listing investment-trust securities, for example, than New York State is in permitting their incorporation or the sale of their securities. He proposed federal regulation of stock and commodity exchanges, but he did not say either what the regulations should be, or why he has never, as Governor, suggested their enactment in New York State, where the principal exchanges already are. He proposed "vastly more rigid supervision" of national banks, but made no mention whatever of State banks, which account for 85 per cent of all the bank failures of the past ten years. He did not advocate that State banks be compelled to enter the Federal Reserve system, and he said nothing of the record of his own State, particularly with reference to the Bank of United States.

He proposed the separation of investment banking and commercial banking, but did not say why New York State has not attempted to use its own powers in this direction. His lack both of courage and of solid understanding laid him open to an easy reply from the right by Representative Snell and a more searching reply from the left by Norman Thomas.

THE MOST DEPRESSING FIGURES that Americans have had to read in the past two years have been the official reports of employment published monthly by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. Those figures have now reached a point that would have been considered utterly fantastic and incredible had anyone dared to predict them in 1929 or even in 1930. The number of employees in more than 63,000 manufacturing industries, representing every important branch of factory employment, fell off 3 per cent in July to 55.2 per cent of the average level in 1926. Pay rolls were cut even more drastically. They declined 6.1 per cent in July to only 36.2 per cent of their 1926 level. Put in plainer words, this means that nearly one-half of all the men and women normally employed in factories have been laid off, and that the actual income of those remaining at work is hardly more than a third of the normal income of factory workers. These are the crucial statistics of the depression. Here is what that depression finally means in human terms. But these shocking figures do not seem to impress American newspapers. Almost nowhere are they considered front-page news. The New York Herald Tribune could find the space for less than four inches of type about the matter under its six-column report of the entire text of a routine campaign speech by Secretary Mills. The New York Times, to its credit, printed two columns on the report, but was apparently unable to print it on the front page because still another airplane had crossed the Atlantic and the assistant mayor of New York had said some uncomplimentary things about the comptroller. But when in the face of these official figures the United States Employment Service, under the direction of Secretary Doak, issued two days later an utterly misleading statement about the "expansion of industrial activity" in July, which on examination turned out to be mere vague cheerfulness without statistical support, the Times found room for this on its front page, and the Herald Tribune was convinced that the subject called for three-quarters of a column.

FIGURES OF THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL Conference Board supplement those of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. The board's figures do not go beyond June, but they show for that month a decline of 5.6 per cent in number of men employed as compared with May, and a decline of 42.8 per cent as compared with June, 1929. Average weekly earnings even of those remaining employed fell during the month 5.4 per cent to $16.24, a decline of 43.4 per cent in the average weekly pay envelope from June, 1929, when weekly earnings averaged $28.69. After it has allowed for a reduction of 22.2 per cent in living costs in the meantime, the board finds that "real" weekly earnings have still declined 27.3 per cent for those remaining in employment. Hourly wage rates, in spite of all the pious announcements against their reduction, have come down 15.3 per cent in the three-year period. With this employers' organization supplementing the federal government's own report to the effect that at least four men out of every ten employed in 1929 are now walking the streets, what becomes of President Hoover's astoundingly complacent announcement that "there shall none suffer from hunger among our people?"

BURLINGTON
PUBLIC
LIB.

WHY MUST WE GO TO SCHOOL to study economics when we can learn all we ought to know from Vice-President Curtis? In his speech accepting renomination he disclosed a number of astonishing discoveries concerning the current economic depression. For example: "If the farmer cannot sell, he cannot buy. Likewise, if American laborers are unemployed, they cannot buy, and when these two cannot buy there is a decline in the demand for American-made goods and American products." Certainly not even the most brilliant of our professional economists can quarrel with that. But Mr. Curtis occasionally makes a mistake. He said that "the present Administration has taken active steps to put hoarded and idle money in circulation. The records show that it has been successful." Mr. Curtis offers proof: The currency in circulation in October, 1929, amounted to $40.23 per capita; by October, 1930, it had fallen to $36.30 per capita; but by June, 1932, it had risen to $45.50. Thus, when business was brisk there was less money in circulation than when business was dull. Of course, the average citizen did not need as much currency in June of this year as he did in 1929; the fact that he did have more shows that he must have been hoarding a part of that money. As an additional argument for the reelection of the Hoover-Curtis ticket the Vice-President declared that although there had been "a temporary but severe decline" in the foreign trade of the United States "as a result of the world depression, yet in 1931 our exports were still valued at the tremendous sum of $2,424,000,000, compared with only $1,370,000,000 in 1900." If this argument is sound, then we ought to sweep the Democratic ticket into office, for in 1920, the last year of the last Democratic Administration, our exports were valued at $8,439,474,000, "compared with only $1,370,000,000 in 1900."

"PUDDLER JIM" DAVIS, Senator from Pennsylvania, is in trouble again. The man who was Secretary of Labor "under three Presidents" has been indicted by the Federal grand jury in New York City on charges that he violated the lottery laws. According to the United States District Attorney's office, the indictment was brought against Davis because of his position as director-general of the Loyal Order of Moose, which is alleged to have conducted two lotteries. However, the same office said it has evidence that the Pennsylvania Senator received sums in excess of $100,000 as his share of the profits of the lotteries. Leaders of other fraternal organizations were indicted at the same time, including Conrad H. Mann of Kansas City, said to be a personal friend of President Hoover. Mann is an official of the Fraternal Order of Eagles. Tickets amounting in value to $5,000,000 were sold in various lotteries which federal agents have been investigating since February. It was reported that the prize-winners received only $225,000 of this amount. Senator Davis, though not without some difficulty, was finally able to refute charges brought against him some time ago that he had received stock in a sugar company at about the time the Senate was considering a change in the tariff on sugar. He is confident that the present charges likewise "will prove false." Unhappily, Davis is running for reelection in November, and he fears that the indictment may influence the voters against him. In view of the fact that the investigation leading to the indictments was undertaken by Republican officials, it seems unlikely that the action of the grand jury was politically inspired.

THE REVOLT AMONG THE MINERS of Southern Illinois, which we discussed last week, seems likely to create a situation similar to that which has obtained in the coal fields of Kentucky for the past two years. There have already been several killings in Illinois—a local union official, who opposed not only the operators but also the State and national leaders of the United Mine Workers, was murdered in front of his home. When a committee of university students who wanted to investigate conditions in the Southern Illinois fields approached the town of Mount Vernon they were turned back by deputy sheriffs from Jefferson and Franklin Counties and by State troopers. Five members of the committee were held under arrest overnight and then released on condition that they never return. A sixth member, Reverend Victor Siverts of Meadville Theological Seminary, who was arrested without formal charges being placed against him, at this writing had not yet been released. Meanwhile, the authorities were holding several units of the State militia in readiness in anticipation of disorders in the Bloody Williamson country. The national guard was mobilized when 15,000 miners marched upon Taylorville to persuade 500 men who had resumed work in the Peabody mines there to join the rebel strike. The Taylorville miners were among the few who accepted the new wage scale which John L. Lewis tried by personal fiat to force upon the 30,000 Illinois mine workers after they had twice rejected the proposed scale. This time it appears that the Lewis leadership in Illinois will be permanently broken.

GERMANY'S FINANCIAL PREDICAMENT has been overlooked in the excitement attending the recent elections. Now that the political campaigns appear to be over for the time being, it is discovered that the German economic situation has been growing steadily worse. There has been a slight improvement in some lines of business activity, but this has been more than offset by drastic declines elsewhere, especially in foreign trade. The export surplus in July was valued at only 66,000,000 Reichsmarks, and that for June at less than 79,000,000 Reichsmarks. This is far from sufficient to meet the service on Germany's foreign debts, which requires a monthly outlay of at least 140,000,000 Reichsmarks. The domestic trade situation, particularly as reflected by railway earnings, has also declined. A few leading bankers and industrialists believe that a trade revival is imminent, basing this belief on the boom in Wall Street, but their confidence is not shared by the ordinary citizens of Germany. In fact, through June and July there was a marked increase in withdrawals from savings accounts by small depositors, one financial report describing these withdrawals as "menacingly heavy." For the government the most important problem at the moment is that of raising additional funds for unemployment relief, but it can think of no way of doing this except by printing more money. The government at the same time has been deluged with appeals for assistance from many municipalities in the industrial sections which have incurred huge deficits in feeding those among their own unemployed who are ineligible for federal relief.

A NEW JAPANESE DRIVE toward Mongolia has begun, and this time the Japanese militarists appear to be in earnest. They have invaded the province of Jehol, which they consider an integral part of Manchuria, though the Chinese themselves have never looked upon it as such. Their ostensible purpose is to effect the rescue of Gonshiro Ishimoto, a military intelligence officer who is imprisoned in Jehol. But many observers believe the invasion of this province, which borders Mongolia proper, is simply the next step in a prearranged campaign of conquest which Premier Tanaka hinted at five years ago. Moreover, the Japanese are again attempting to distract the world's attention by crying out against the resumption of the anti-Japanese boycott in Shanghai. It will be remembered that Japan invaded Shanghai last spring quite clearly for the sole purpose of keeping the world's interest centered on that city and away from Manchuria, where Japanese troops were "consolidating" their position. Lastly, the necessity for "pacifying" Mongolia was discussed not more than a month ago by General Sadao Araki, Minister of War, who is generally considered the real power behind the present government. Writing in the Army Club's monthly magazine, he said:

There is every possibility that Mongolia may prove a greater barrier in the way of Japan's mission of peace and order than Manchuria ever has been. It is no idle boast to declare herewith that if there is anything that would dare obstruct the way for the propagation of Japan's mission of peace, the Japanese would be ready, in spirit at least, to make away with it.

"SWEET LAND OF LIBERTY" is the title the American Civil Liberties Union places on its latest annual report, which has just been published. But the report shows that despite the uncertainties and the feeling of insecurity arising out of the economic situation there has been no marked growth in official repression of civil or human rights. Indeed, a majority of the correspondents of the Civil Liberties Union "thought that tolerance for minority movements had increased." This is most encouraging. We hope it signifies a genuine change in the attitude of the authorities. But of this we cannot be sure, for the report itself suggests that the apparently more liberal attitude of the authorities can be attributed to the fact that the workers and unemployed generally have remained meek and orderly. On the other hand, in Pennsylvania, Michigan, and Kentucky, where radical agitators have been more active and unrest widespread, violations of civil rights have increased. Even in discussing the country as a whole, the Civil Liberties Union does not, of course, mean that the millennium is approaching. It cites a long list of cases wherein civil rights have been violated in almost every field of human endeavor. Moreover, it declares that apart from official lawlessness, "an extraordinary crop of mob violence arose during the year, all directed against radicals. It is the first year for a long time in which such acts of violence have been so numerous or widespread." The "most active agents of repression" during the year, the report asserts, were the American Legion, lawless police, the D. A. R., and various employers' associations.

AN ASTOUNDING EXAMPLE of the official lawlessness which the Civil Liberties Union is attempting to combat was only recently presented in the police court in White Plains, New York, when forty-two spectators at a trial were arrested without warrants on the suspicion that they were aliens who had entered the country illegally. They were attending the trial of Helen Jackwin, accused of unlawful assembly because she had spoken at a street meeting of the local Unemployed Council without first obtaining a permit. Just before the trial started City Judge Francis R. Doherty ordered the court chamber cleared, saying he wanted to get more fresh air, although the windows of the chamber were wide open at the time. The spectators went into the corridors, where forty policemen placed those who looked like foreigners under arrest. They were taken to police headquarters and there questioned, without benefit of counsel, by agents of the Department of Labor. Eight of the spectators who could not produce citizenship papers were promptly sent to Ellis Island for deportation. In protesting against this unlawful action, the Civil Liberties Union declared in a message to Secretary of Labor Doak: "So far as we can learn the raid was made without warrant. Many persons not aliens were taken into custody. In all our experience this is the first time we have ever heard of a raid on a courtroom."

LAUREL AND HARDY, those two quiet but violent film comedians who regularly reduce to complete and satisfying destruction any movie set in which they are turned loose, to the complete and satisfying amusement of their numerous admirers, have been visiting Scotland. The following account of their arrival in Glasgow is reprinted from the sedate columns of the Manchester Guardian:

There were extraordinary scenes in Glasgow shortly before midnight last night when Laurel and Hardy, the comedians, arrived from Edinburgh.

In the stampede in the Central Station nine people were severely injured by crushing and were taken to the Royal Infirmary, while a number of others were treated in the ambulance-room on the station.

Fully 8,000 people crowded the station. The visitors were literally carried off their feet, and were so powerless in the crush that they were unable to prevent admirers from snatching small articles from their pockets as souvenirs. The white heather tied with tartan ribbon, which they were wearing in their buttonholes when they stepped from the train, was quickly snatched away.

There was further excitement outside the Central Hotel, where a stone balustrade collapsed under the abnormal pressure. A man and a woman were injured by the debris, while others who ran to avoid being struck found themselves in the path of an oncoming tramcar, and in the further stampede which followed several persons were knocked down.

We merely wish to add that, so far as we know, the above "continuity" was not a motion picture.

Rebels Without Ideas

THERE is something profoundly pathetic about the "farmers' holiday" recently declared in the vicinity of Sioux City, Iowa. The farmers have "struck"; they refuse to send their products to Sioux City, and they are picketing the highways to prevent trucks from bringing other products in. The "holiday," they announce, will go on until they can obtain $1 a bushel for their wheat or until they are paid for their other products "cost of production plus a fair profit." The strike reveals the mood of desperation to which the farmers have finally been brought by the course of events, but it also reveals the lack of any concerted program, the lack of any thinking through of consequences, the absence, in brief, of fundamental economic intelligence.

What are likely to be the results of such a strike, if it continues? In so far as it is directed or can be directed chiefly against the residents of Sioux City itself, it may attain some measure of success. The farmers may be able to obtain slightly higher contract prices for their milk. That milk is of course being wasted during the strike, but a higher contract price might more than offset this loss. With eggs and perishable vegetables the results will be more dubious. The farmers will lose these during the strike, and when it is over, prices, if higher, will remain so only temporarily. With non-perishable vegetables the results may be even more unfortunate. At the end of the strike they will all be dumped on the local market at once, depressing prices for the time being more than ever. For products with a national market, like hogs and corn, or with an international market, like wheat, the strike will be completely futile. "Holidays" in such products could succeed only if they were nationwide or worldwide; when they fall short of that, the result must be that any price rise resulting from them must benefit those farmers who do not take part in the strike at the expense of those who do, for as soon as the strike is over, and the produce withheld is offered on the market again, the price, other things equal, falls back to the level where it was before. No permanent price increase can be brought about by mere withholding of goods; there must be a curtailment of production itself.

The rebellion of the Iowa farmers, therefore, is not merely destined to practically complete failure, but it deflects attention from whatever remedies are really possible. In the last generation the American farmer has shown something less than astuteness in perceiving where his real interests lie. His voice and his vote, for example, have been among the main supports of our prohibitive tariff. That tariff compels him to pay more for nearly everything he buys from the city. By cutting down what the outside world can sell to us, it cuts down equally what that outside world can buy from us, including farm products. By choking the channels of international exchange, it forces a contraction of export industries everywhere, and undermines world confidence. For years, however, the farmers have been bamboozled into supporting the tariff through their acceptance of the completely fallacious argument that it has raised American wages and the American standard of living. Many of the farmers were taken in even by the farcical tariffs on those farm products which we export on net balance. The farmer remains comparatively indifferent to the crying need for tariff reduction, and he seems impervious to any thoroughgoing radicalism. True, he has turned to all sorts of quack remedies—more "credit facilities," though he is already staggering under a load of unpayable debt; export debentures, and Farm Boards to support the world price of wheat and cotton. Recently he has been learning to see the futility of these, but he has still formulated no general program in place of them.

The same type of confused rebellion is seen in the recent history of the bonus army. Neither the men nor their leaders now know precisely what their aims are. Do they want a cash bonus simply for ex-service men, to be paid to those men simply because they have served in the army, and to be paid to them regardless of whether they are employed or unemployed, in need or not in need, wealthy or poor? Or do they want, really, not an ex-soldiers' bonus at all, but simply unemployment relief and unemployment insurance? This lack of clarity affects not only the men themselves, but their sympathizers. The bonus has been urged sometimes because the men are starving, sometimes merely because they are ex-soldiers. The "blue-shirt" movement and the "khaki-shirt" movement are clearer on the subject of color than in their general social philosophy. Only one actively rebelling group today has such a general social philosophy, and that is the Communists. But the American Communists are torn by petty factional squabbles; they are negligible in number, stupid in their tactics, and doctrinaire and unrealistic in their language.

The causes of the present impotence of American radicalism are complex, but surely one of them is the American political system as at present organized. The result of that system is pretty effectually to smother the growth or development of minority opinion. In Europe, with its parliamentary systems, protest can make itself felt quickly; there must be something approaching a genuine meeting of issues. In Germany and in France, proportional representation makes it possible for minority opinion to be represented in the legislature. Small parties can sometimes force the larger parties to bargain with them, or even to appropriate some of their planks. Participation in the legislature, by giving them a voice in the determination of immediate policies, compels them to develop a relatively realistic attitude toward current issues. In America, so hopeless is it for any but members of the two major parties to secure representation that minority groups must either be driven to the expedient of "working within" those parties, often becoming hypocritical in the process, or they resort to the type of futile and desperate gesture that the striking Iowa farmers have resorted to. But this merely brings us to a recognition, in turn, that the blame cannot be placed entirely on our form of political organization. It accounts for political apathy; it accounts for the present futility of radicalism; but it does not account for the lack on the part of radicals of a program at once intelligent, realistic, and farsighted. Until American rebellion adopts such a program, it is doomed to sporadic gestures and failure.

Free Trade at Ottawa

ON the surface at least it appears that the "press lords" of England—Beaverbrook and Rothermere—were the principal victors at the imperial economic conference which has just adjourned in Ottawa. Through the Daily Mail, Daily Express, and other publications, Lords Beaverbrook and Rothermere have for years been fighting for "empire free trade." They would develop free markets within the British Commonwealth and protect those markets by a system of high tariffs precisely as the United States has sought to develop and protect its domestic market. At Ottawa their idea was embodied in a series of twelve trade agreements concluded between the various members of the commonwealth. The agreements established a system of "preferences" for imperial products. In some cases these "preferences" amount to placing on the free list certain goods originating in empire countries and exported to other empire countries, while retaining or increasing existing duties on similar products originating outside the empire. In other cases imperial products will be taxed, but the same goods coming from other countries will be subjected to higher tariffs. It does not seem possible that tariff walls will safeguard the British Empire any more than they have helped us.

However, until we are acquainted with the details of all the imperial trade agreements—only summaries of ten of them have thus far been published—we cannot tell just what effect the system of "preferences" is likely to have either on imperial or on world trade. International commerce is bound to be further restricted if the Ottawa agreements, as seems likely, result in a general increase in tariff schedules by members of the British Commonwealth. Moreover, it may be that the differentials established between the duties on empire goods and those assessed against foreign products will, by further disrupting the normal flow of world trade, harm rather than help that trade. On the other hand, if detailed publication of the agreements shows that there is to be a general lowering of tariffs on the part of the British nations, the agreements are certain to benefit not only imperial trade but the commerce of the whole world.

The arrangement reached at Ottawa is far from perfect even from the imperial viewpoint. For one thing, it will increase the price of food in England. Denmark and other European countries have been able to undersell Canada and other dominions in the English market. Now Danish dairy products are to be barred by the new system of preferential tariffs, while Canadian products, which cost more, will be favored. Such an increase in the cost of the food the English working people must buy could only be justified to those workers on the assumption that the Ottawa agreements as a whole will stimulate trade and lead to higher wages. Again, England has agreed to favor Australia in buying frozen meats. But heretofore most of its frozen meats have been imported from the Argentine, where England has more than a billion dollars invested. What is to happen to these investments when the Argentine is shut out from one of its principal markets? The British Empire cannot help itself at the expense of world trade. Both must prosper together, and that can be achieved, not by partitioning markets, but by lowering artificial trade barriers.

Mr. Hoover Economizes

THE Chicago Tribune, despite its Republican inclinations, is at least consistent in its campaign against increasing government expenditures. It has not even spared the President of the United States. It was only a few weeks ago that Mr. Hoover made the front page of every conservative newspaper in the country with his announcement that he was voluntarily taking a 20 per cent cut in salary. Here was a direct saving of $15,000 a year to the taxpayers. Surely this was cause for rejoicing. But in its customarily relentless way, the Tribune, through Arthur Sears Henning, its Washington correspondent, proceeded to uncover and publish other and more pertinent statistics concerning Mr. Hoover's economizing. Mr. Henning found that "the executive office and maintenance of the White House are costing the taxpayers an average of $97,914 more a year under the Hoover Administration than under the last four years of Coolidge, and $184,094 more than under the Harding-Coolidge term." Mr. Hoover's four years will cost the country $2,114,217; the office and White House expenses of Calvin Coolidge from 1925 to 1929 ran to $1,722,560, while those of the Harding-Coolidge Administration amounted to only $1,377,840.

To a certain extent this increase in expenditures under Herbert Hoover is perfectly understandable. Mr. Hoover, as we recall, was elected in 1928 largely on the plea that he was one of the best of our Best Minds, and it is well known that great intellects must have a great deal of secretarial and clerical assistance. Thus, Mr. Hoover has required the services of no fewer than four secretaries, each of whom draws an annual salary of $10,000. Mr. Coolidge, being only an ordinary politician, somehow found that he could get along with a single secretary at $7,500, though Congress increased his pay to $10,000 the year before Mr. Coolidge retired to Northampton. We are quite sure the taxpayers will agree, if they can take their minds for a moment off the recent steep increase in taxes, that the elaborate Hoover secretariat has more than paid for itself.

Woodrow Wilson had three automobiles at his disposal. Mr. Hoover has eleven, two of which, one open and the other a closed car, are for his personal use. This is as it should be. One could hardly expect the President to ride in a closed car in pleasant weather, or in an open one when it is raining. And each of the secretaries, as befits his exalted station, has the use of a White House automobile. We could go on to discuss other expenses, the cost of maintaining the summer camp on the Rapidan, the enlarged White House police force, the $12,000 annual milk bill—which Mr. Henning did not mention, presumably because it would hardly have been discreet to call attention to the huge amount of milk being consumed in the White House when there were thousands of children throughout the country who were going without milk. But it would not be very polite to list all the items that went into the $577,179 which it cost us in the fiscal year just closed to maintain Mr. Hoover and his official family in the Executive Mansion. Moreover, we know that even in these days of falling prices and widespread unemployment capable and conscientious Presidents come high.

Troubles in India

By RICHARD B. GREGG

ON June 27, according to the London Times of June 28, Sir Samuel Hoare, Secretary of State for India, announced in the House of Commons in reference to the Indian problem that the government was now convinced that "the settlement of the urgent and important questions that still remain to be decided will only be delayed by formal sessions of large bodies such as the Round Table Conference or of such committees as the Federal Structure Committee." Instead, for the sake of speed and the financial safeguards, the government proposed, he said, to have a joint select committee of both houses of Parliament consult informally in London with "a few individuals whose personal experience qualifies them to speak with authority." Thereafter a new bill to change the constitution of India would be introduced in Parliament and eventually be enacted into law.

Sir Samuel Hoare further announced that the government's decision in the political dispute between Indian communities would be issued some time this summer; and that, as regards the Indian National Congress, the government "could not begin bargaining and negotiating with people who showed no signs of wishing to cooperate" along the lines of the British official policy. He also stated that so great an emergency still existed in India that the drastically repressive ordinances, due to expire on July 4, would be renewed.

On June 30 Viceroy Lord Willingdon promulgated from Simla a consolidation of the former four chief ordinances into one. Nominally only certain sections of it apply to certain districts of India, but any or all sections can be applied at twenty-four hours' notice in any district of India at the discretion of the local authorities.

The reaction in India to these announcements was rather emphatic. On July 8 Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and M. R. Jayakar, two leading Moderate delegates to the Round Table Conference, resigned from the Consultative Committee of that conference. This committee, made up of representatives of various groups in India, had been meeting from time to time in India under the chairmanship of the Viceroy to discuss various questions not settled at the conference in London. Messrs. Sapru and Jayakar stated that the announced change of procedure was a change of substance as well as of form; that it was an abandonment of the Round Table method, and therefore a violation of assurances, which they quoted, made by former Viceroy Lord Irwin on November 1, 1929, and July 9, 1930, by Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald on December 1 and again on December 2, 1931, and also by Lord Lothian on December 9, 1931. A few days later another Hindu Moderate member of this committee, N. M. Joshi, also resigned, giving the same reasons. The London Times of July 29 reports that "Dr. Moonje also is believed to be disposed to withdraw . . ."

On July 9 and 10 thirteen Hindu Moderate delegates to the Round Table Conference met in Bombay and unanimously refused to cooperate further with the government in working out the new constitution, unless and until the government resumes the Round Table method. They notified the government of their decision. The council of the Indian National Liberal Federation, with about thirty members present at the meeting on July 10, unanimously approved this action of these delegates and also unanimously resolved to refuse further cooperation with the government for the same reasons. The thirteen non-cooperating Round Table delegates were: Sir Chiminlal Setalvad; Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru; Srinivasa Sastri; M. R. Jayakar; N. M. Joshi, a prominent labor leader; Rangaswamy Iyengar, editor of an important Madras daily, the Hindu; B. V. Jadhav, a member of the Non-Brahman Party which is strong in South India; Shiv Rao, another labor leader; M. Ramchandra Rao; Cowasji Jehangir; Phirose Sethna; S. B. Tambe, a former acting governor of the Central Provinces; and C. Y. Chintamani, president of the Indian National Liberal Federation. Subsequently, three other Round Table delegates who were not at the meeting telegraphed their adherence to the resolution. These were J. N. Basu, Mr. Barooah, and the woman delegate, Mrs. Subbaroyan.

These events in India produced editorials adversely critical of government policy in the Manchester Guardian and the New Statesman and Nation of London. On July 13, at the final session of the House of Commons, Sir Samuel Hoare explained the new plan further and said that the Indian Moderates had entirely misunderstood him. In describing the kind of Indians that the government proposes to call to London for consultation, he said, according to the Times of July 14, that "He was afraid that they would not be of a representative character, any more than were the members of the Round Table Conference. They had been dealing all along with prominent individuals, and they would do so again." This admission hardly squares with the former British allegations with regard to the representative nature of the Round Table Conference. This speech only brought caustic comment from Moderates and others in India.

Recent reports from India state that the action of the Moderates has been indorsed by Indians of many different shades of opinion, including Sir Abdur Rahim, a Moslem member of the Indian Legislative Assembly and a leader of the Independent Party in that body; the Indian Merchants' Chamber; the prominent business men, Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas and G. D. Birla, both delegates to the second Round Table Conference; and the strongly communalist Bengal Moslem, A. H. Ghuznavi, who is also a member of the Consultative Committee. The full reports of all these Indian criticisms show a deep, strong, and very widespread undercurrent of resentment and bitterness at the cruelly throttling ordinances and their tyrannical administration.

Another element of the prevalent feeling was expressed by C. Y. Chintamani, president of the National Liberal Federation, in a speech reported in the Bombay Chronicle of July 12:

If there were differences between Indians they were differences not in the aims and objective but merely regarding the method to be employed which will carry them in the easiest and quickest time to the goal. . . . There are many who are not advocates of direct action and there are many who are opposed to direct action, but I doubt if there is any respectable number of Indians, to whatever school of politics they may belong, who are not moved to sympathy, which they did not feel before, for those who, howsoever wrongly advised, have been braving so much in the cause of the liberty of the country. (Applause.)

Even the British business men of Bombay and Madras believe that the government has made a mistake. The London Times of July 22 carries a dispatch from Calcutta saying, "European opinion in Calcutta is not in harmony with that in Bombay and Madras, where the local branches of the European Association have urged virtually complete concession to the Indian Liberal attitude. The general feeling in Calcutta is that Sir Samuel Hoare's latest statement should meet Indian objections."

On July 15 Lord Irwin was taken into the British cabinet as president of the Board of Education. This called forth a bitter editorial against Mr. MacDonald and Lord Irwin in the Tory Saturday Review of July 23 which said, in part:

Why stretch party loyalty so far on the rack as to make this appointment? And why put an edge on resentment by making it in a hole-and-corner manner? . . . It is beyond human nature that, in the cabinet, he (Lord Irwin) should not interfere with India. And his intervention is almost bound to be disastrous. His appointment . . . dismays and disheartens true Conservatives, on whose forbearance Mr. MacDonald makes almost savage demands.

Perhaps this appointment was made in the hope of placating Indian opinion, or perhaps, as suggested in the Indian Review (London), for July 23, to strengthen the more far-sighted imperialism of the MacDonald-Lothian-Irwin group as opposed to the die-hard variety of the Hoare-Willingdon-Churchill group.

The London Times of July 25 carried a dispatch from Simla saying, "It is held to be almost certain that the Consultative Committee will end at an early date with its remaining tasks unfinished." Another Simla dispatch in the Times of July 29 repeats this forecast and adds that "within the next fortnight or so a new announcement on the 'formal consultation' in London on the constitutional reforms will be made." But it is not likely that the government will yield what the Moderates demand, partly because it would seem like a confession of weakness before Indian Moderate pressure and also because probably the British Government does not want another big Indian show in London which would result in focusing world opinion once more on its doings and failures in India during the past six months.

For it is clear that British policy there has failed. The renewal of the ordinances is a confession of the failure of repression; while the non-cooperation of the Moderates and its consequences show that the British efforts at constitutional reform have not received enough support in India to make them workable, even among those outside the Indian Congress. These non-cooperating Indian Moderates have practically no following in India, but being able men they count with opinion in England and other countries. Their defection now takes away the appearance, which was only appearance, of considerable Indian support for the British program; from now on, the autocratic nature of British policy in India is clear—a state of affairs which is not comfortable for the government and for many liberal-minded Englishmen.

But that is only part of the trouble. The government is nervous about the results of the decision it has been obliged to make in the quarrel between the place-seekers of the various religious communities over their shares of legislative and administrative posts and spoils. Lord Peel and Lord Meston have voiced this anxiety openly, and Sir Samuel Hoare has three times intimated it in public speeches. The Moslems have been very aggressive in their demands, and many die-hard Tories in England and some of the government bureaucracy and British business men in India have encouraged the Moslems. Witness the report in the London Times of July 8 of a meeting presided over by Sir Reginald Craddock in furtherance of the "Muslim Basic Demands," and the report of E. C. Benthall to some British business men of Calcutta, published in most of the Indian papers last April. But the government could not yield to all the Moslem demands. That would have started so many quarrels between Moslems and existing officeholders belonging to other Indian communities as to endanger the working of the huge clerical and administrative staff of the government; and, moreover, there are probably not enough technically trained and educated Moslems to fill satisfactorily all the positions they are demanding. So the award is sure to cause great dissatisfaction probably among all the communities but especially among the Moslems and Sikhs.

Already the All-Indian Moslem Conference is rocking under the strain. Early in July its secretary, Maulvi Shafi Daudi, resigned because the president, Sir Mohammed Iqbal, as a result of Sir Samuel Hoare's announcement of June 27, postponed a meeting of the executive board of the All-Indian Moslem Conference called for July 3. At that meeting preparations to boycott the government were scheduled to begin, in accordance with resolutions of the conference adopted last April. A large section of Moslems are impatient and bitter over the government's tactics.

The London Times of July 29 says that "Manifestos have been issued even by responsible Sikhs threatening bitter opposition to the government if the award displeases them"; while the Times of August 2 carries a dispatch from Simla saying that "During the week-end the Sikh 'council of action,' consisting of seventeen members presided over by Tara Singh, met at Shadara and decided to begin recruiting volunteers."

The communal award was issued by Prime Minister MacDonald on August 16. It retains separate electorates for Moslems and creates new separate electorates for untouchables and women, despite the fact that all of the women at the Round Table Conference told the Franchise Committee that they did not want separate electorates and that the majority section of the untouchables have also asked for joint electorates. Separate electorates for India were condemned in the Simon Report. The Ormsby-Gore Report on Ceylon said, "We have come unhesitatingly to the conclusion that communal representation is, as it were, a canker in the body politic, eating deeper and deeper into the vital energies of the people, breeding self-interest, suspicion, and animosity, poisoning the new growth of political consciousness, and effectively preventing the development of a national or corporate spirit." The Donoughmore Commission on the constitution of Ceylon (1928) repeated this condemnation, and added that once it is started "the desire for communal representation tends to grow rather than to die down." It is very clear, therefore, that the British Government is once more playing the old policy of "divide and rule." This time it may not work. Mr. MacDonald offers to accept any settlement that the Indian communities may agree to before the new constitution is enacted by Parliament, but as Gandhi and the other Congress leaders are to be kept in jail till after that, and people like E. C. Benthall are ready again to play the communities against each other, the government's offer is not quite so fair as it looks.

Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald, in his Empire Day radio broadcast late in May, was reported to have said that "There can be no doubt but that during the past year very formidable obstacles have been put in the way of an Indian settlement by Indian Congress methods." And Sir Samuel Hoare, in his speech to the House of Commons on July 13, was reported in the Times to have admitted that "We have not had too easy a time either here or in India since last December." Gandhi was jailed on January 4 and most of the other Indian Congress leaders have been imprisoned since then. Lathi beatings and other forms of governmental "firm action" have gone on apace. Yet the Indians have remained predominantly non-violent. The longer the repression lasts the deeper and more widespread grows the Indian bitterness and disgust with British government. The obstacles begin to look still more formidable. Indian unity increases while British unity decreases.

Republican Handsprings

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, August 20

WE learn from Republican editors and their trained seals that President Hoover's scramble for reelection was vastly accelerated by his speech of acceptance. Only those gifted with supernatural powers can know to a certainty whether this is true, but it is difficult to perceive the logic of it unless on the theory that you can fool a majority of the people enough of the time. The public is notorious for a short memory, but four years is not so long, and surely there are millions who have recognized in the speech a sweeping repudiation of the one which the same candidate delivered in 1928. The effect produced by a comparison of the two—and some newspapers have unkindly made it—is simply comical. The man who assured us four years ago that "the poorhouse is vanishing from among us," now confesses rather pitifully that "being prosperous, we became optimistic." He declared then that "an adequate tariff is the foundation of farm relief"; now, after signing the highest tariff act in history, he says that "no power on earth can restore prices [of agricultural products] except by restoration of general recovery and markets." The candidate who boldly proclaimed from Palo Alto that "every man has the right to ask of us [the Republicans] whether the United States is a better place for him, his wife, and children to live in because the Republican Party has conducted the government," now laments that "they would be more than human if they were not led to blame their condition on the government in power." Of all his flops, however, the most ignominious was that on prohibition. On this burning issue the poor, distracted nominee actually changed his position in the space of two months. It has been repeatedly stated that his speech was wetter than the party platform plank. But let us not forget that Mr. Hoover dictated the platform plank—dictated it, and had Ogden Mills and Dr. Garfield ram it down the throats of the squirming delegates over the loud protests of Senator Bingham and Dr. Butler. Afterward he became frightened over the popularity of the plank adopted by the Democrats and turned one of his familiar somersaults. Even then he was painfully silent on the early return of beer. Is it possible that anyone has failed to realize that he is simply seeking to placate the wets while clinging to the surviving dry vote? Such pussyfooting may succeed, but I shall await the proofs. Concerning his vague hints about new and unnamed measures through which he will presently save the country, one simply wonders why they have been delayed. The country has needed saving for some time. At any rate, he has served fair warning on the people that if they reelect him they may look forward to four more years of what they have now. To me the most interesting moment in the acceptance ceremony was that in which Bishop Freeman begged God in anguished tones to give the President "wisdom and courage." Amen.

* * * * *

SO much has been written and said about the tenderness of the Administration and the gallantry of the troops on that recent glorious occasion when unemployed veterans and their families were scourged from the District of Columbia with bayonets, gas, tanks, sabers, and fire that more might seem superfluous. However, every patriotic American should be given the privilege of experiencing that thrill of pride which he certainly will feel upon learning that while eleven-weeks-old Bernard Myers was lying in a hospital from the combined effects of illness and tear gas, the War Department dispatched an officer of the Chemical Warfare Division to the baby's bedside to prepare an alibi for the army in case the baby died. It did die, the alibi was successful, and another stirring victory was recorded for American arms. Bernard, suffering from summer complaint, was gassed on the night the troops drove the veterans and their women and children from the Anacostia camp. The gassing did not occur in the camp, but in the yard of an Anacostia home where the frantic parents with their sick infant had found what they assumed to be sanctuary. It occurred during those wild midnight hours when the infantry harried thousands of veterans and spectators through the streets of that suburb, raining gas bombs on them as they fled. "With unparalleled kindness and humanity"—to use Secretary Hurley's beautiful and descriptive phrase—some unknown hero in uniform tossed a hissing bomb into the yard where Bernard's parents stood with other men, women, and children. The child, held in its father's arms, got a heavy dose, became violently ill, and was taken to a municipal hospital. Next morning attendants stated it was too soon to tell how much the infant's condition had been aggravated by the experience, but added succinctly—and it would seem reasonably—that “the gas certainly didn't do it any good.” Twelve days later it died. The parents' plea for an inquest was denied when a hospital official explained: “We found no trace of gas in the child's body. It was suffering from gastro-enteritis, a stomach disorder.” Asked what traces he would normally expect to find in the body of a baby which had been tear-gassed twelve days earlier, the official hastened to explain that his statement was not based on his own knowledge, but on what he had been told by an officer of the Chemical Warfare Division of the War Department. He then related how, after accounts of the gassing had appeared in local newspapers, the officer had come to the hospital and examined the little victim. He told the doctors there that if the child had been gassed its body would be covered with “a rash,” and no such rash was present. That satisfied the doctors, and they satisfied the coroner. An inquest was forestalled, the nation was safe, and all of us were privileged once more to thank God that the ragged men who were bombed out of the capital on July 28 had succeeded twelve years earlier in preserving us against the horrors of Prussian militarism!

* * * * *

ON the other hand, the country's mounting reaction to the events of “Bloody Thursday” has inspired a mortal fear among those who were responsible for them. The panicky attempts of Hoover, Hurley, and General MacArthur to make a “Communist uprising” out of the massacre have failed ludicrously, despite the strenuous assistance of Attorney-General Mitchell and a member of the local judiciary. Their efforts to persuade the public that a high percentage of the marchers were “reds” and men who had never served under the flag were rendered ridiculous by the careful and detailed statistics of General Hines, Administrator of the Veterans' Bureau, showing that of 8,000 men whose histories were examined by his office only 500 failed to produce war records, and approximately two-thirds had served overseas. Every one of the supposed Communists held for investigation was discharged for lack of evidence. At Hoover's request a grand jury was impaneled. To prevent any possible mistake Attorney-General Mitchell placed one of his assistants in charge of the inquiry, and the presiding justice, in his instructions from the bench, went to the incredible extreme of expressing a “hope” that the grand jurors would find that “the mob guilty of actual violence included a few ex-service men, and was made up mainly of Communists and other disorderly elements.” Residents of Washington who offered to testify to brutality on the part of the troops were not called. The set-up—which if devised for the benefit of a lesser personage than the President would certainly be called a frame-up, seemed airtight. But something mysteriously slipped, and the grand jury put a climax on the whole fiasco of the attempted “red” scare by failing to mention Communists in its report, and by indicting three men, all of whom were wounded overseas and one of whom holds the Distinguished Service Cross for heroism in rescuing wounded comrades under fire! Meantime the grand jury had received from one of the veteran leaders an affidavit charging that the actual violence was precipitated by government agents disguised as veterans. Although the grand jury ignored this sensational accusation, police disclosed that members of the army intelligence service had been planted in the camps for weeks, and it was learned that several private detectives had been discovered by the veterans and ejected. When the asinine Royal Johnson, South Dakota Congressman, rushed to rescue the Administration with a flamboyant announcement that dynamite had been found in the Anacostia camp, the police promptly explained that the veterans themselves had reported the discovery and the destruction of the small quantity of dynamite to which Johnson apparently alluded!

* * * * *

AS the bloody episode recedes into the past, virtually every item of new evidence sharpens the sinister aspect of the part played by the Administration. By the time Congress meets the demand for a Senate investigation should be irresistible. Then perhaps we shall learn what plans were laid at that fateful White House conference attended by Hurley and MacArthur. Then perhaps we shall learn what caused Commissioners Crosby and Reichelderfer to inform the President that troops were required—a few minutes after General Glassford, chief of police, had told them that troops were not needed—if, in fact, they so informed the President. A Senate committee should be able to ascertain how many army spies were planted in the camps and what their orders were. It can inquire about the sudden decision to clear the Pennsylvania Avenue camp site in order “to make way for new buildings” and “to give employment to the unemployed,” but where, as we now know, no new buildings are to be erected and where, at this moment, the principal sign of activity consists in half a dozen Negro laborers pecking mortar off bricks. Meantime, I suppose, such official prevaricators as Presidential-Secretary Ted Joslin will continue to state unblushingly that “no one was injured after the troops came”—although the Washington papers of the following day carried lists of the casualties on their front pages, with descriptions of their injuries and the names of the hospitals to which they were taken. The fate of General Glassford will be watched with intense interest. That brave and brilliant soldier-policeman succeeded for several days in postponing the fatal conflict which had been decreed in higher quarters, and has since been the chief obstacle to the Administration's efforts to pin the tag of communism on the poor, hungry men who had fought for their country in 1917-18. Of this fact the Administration is fully aware, and it appears that General Glassford has been saved thus far only by his tremendous popularity. He is far from safe. No one should be surprised if some horrendous “discovery” is made concerning him. This business has the Administration worried almost to death, and there is plenty of evidence that it would stop at nothing. Since the departure of Bishop Cannon, the defection of Colonel Mann, and the disappearance of good old Claudius Huston, many have asked who would plan the Hoover strategy in this campaign. Appearances suggest that it is being devised by a private detective agency of the type which supplies strikebreakers and procures “evidence” in divorce cases. Incidentally, one of the saddest men in town is Pat Hurley, who was all set to be the principal spellbinder. Now his colleagues are anxiously debating the wisdom of allowing him to appear before any audience where there is the slightest possibility that someone will interrupt to shout: “Who gassed the babies?”

Can Philosophy Come Back?

By BENJAMIN GINZBURG

OUR age has not been an age of philosophy, and in fact the very idea of philosophy as an intellectual discipline is held in disrepute in many countries, particularly in the United States. One has only to compare the amount of newspaper interest devoted to a congress of philosophers and that devoted to a congress of scientists.

Were philosophy a specialized art or a specialized science, one might accept its present low status as one of the vicissitudes of time and wait for a turn of the wheel. Thus at certain periods a particular science such as physics has been in the ascendant among the whole group of sciences; at other times biology has been in the ascendant and physics has been almost backward. This does not raise a problem, any more than the fact that one age has specially cultivated music while another age has cultivated the plastic arts.

But philosophy cannot be regarded in that light. It is not a specialized discipline, but a general approach to human experience. For this reason its present backwardness must mean either one of two things. Either the philosophical approach is thoroughly and radically bankrupt, and humanity should actively abandon philosophy as a useless and mischievous dissipation of energy; or else it is not the philosophical approach that is bankrupt, but social and cultural conditions, in which case it becomes our duty to sound an intellectual call to arms.

Nearly a hundred years ago, Auguste Comte formulated a law of history which in effect doomed philosophy as an obsolete method of thinking. First, he said, there came the theological stage of thought, then the metaphysical, and finally, in modern times, the scientific stage. The implication of this law is that philosophy has now to give way to scientific specialization, and this has indeed been the feeling of modern times, although few have attempted to express this feeling in a reasoned intellectual form, in the manner of Comte. Only recently H. G. Wells gave public expression to this belief when he said that the value of science lay in the fact that it offered us an escape from philosophy and religion, both of which will eventually have to be abandoned as unsuitable for our essentially practical minds.

Widespread as this point of view is, it does not stand up under any sort of critical examination. In fact it is self-refuting as soon as it is recognized that knowledge and thought require not only analytic specialization but also synthesis and critical reflection on fundamental principles. It does not matter by whom this work of synthesis and reflection is carried on; the point is that it is an essential part—if not the most important part—of the intellectual process, and that this phase of the process has a different look and different characteristics from those suggested at the moment of specialization and quest for facts. Critical reflection cannot of necessity possess the same character of fixity and positiveness as scientific fact-finding in which no questions of principle are involved.

It may be said that the whole idea of regarding the knowledge process as the dividing up of a field into so many specialized scientific homesteads grew up at a time when the fundamental principles of science were for the moment so stable that they did not need to be discussed or criticized. But in a period of accelerated scientific progress, like the present, it becomes apparent that there are no fixed fundamental principles, and that the scientific process taken as a whole involves philosophic reflection on fundamental categories concurrently with the quest for specific facts. Einstein confesses that he derived the idea for applying a new geometry in physics from reading the philosophic writings of Henri Poincaré, who in turn followed out a line of critical inquiry begun by Kant. Similarly, the German physicist, Max Planck, concludes a survey of the new quantum physics with the advice that physicists consult the views and ideas of the great philosophers on the problems connected with determinism and causality. Obviously, the advice was not offered on the theory that philosophers possess some power of mystical illumination not given to experimental scientists. Rather was it given with the realization that the experimental facts involve fundamental categories whose relationship had been the subject of reflective study by the great thinkers.

Once it is recognized that even natural science involves philosophic criticism, the whole perspective with regard to the social sciences must undergo a radical change. A great part of the energy of social scientists has been spent not in collecting facts or in systematizing principles, but in a sort of mad attempt to run away from philosophical ideas in order better to live up to the stage conception of science. A recent historian of experimental psychology publicly admits that experimental psychologists have sought to run away from philosophy and have in consequence merely passed off bad philosophy under the label of scientific psychology. But instead of asking psychologists to master the philosophic problems involved in their science, the same historian wants psychologists in the future to leave philosophy completely and severely alone. If physicists have been able to get along without worrying about what the philosopher says, why should not the psychologists? The answer is, in the first place, that physicists have not been able to keep entirely away from philosophy; and, in the second place, that in psychology there happens to be less natural leeway for routine specialization without philosophic reflection than in the physical or biological sciences. What is true of psychology is true of all the social sciences as a class.

In addition to the value of philosophical criticism in connection with both the natural and the social sciences, there is the far more important value of philosophy in crystallizing the spirit of social disinterestedness and idealism, on which all ethics, all orderly life in society must depend. Thought, consciousness, is not merely a tool for achieving greater knowledge of the external world and for helping us to manipulate external objects more successfully; it is also the source of that movement of unification between man and man which tempers our biological selfishness to fit a framework of ideal interests and social sympathies. In the past this function of unifying idealism was fulfilled by religion, which is after all a rough and rather naive philosophy of human experiences. Today religion has broken down, largely because its institutional commitments prevent it from modernizing its ideas in line with the progress of scientific knowledge. But while religion has broken down, it does not follow that the need of crystallizing a moral and social consciousness has disappeared. Quite on the contrary, the need is greater than ever because we can no longer count upon the passive inertia of habit and custom, or upon the instinctive fear of the supernatural to instil a semblance of order in human affairs. Today men need to be convinced by reason, and the only type of reason which is here convincing is to show, both by logic and by example, that man as a conscious being has interests far transcending his biological appetites. And who can undertake such a demonstration and its practical application in concrete problems except the philosopher who is interested in studying the total place of reason in human experience and who has no commitments except to seek the truth?

No, it is not because the philosophic approach is bankrupt, or because philosophy has no longer any functions to fulfil, that philosophy does not flourish today. The reason is in part the intellectual confusion that has developed around the success of science, but in greater part it is the mechanization of social life, which has intensified the practical struggle for existence and has left less and less place for disinterested thought and disinterested leadership. Human nature is about the same as it has always been; there are the same idealistic instincts as in the past. But the important fact is that it is harder to make a living today. It may indeed be harder to philosophize today because of the increase of man's knowledge and perspective, but even before the stage of thought is reached, it has become tremendously more difficult to put oneself physically in a position to think honestly and disinterestedly. And in this problem of making a living, disinterested thinking is quite useless—useless to the individual as an economic weapon for gaining a living and meaningless to a public that is exhausted with economic cares. Science, to be sure, constitutes an exception to the rule, but it is only by accident that disinterested scientific thinking has been fitted into the economic machine.

In the case of philosophy it is idle to suggest that society accept philosophy as an economic calling and that it endow more philosophic chairs in the universities. For while science can flourish as an endowed specialty, philosophy is too closely connected with the social consciousness to be able to exist as a specialized calling unsupported by direct public participation. The condition of philosophy at the universities today is a mute testimonial to this truth. Philosophy has become a museum specialty, a lifeless play of systems and concepts to which the public can point in derision to justify its contempt for it. Philosophy will not flower until our present high-strung economic life gives way to a regime in which it will be possible to cultivate the love of wisdom.

Fortunately there are signs that our economic Frankenstein is due to break down from its own internal weaknesses. The fate of philosophy is thus tied up with the fate of social reform. And it becomes more than ever the duty of those who can muster disinterested thought at a time when such thought is at a premium to work for a new society, a society in which there will be room for reason and in which the Administration will be in the hands of reason.

Listen, Mr. President—

Norfolk, Virginia, August 11

Mr. Herbert Hoover
President of the United States
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am an ex-soldier, an ex-laboring man, a native American, now a professional writer. Yesterday I came to Washington with a group of writers to protest the treatment given the bonus army in Washington. Coming to a President of my country to voice such a protest isn't a thing I like to do. With me it is like this: I am intensely interested in the lives of the common everyday people, laborers, mill hands, soldiers, stenographers, or whatever they may be. It may be because I, myself, come out of the laboring class. I was born in a poor family, I am still poor. I understand that you also were once poor.

Being a writer I am inclined to lead a quiet life, going about and peering into the corners of life. It happens that for the last four or five years I have spent most of my time in a cheap car going about to factory towns in America, going into the homes of poor farmers, into the houses of workers in mill villages. I haven't been doing any kind of propaganda. I have been looking, watching, finding out what I could about American life.

I came yesterday to Washington to speak to you, came as a delegate from a group of American writers and intellectuals. I did not want to come. I had no desire to make you uncomfortable. It was your birthday. You were receiving friends. You were preparing your speech of acceptance of renomination as President. Political advisers were, I dare say, flocking about. That is your life—perhaps it has to be your life. I am not criticizing it. I came with the other writers because I was myself uncomfortable.

Mr. President, I've been seeing at first hand the condition of men out of work in America. I have been walking with them, talking with them, sitting with them. To me, although they are men and women out of work, they remain fellow-Americans. I have been seeing things with my own eyes: men who are heads of families creeping through streets of American cities eating from garbage cans; men turned out of houses and sleeping week after week on park benches, on the ground in parks, in the mud under bridges. The great majority of these men are eager enough to work. Our streets are filled with beggars, with men new to the art of begging.

I came to you with the other writers because I was ashamed not to come. When men are starving I am ashamed not to speak up. When men are trying to assert their rights to live decently in America, trying to organize to assert more effectually their human rights—when these men are brutally put down by police or soldiers—bear in mind I have seen these things with my own eyes—when that happens something within me hurts and bleeds.

What I am trying to say to you is that men like me do not want to be radicals. I am, myself, a story-teller. I would like to give all my time and thought and energy to story-telling. I can't.

I am wondering, Mr. President, if men like you, men now high in our public life, captains of industry, financiers—the kind of men who seem always to be closest now to our public men—I am wondering if all of you are not nowadays too much separated from the actuality of life. Everything has been very highly organized and centralized in America. Perhaps you have been organized and centralized out of our common lives.

I have an idea. It may amuse you. I think we Americans ought to elect two Presidents. For example, let you and Mr. Roosevelt both be President for the next four years. They may prove to be eventful years. Let you serve, say for three months, and then let Mr. Roosevelt have his term. In the interval you come out of your White House and away from your political advisers, industrial magnates, and bankers, and spend the time with me. We will get into my cheap car and live for a time as millions of Americans live now. Together we will walk at night in city streets, into houses of workers, into parks and camps where the unemployed gather, into a thousand places you have never seen. When you go back into your Presidency I will then take Mr. Roosevelt for his turn. It will be educational to you both. I swear it. Incidentally it may turn out to be the most interesting three months of your life.

As it happens, Mr. President, not all of my friends are poor or unemployed. I know personally a good many rich and powerful Americans, and I know that something quite dreadful does happen to all of you rich and powerful men. You do get horribly separated from actuality. I guess you can't help it. Recently I was staying in the house of a rich man, a friend—as kind-hearted a man as I know. One evening I heard him talking. Do you know, Mr. President, that he did not think that the present depression was so bad. He spoke of it as a passing thing, not of really great importance. I remember how I felt as he talked. There was no personal dislike of the man. I love him, but he did not know, does not himself feel what life has made me feel. Several times I went out of his house to walk alone, and often within a few blocks I saw men, often young men, eating from garbage cans, sleeping on benches, always tired, always hungry. Seeing nothing in the future but more of the same.

I have seen and talked to many poor farmers who are now losing their little bits of land, who are now poor, destitute, and discouraged. There are little things that happen to a man. I spoke of my heart being made to bleed. Your heart would be made to bleed also, seeing what I have seen. Recently, within the year, I was walking one day in a wood. It had rained. The ground was wet. I went silently. Suddenly I heard a voice. I crept forward. There was a little Virginia farmer kneeling by a fence at the edge of the wood and praying. Tears ran from his old eyes. I crept away without being seen, but afterward I inquired. He was just a hard-working poor American farmer who had a big family and who had got into debt, and whose little farm was to be sold. He did not know where to turn. He was frightened, hurt, and perplexed, kneeling there and crying to God. He is not an isolated figure. He represents, as I have pictured him here, millions of Americans now.

You, Mr. President, and myself have a good deal in common. We were once both poor boys, both came from poor families. You went the road of money-making, of power-getting, and I went another road. Just the same, if I know anything at all, I know that we are both perplexed. When the group of American writers of whom I was one went recently to Washington to try to speak to you personally of all these things, it is true that we made a point of the treatment recently given to the perplexed soldiers who have been camped down there. That is what they were—perplexed men. Think of the promises we Americans made those men but a few years ago.

This is my own attitude. Before going on this fruitless mission to Washington to try to see and talk to you personally, hoping, perhaps to take to you a little cry out of the masses of people, I went to see some of the Communist leaders. The idea that they had any effect on the mass of soldiers in Washington is absurd. It is a joke, Mr. President. It is true that some of them went to Washington to try to work there among the soldiers, but they, themselves, told me that they could do nothing. "We couldn't touch those men." I think they told me the truth. Newspapermen and many citizens of Washington have told me how, all the time they were there, they went about flag-waving and begging. They demanded so little from their government, after all the things that had been promised them, that the situation was laughable.

When we writers came to Washington you would not see us. A Mr. Theodore G. Joslin, one of your secretaries, I believe, did finally see us. He told us firmly and finally at once that you would not bother to see us. Then an amusing thing happened. He was a bit nervous and pale. He said he did not speak to us for you or as your secretary, but as a fellow-American and a fellow-writer. He seemed to me a rather pathetic figure at that moment. He lectured us like a lot of schoolboys. The import of what he said was that the trouble at Washington, in regard to the bonus army, was that the men weren't soldiers. We were given the idea that the distraught men that had come to Washington were really Huns. They went about attacking police and trying to tear down government. They threw stones at harmless soldiers. You would have thought that the soldiers and police were unarmed rather than these distraught, puzzled men out of work—the same men who but so short a time ago were our national heroes.

Mr. President, after this absurd incident in Washington, on your birthday, we writers separated. I went to see a friend. We had a talk. He is not an unsuccessful man as I am, but is very successful. He said that, even in Washington, you were utterly separated from the reality of life in America now, so surrounded by yes-sayers that nothing touched you. He suggested to me an idea. He said that when you were in the Far East, when you were making your fortune, you handled coolies. He said that you had come to think of most of us here in America, who happen to be poor or out of work, as coolies. He thought you believed in the whip. That is what we came to Washington to protest against, Mr. President—the whip. Its lash is falling across the backs of millions of Americans. It is the lash that is making radicals in America.

I return to my suggestion. If my notion that we elect both you and Mr. Roosevelt is absurd and you are reelected I suggest that you take that vacation. Sneak out of the back door at the White House some evening. Let me take you with me for a few weeks so that you may see with your own eyes what is happening to millions of Americans, what American life is becoming.

SHERWOOD ANDERSON

In the Driftway

FALL has come in New England. And the Drifter, who watches the seasons as jealously as any farmer, happened to be there when the miracle occurred. On Tuesday summer was in full bloom. Indolent breezes moved over the meadows and up the hill. The voice of the crow was mild in the mild air. Except for one sprig of unmotivated red on a maple tree, the permanence of summer was indisputable. Woods and grass were greener than August usually finds them. The dusty light of midsummer was spread over the hills at noon. Fall apples hung firm on their stems. At night the full white moon rose in a cherry tree close to the house.

* * * * *

ON Wednesday a strange cool breeze came up the hill and did not stop. From being lingering and soft, the wind we had known all summer had suddenly become brisk and purposeful. It whisked through the old house like a new broom sweeping out summer; it caught up dead leaves from obscure rock crevices and whirled them at an autumn pace; it turned up the silver side of leaves, promising rain, and an apple dropped, portentously, in the orchard grass. A subtle, unmistakable constriction in the air affected the crow's tone, making it sharper and forlorn. The sky took on the liquid deep blue of skies over mountains where winter is never far away. Fall roses that had come inconspicuously into bloom assumed a new importance, and golden rod and purple milk-weed, though they had been there before, seemed suddenly to crowd the roadsides. The late rich sunlight was drained of summer; the shadows that lay across it were long and cool; in the evening the hills to the north were as purple as asters.

* * * * *

THE sun is still hot in New England. But the days are like mountain days—the sun seems hotter because the shadows are full of north wind. With the nights gone cold, gardens no longer grow but only ripen. The grass does not need cutting any more, and the primary colors of summer flowers are fading before the burnished shades of autumn. At night the moon coming up keeps her cold distance far beyond the cherry tree. Inside, the fireplace that has yawned wide and useless all summer becomes indeed a place for fire, a refuge from the shivering air.

* * * * *

THE red maple twig was after all a sign. And if the Drifter is reproached with welcoming autumn before summer has departed, his reply will be that autumn, like spring, comes first to the mind.

THE DRIFTER

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

DULUTH FREE PRESS

DULUTH, MINN.

LIBERAL WEEKLY

Specializing on Peace, Prohibition and National Economics

Official Organ of the War-Check Vote, Inc.
Weekly Article by Dr. Thos. Hall Shastid on The War Check-Vote and Other Peace and War Subjects. Editorials by Frank Ostman. Occasional Book Reviews.

Sample Copies, 5 cents. Per year, $2.00.

How does the ordinary man meet his economic problems under Soviet regime?

THE SOVIET WORKER

by Joseph Freeman

A comprehensive analysis of the employee's life and work in the U.S.S.R. $2.50

LIVELIGHT INC. PUBLISHERS 10 West 41st Street, N.Y.C.

SCHOOLS

NEW YORK WIGMAN SCHOOL . . . OF THE DANCE

Under Mary Wigman's personal supervision . . . Courses for dancers, amateurs and teachers at the only official American school to teach the Wigman method of the modern dance . . . Hanya Holm chief instructor.

Fall term starts Oct. 3rd . . . Enroll Sept. 26th to Oct. 1st . . . Daily classes during August & September.

113 West 59th Street, Steinway Bldg., N. Y. C.

PICKERING COLLEGE Newmarket, Ontario, Canada

A residential school for boys located 25 miles from Toronto, in heart of rural Ontario. Offering academic instruction of high standard. Boys prepared for Canadian and American Universities and business. Departments of Creative and Manual Arts, and Vocational Guidance, allowing for development of individual interests and capacities. Founded by Society of Friends, and adapted to modern conditions. Liberal in outlook, modern in equipment. Enrolment limited to 125. Fees $650.00—$700.00 (Canadian). School re-opens September 15th. For detailed information regarding Courses, methods and details of scholarships and bursaries, write The Headmaster, Joseph McCulley, Newmarket, Ontario, Canada.

THE NATION ON W E V D

Henry Hazlitt

will speak on

Literature and Economics

Wednesday, August 31

8:15 p. m.

Campaign News

by

Oswald Garrison Villard

Mr. Villard has been a keen observer of American politics for more than thirty years. From now until the election he will write in The Nation regular signed comment on personalities, issues, and tactics in the present campaign. His articles will be vivid, informed, intensely interesting. Don't miss a single campaign issue of The Nation.

NEXT WEEK:

First of a series of articles on
The Show Business
by Joseph Wood Krutch

13 weeks for $1

THE NATION 20 Vesey St. NEW YORK

For the enclosed $1 please send The Nation for 13 weeks to Name .....

Street .....

City .....

8-31-32

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Correspondence Brains and Brawn

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: V. F. Calverton's interpretation of "Max Nomad's" volume, "Rebels and Renegades," it seems to me, is not the meaning intended by the author. The philosophy is "Nomad's" own, and not Wacław Machajski's. He merely mentions this when referring to Trotzky; he gives it no importance.

The rebels he psychographs—outside of Malatesta, Trotzky, and Foster—were always known to sociologists as "intellectuals," agents of state capitalism, a method of keeping the workers in order for the benefit of the bourgeoisie. But the "rule" by the intelligentsia alluded to by "Max Nomad" will come after the overthrow of the capitalist profit system by the proletariat; it will be a final one. In brief, it is a biological matter. The proletariat will have their day—and pass away.

It simply means that brains will eventually rule brawn. The Sons of Mary will dictate the policies of the Sons of Martha. Indeed, almost every page of "Nomad's" book carries ridicule of the radical proletariat and its ultimate aspirations. Those who will take charge are Veblen's "engineers." Bernard Shaw called them "the energetic and conscientious minority." (Ruskin's Politics.) And Marx and Engels knew, and taught, that "the dictatorship of the proletariat" was but a passing phase in the Hegelian concept.

San Francisco, August 1

H. KENDALL

Prohibition in the Small Town

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Home Friend Magazine, with a national circulation of over a million concentrated in the small towns of America, and edited and published expressly for the women of those districts, recently conducted a contest for its readers with prizes offered for the best letters on the subject, Has Prohibition Been Effective in Your Community?

At the outset we felt, since the small town is usually considered to be far removed from the evils of prohibition as felt in the larger cities, that the majority of the letters would be in favor of the continuation of prohibition. Great was our surprise when we discovered that 93 per cent of the letters were in favor of repeal and expressed the opinion that prohibition had failed. Only 7 per cent of the letters were for continuance. Moreover, a large majority of those who favored repeal were women who originally had lent their efforts to its adoption.

Kansas City, July 15

IRENE LOIS COWAN

Paul Y. Anderson

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to record my interest and delight in the articles of your Washington correspondent, Paul Y. Anderson. His mordant satire and keen criticism with respect to the futile Administration at Washington are constant pleasures to me. I am not sanguine enough to hope that Mr. Anderson's honest portrayal of the ineptness and tragedy of the White House will have any effect upon election results in a so-called democracy. But they certainly are refreshing.

Portland, Ore., August 6

H. A. LEADER

Books and Films

Time of Mountains

By THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL

So long ago my father led me to
The dark impounded orders of this canyon,
I have confused these rocks and waters with
My life, but not unclearly, for I know
What will be here when I am here no more.

I've moved in the terrible cries of the prisoned water,
And prodigious stillness where the water folds
Its terrible muscles over and under each other.

When you've walked a long time on the floor of a river,
And up the steps and into the different rooms,
You know where the hills are going, you can feel them,
The far blue hills dissolving in luminous water,
The solvent mountains going home to the oceans.
Even when the river is low and clear,
And the waters are going to sleep in the upper swales,
You can feel the particles of the shining mountains
Moping against your ankles toward the sea.

Forever the mountains are coming down and I stalk
Against them, cutting the channel with my shins,
With the lurch of the stiff spray cracking over my thighs;

I feel the bones of my back bracing my body,
And I push uphill behind the vertebrate fish
That lie uphill with their bony brains uphill
Meeting and splitting the mountains coming down.

I push uphill behind the vertebrate fish
That scurry uphill, ages ahead of me.
I stop to rest but the order still keeps moving:
I mark how long it takes an aspen leaf
To float in sight, pass me, and go downstream;
I watch a willow dipping and springing back
Like something that must be a water-clock,
Measuring mine against the end of mountains.

But if I go before these mountains go,
I'm unbewildered by the time of mountains,
I, who have followed life up from the sea
Into a black incision in this planet,
Can bring an end to stone infinitives.
I have held rivers to my eyes like lenses,
And rearranged the mountains at my pleasure,
As one might change the apples in a bowl,
And I have walked a dim unearthly prairie
From which these peaks have not yet blown away.

The Case of Paul Scheffer

By LOUIS FISCHER

I HAVE always regarded Paul Scheffer as a brilliant journalist. Certainly he has an interesting mind. But all that glitters is not gold, and what was or seemed excellent newspaper work in 1924 and 1927 becomes history of doubtful quality in 1931. The moral is that a writer for the dailies should think twice and revise three times before reprinting ancient articles.* Considerable repetition, misspelled proper names, and two wrongly dated and therefore misleading articles are only some of Scheffer's minor transgressions. A greater sin is the lack of coordination between the articles he contributed to the Berliner Tageblatt during his seven years in the U. S. S. R. (1922-29). One article sometimes contradicts the other. In December, 1927, for instance, Herr Scheffer asserted that the Trotsky opposition was a "widespread movement." He intimated that Trotsky had so strong a following among the workers and was gaining so much ground that Stalin evidently hesitated to suppress him. But in his very next contribution, sent from Moscow on January 6, Herr Scheffer had to retract, for the leaders of the opposition, Trotsky included, had been banished to Asia and the entire opposition crushed. He therefore commented that the "opposition was primarily a group of 'has-beens'"; and "the expulsion followed as a matter of course." Such contradiction (of which I could cite other illustrations) is pardonable in day-to-day reporting, but not helpful in a book which claims serious attention.

A far more serious error is Scheffer's failure to remold his journalistic products in the light of more recent information and more recent events. For instance, he devotes Part III of his book, exactly a hundred pages, to the story of the opposition. Yet on close analysis one discovers that the most important facts in that historic struggle are omitted. Scheffer brilliantly illuminates Trotsky's personality, and demonstrates that he occasionally had excellent and speedy news sources in Moscow. But the real causes of the Trotsky-Stalin combat remain unrevealed, and I venture to suspect that Scheffer misunderstood them. The philosophic basis of the split which rocked the Communist Party was Trotsky's doctrine of "permanent revolution." Scheffer makes no attempt to fathom the meaning and implications of this dogma. Yet it determined Trotsky's attitude to the world revolution, to the Chinese revolution, to the Soviet peasant question, and to the subject of "building socialism in one country." Scheffer's sometimes clever treatment of the opposition misses all these points. His treatment shines but does not radiate light. I am confirmed in my impression that Scheffer did not grasp the true inwardness of the Trotsky-Stalin war when I read that whereas Trotsky believed that radicalism at home could go hand in hand with moderation abroad, Stalin insisted that two such policies were incompatible. Scheffer is exactly 100 per cent wrong. He has put Stalin in Trotsky's shoes and vice versa. How can he say Trotsky preached "a compromise with the bourgeois world," when Trotsky wanted to communize the Kuomintang nationalist revolution, thus inevitably antagonizing the whole bourgeois world? Did not Trotsky demand the abolition of the Anglo-Russian committee which constituted a bridge between Russia and the British reformist trade unions? Trotsky's stand was in conformity with his principle of "permanent revolution." Stalin, on the contrary, has put into practice ever since 1927 a policy of coexistence between the capitalist and Communist worlds. That Scheffer failed to see this is startling. Certainly it throws doubt upon the value of much that he has written about Russia.

* "Seven Years in Soviet Russia." By Paul Scheffer. Translated by Arthur Livingston. The Macmillan Company. $3.

Herr Scheffer might have done more editing. He did some. He chose some articles for reproduction and discarded others. I miss, for instance, his famous article, reprinted in the Observer of December 8, 1929, wherein, fresh from Moscow, he sensationally announced that "events in the Soviet Union [were] steadily moving toward a crisis" because the towns and villages were starving. "Millions of peasants in certain provinces will suffer from real famine." Collectivization was making matters worse. "Thus the crisis of the Soviet system," he wrote, "is at root an agrarian crisis. It is so grave that it threatens the very existence of the regime." The old story of the overthrow of the Soviets. And further: "Under Soviet economics agricultural production is on the road to ruin." Apparently Herr Scheffer did not foresee that Russia's next two harvests would be the best since the revolution, and would enable Moscow to become an important factor in the world grain market. This was made possible by collectivization, not by unusual weather, as Scheffer claims in his book. For the weather this year was bad, yet grain collections exceeded those of the previous harvest. In Herr Scheffer's eyes, however, collectivization spelled ruin. He even saw the possibility that the "Communists' house will crash down on those who dwell in it." The staid Observer felt justified in giving this article wild captions: "The Crisis of Fate"; "Stalin and Gathering Shadows." Scheffer himself had ridiculed the persistent prophets of evil who untiringly predicted the fall of the Soviet Government. Yet when the Soviets ruffled him personally, he threw sober judgment to the winds and joined those "official and unofficial experts, who for eight years past, as a matter of habit, every three or four months have been promising the collapse of the Soviet regime and gaining in authority and prestige at every postponement"—except that Paul Scheffer does not gain in authority or prestige by reason of what he has written about Russia since he left Russia. Quite the contrary.

The case of Paul Scheffer has made history in the little world of journalism. I believe Moscow was mistaken in barring him from the U. S. S. R. in 1929. By this time events would have changed his mind. Or he would have departed for less interesting capitals on his own volition. I want to speak frankly. Many people have said that Scheffer shifted from a pro-Soviet to an anti-Soviet attitude after he married his charming Russian countess wife. This is a superficial view. The root lies deeper and has general significance.

As late as 1926 Scheffer charged the London City with the organization of an anti-Soviet international financial boycott. Subsequently, he showed that he swallowed completely the Bolshevik argument that England was preparing to smash the Soviet regime. In November, 1926, England "plods doggedly on in its effort to paralyze Soviet Russia internationally, and the Russians are right in seeing in the effort a preliminary step to a united front." He condemned the Arcos raid as "not . . . a very pretty page in the history of English civilization." How is it, then, that this same Scheffer who in 1927 and 1928 wrote like a Soviet propagandist—at least as far as foreign relations were concerned—and whose cordial attitude toward Moscow had not been cooled by Communist propaganda in China and Germany, or by countless admittedly irritating "incidents" in Soviet-German affairs between 1923 and 1928, suddenly turned against his seven-year friends, discovered in 1929 only that Comintern agitation threatened Europe, and began a campaign against American recognition of the U. S. S. R.?

This is the answer: Scheffer was a NEP-friend of bolshevism. He came to Russia when the NEP first asserted itself. He left when the NEP went into eclipse. Although he knew—and this is decidedly to his credit—that the NEP was not a permanent compromise with capitalism, he could not have imagined that Stalin would seriously endeavor to introduce socialism in 1929. It was Stalin's collectivization policy and the Five-Year Plan which sent Scheffer to Washington. The Vatican, as Scheffer himself explains, saw the coming change earlier, and hence in 1927 ceased its efforts to recognize Russia diplomatically. Now Mr. Scheffer and Father Walsh of Georgetown University, who conducted the Pope's first conversations with Chicherin, naturally occupy a common platform of anti-Bolshevist activity.

Scheffer, at bottom—and I do not say it disparagingly—is a German patriot. He sees a great deal through German nationalist spectacles. He, like Brockdorff-Rantzau, his noble Ambassador in Moscow, was convinced that Germany, faced by the reparations-exacting Allies, must seek salvation in co-operation with Soviet Russia. Scheffer tries to create the impression that toward the end Rantzau lost some of his faith in this creed. I cannot agree, and call to witness the letter to Chicherin which the count dictated on his deathbed. Silly Bolshevik tactics very probably angered the Ambassador at times, but he distinguished himself from many others by an ability to rise above petty details and personal pinpricks. In fundamentals he remained firm. Scheffer wavered. He must really have feared that Stalin's radicalism at home would end the Kremlin's moderate policy toward Germany. This was Scheffer's crowning error, an error which may ruin a life-work.

In May, 1927, Scheffer wisely formulated the proposition that "it is not in the interests of Germany that any changes on her east flank should be made at the expense of Russia." This raises the question of Poland. The thesis has many complicated implications, but the direct corollary is Soviet-German friendship. This thesis still holds. Scheffer was wrong in thinking that it would not. His government continues to think that it does. Germany's safety, especially in these dark days, demands warmth in the East as a counterpoise to hostility in the West. But when Scheffer was misled into imagining that the hand which had dethroned NEP—only partially dethroned it, incidentally—would also scrap the tradition of Soviet cooperation with Berlin, he trod the road to Washington which Baron Maltzan, the "father of the Rapallo treaty," had trodden before him.

One thing is significant: Scheffer's reports from Moscow were at least realistic; but the postscripts which he adds from Berlin and Washington are not. The longer his distance from the U. S. S. R.—that is, from reality—the more violent his anti-bolshevism. It is now several years since Scheffer left Russia. It has changed a great deal in that period.

Mr. Priestley Spreads a Net

Faraway. By J. B. Priestley. Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

IN this delightful yarn of three men and a girl in search of an elusive island in the Pacific, Mr. Priestley reverts to the mood and manner of "The Good Companions," but the new book is measurably better than its famous predecessor. This is not to say that "Faraway" is for all moods, or all times, or all readers. It is just one of those books which this reviewer, whose shelves are overflowing with books, couldn't be persuaded to sell or give away, a book that will bear many rereadings. Mr. Priestley makes no new discoveries, but he gives us back our own to us, from many points of the compass and many latitudes of feeling. He is as solid as a Yorkshire pudding, as delicate as Coppard. He can create the poetic William Dursley as well as the earthly Ramsbottom, volatile and enchanting Terry as well as Margery Jackson, of whom he writes:

She was one of those people—and they are usually women—who do not seem to have much imagination, who have a sense of fun but little humor and no wit, who appear to be completely cut off from the stimulations and graces and ecstasies of the arts, who have never entertained an idea in their heads and have no notion of what is happening in the world, and yet in some mysterious fashion give the impression of being ripe personalities who live full rich lives.

The genre of "Faraway" is a cross between that of "The Good Companions" and "South Wind." It is quite as brilliant as the latter, and quite as ploddingly affable as the former. It ranges as widely as "South Wind," and is more real. There have been moments in its leisurely perusal when I have said that Mr. Priestley was an author all dressed up with nowhere to go, by which I meant an urbane, intelligent, humorous, witty, eloquent, and perceptive writer who has not yet come seriously to grips with his art. But that he is a writer of exuberant talent who dwarfs most of his contemporaries, who can tell a good yarn which proves in the end to have been a cleverly constructed net to catch his most profound and his lightest feelings about life, that he can create astonishingly lively people and record delightfully the natural scene—of all this there can be no doubt.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Toward Decent Housing

Slums, Large Scale Housing and Decentralization. Volume III.

Published by The President's Conference on Home Building and Home Ownership, Commerce Building, Washington, D. C. $1.15.

MOST of the committees of the President's Conference on Home Building and Home Ownership reported ways of elaborating and perpetuating the past bankrupt methods of land subdivision and house-building, financing and selling. They neglected or dodged the fundamental housing problem—that is how to produce any modern type of shelter for those fifty million urban dwellers who cannot now be decently housed.

The Committee on Large Scale Housing, on the other hand, offered a new technique. In concise and definite terms it proposed the scrapping of pre-machine, individualistic methods. It would replace them by mass production that will take advantage of the economies of machine and factory procedure to produce complete integrated communities. This is to be done on the basis of sound investment rather than speculation. Thus housing will be modernized and costs and rentals lowered. But the committee does not claim that these methods in themselves are sufficient to make modern housing available to all the lower-income groups.

Two other reports indicate the fields in which the greatest need exists for large-scale housing: in the replacement of blighted areas or the building of new industrial communities. The report on Decentralization of Industry shows that the production of dwellings is an essential element in such decentralization. It neglects to note that housing for most industrial workers has not been and cannot be carried on on a self-supporting basis.

The Committee on Blighted Areas and Slums would replace these economic and social liabilities by large-scale replanning and rebuilding of whole districts. Although it admits the need of devising a suitable means of supplementing the financial resources of private enterprise with governmental aid, it has no definite suggestion to make. Like all the other committees that have given any thought as to how to care for those who now live in the slums, it is baffled by the problem. It is only able to suggest that these districts may be salvaged for the use of higher economic groups—and "present occupants of slum dwellings will be able to find suitable accommodations elsewhere." It is with this type of faith in a housing Santa Claus that American reformers have always dodged the fundamental problems of finding decent shelter for the low-income wage-earners.

CLARENCE S. STEIN

"He That Endureth"

Between White and Red. By Erich Dwinger. Translated from the German by Marion Saunders. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

WHETHER regarded as a human document, as a history, or as a work of art—if by art we mean able writing which intensifies for us the reality of persons and happenings described and moves us by its truth and power—this chronicle is an achievement of importance. Of all the war books it is the most impressive, the most terrifying, and, one should add, the most vividly illustrative of the immeasurable folly which overtook the world during the fatal August of 1914 and is yet far from dissipated. More specifically, Mr. Dwinger's book deals with the epic of the German war prisoners in Russia who, unable to return to the fatherland, are caught up in the vast Siberian conflict between the Reds and the Whites, taking sides with one or the other as circumstance dictates, but, for the most part, having no real interest in either. Their one thought, after six years of unspeakable horror, is to return to their wives and children, from whom they are separated by time and space, and they do not even know if they are alive. Their one slender thread of hope enables them to endure almost incredible sufferings: cruelty, torture, hunger, intense cold; the sight of other human beings subjected to the most terrible punishments and degradation at the hands of sadistic monsters; or, still worse, being themselves forced to inflict horror on human beings they know to be innocent of any wrong.

The dilemma for the alien warrior drawn into this fraternal death-grapple is a fearful one. The author is with the Whites; but it hardly matters on which side you are. Woe betide you if you are caught by the other! If you are lucky enough to escape you are moved by accumulated reservoirs of hatred to inflict like horrors on your enemy, if you only manage to catch him. That is what you live for. Men of this type are the fortunate ones. What of the sensitive, tender-hearted men who, like the author, find it almost unbearable to inflict pain on another human being? Such men are eternally at the breaking point; yet they too learn "how much one can stand." For, in the final analysis, courage is the saving grace. On the other hand, there is the inevitable effort to find a meaning in it all; for one may suffer for an ideal, the chronicler says, but how find a meaning in sheer futility, on so colossal a scale? The author's pathetic visit to the insane asylum, where German war prisoners are confined, sounds almost symbolic:

Several of these creatures are crawling about on their stomachs, barking like dogs, or mewling like cats. One of them comes toward us in the posture of a Christ, with arms uplifted in blessing. "May the Lord bless you and keep you, may the Lord . . ."

And an old comrade "is still saying the same words he used to mutter in camp—the very same!" No, there is not so much difference, after all, between these creatures and the sane ones outside.

The long narrative gives the impression of a colossal nightmare, of mass insanity without an asylum; relieved by unforgettable touches of love, pathos, and pity. The episodic content of this volume is terrific; it is impossible to go into it here. Incidentally, there is an unusual portrait of Kolchak who, betrayed by the Allies, is represented as having been more sinned against than sinning. Two million corpses lie in Siberian soil because of European intervention; perhaps the Allied diplomats and generals think the result worth while.

JOHN CURNOS

Shorter Notices

Isabel. By Gerald Gould. Brewer, Warren and Putnam. $2.

A noted English critic in his first novel tries to establish that his heroine after whom the novel is named is a compound of beauty, wit, and understanding, as most Lady Bountifuls-of-the-bedside presumably are. He establishes that she is beautiful, for the reader cannot see her. But her wit is never demonstrated and her understanding appears moronic and profoundly irritating. High mucky-mucks in the financial world marry her or blow their brains out for her, or want her for themselves, which is asking too much. A very tiresome novel for a noted English critic to have written.

The Sonnets of Petrarch. Translated by Joseph Auslander. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

Love Rimes of Petrarch. Translated by Morris Bishop and Decorated by Alison Mason Kingsbury. Ithaca: The Dragon Press. $1.50.

It is interesting to compare these two books. Mr. Auslander's is, of course, much the more ambitious, and for the most part a very good translation of all of the sonnets of Petrarch. Mr. Bishop has translated only a handful of the sonnets and a few longer "rimes." But always if one compares the translation of Mr. Auslander with that of Mr. Bishop one finds that Mr. Bishop has held closer to the simplicity of diction and older manner of phrasing to be found in the original. These lines will illustrate Mr. Auslander's:

What miracle it is when on the grass
She sits like some white flower, or to her brave
Un sullied bosom will some green spray press!
How sweet, when April trembles from the grave,
To watch her, with her own thoughts, solely pass,
Weaving a garland in her hair's gold wave!

These, Mr. Bishop's:

It is a miracle, when in the grass
Like a flower she sits! Or when her candid breast
Is crushed against a bush, without her care!
How sweet it is, in Spring to see her pass
Alone, and by her lovely thoughts caressed,
Weaving a circlet for her golden hair!

Mr. Auslander's language and imagery are more modern and, in general, more lush; Mr. Bishop keeps the slightly archaic flavor of language and uses no elaborate images whatever—nor, for the most part, did Petrarch. Mr. Auslander's attempt is, of course, to give Petrarch to the modern reader, to make this reader appreciate both Petrarch's passion and his poetic facility. Mr. Bishop's book, beautifully printed and charmingly illustrated by Alison Mason Kingsbury, seems to be more of a labor of love written for personal delight.

The Samaritans of Molokai. The Lives of Father Damien and Brother Dutton Among the Lepers. By Charles J. Dutton. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.

Father Damien was a young Belgian missionary priest in Hawaii when he heard of the horrible conditions at the leper colony, and obedient to a self-sacrificing impulse, did what no other man then dared to do—went to work among them. His ministrations were chiefly physical. With energy unbroken by the disease with which he was soon infected, he built shelters for the lepers, prepared their food, dressed their sores, and put the colony in order. Brother Dutton, an American obsessed by a sense of sin, became a convert to Catholicism for the consolations its systems of penances offered. He was in his forties when he sailed to Molokai, worked for three years with Damien, and carried the work on after Damien's death. He died at the age of eighty-seven and, more careful than Damien, never caught the disease. Their careers are a remarkable evidence of the happiness and peace that come to some types of men through devotion to others. The book is interesting, but too much space is given to Dutton's early life, which could have been spared for a more detailed and more interesting account of how, under the care of Damien and Dutton, the colony turned from "a living hell" into one of the finest curative resorts in the world.

Home Is the Sailor. By Ruth Blodgett. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

On the warp of a slightly sentimental love story Miss Blodgett has woven a picturesque pattern of life in a Maine coast town from which the glory of clipper days has departed. In Mattamiskeag, known to its denizens as "The Gig," the filling station has replaced the rope-walk, and mustard and tansy flourish where the "Yellow Rocket" was launched. But Madam Grey, who took the signal halyard off the mizzen pin-board to hoist up "Mutiny aboard," is still alive at eighty-seven, and Quint Gray, once navigator on the China sea, is now skipper of the little river steamer. The E-Greys look down a bit on their blood relations, the A-Greys, and that is one reason why there are ripples on the course of true love for Madam's granddaughter, Elaine, and Quint's son, Alan. What holds one's interest in the Cranfordesque chronicle is not so much the story as the digressions. Miss Blodgett is a friend of her characters, never confusing quaintness with caricature, and her humor has no sting.

The Square Root of Valentine. By Berry Fleming. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

A moderately humorous fantasy about a clerk's search after "beauty" and "knowledge" in the streets of New York. Some of it reminds one of Norman Douglas's "In the Beginning"; some of it reminds the reader of any number of "escape" novels.

Films

Madness from Hollywood

WHEN the Marx brothers are in a picture, the picture is all in the Marx brothers. This means more than their own prominence. They could not, of course, be in a picture without making themselves its heart and soul, its center of interest. But it means that the other people with whom they surround themselves, though in the picture, are not of it. This is a pity. It makes the peculiar brand of lunacy which these gifted actors have made their own lose some of its point. It makes it appear as the mere antics of funny men, as pure clowning, where it could have been something far more interesting, a lunacy run riot and setting its entire little world on its head.

There is a suggestion of such lunacy in the opening scene of "Horse Feathers" (Rialto Theater). Groucho as the newly installed president of a college, after addressing the students on the benefits of education in his inimitable vein, breaks into a dance, and the entire faculty of solemn and bewhiskered professors follows suit in the mock style of a finale of a musical comedy. But the situation is not followed up. The students remain mere spectators in a show, and the professors are never given another chance to indulge in a few jolly capers of their own. Imagination staggers at the thought of what the campus life would have been like, had Groucho conducted a course on love with the expert assistance of the college widow who figures in the story, creating perhaps a few more widows from among the professors' wives; had Harpo been appointed to the combined professorship of dog-catching and harp-playing; and had Chico been made the head of the college speakeasy and a professor of bootlegging. But the Marx family makes no attempt to put college education on a sound basis. Instead it engages in a series of escapades which, mad and highly amusing as they are, do not amount to much more than just delightful fooling. Harpo's gags come off perhaps best of all. His method of catching dogs with the help of a butterfly net and a variety of portable lamp-posts to suit dogs of different sizes, and his drive around the football field in a garbage man's cart looking for all the world like a chariot driver of ancient Rome, are two of his happiest conceits. But I wish for once he had left out his solo number on the harp. It may be fine music, and it may be perfectly in its place in a vaudeville act, but it does not belong in a picture like "Horse Feathers." In fact, the main flaw in all Marx brothers pictures, if one can be so ungrateful as to pursue this subject, is the inability of these unique comedians to think of the film as being essentially different from the vaudeville stage.

"American Madness" (Mayfair Theater) also deals with madness, but of a different kind. The film relates the story of a bank conducted by an extremely able, honest, and likable president, but brought to the very brink of ruin when exaggerated reports of its losses cause the panic-stricken public to make a run on its funds. The story is sheer propaganda for the banks, and in some of its episodes falls short of the plausible, but it is skilfully told, capably acted, particularly by Walter Huston as the president, and directed with real distinction by Frank Capra. The scene of the run on the bank is film art at its best.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

RICHARD B. GREGG, author of "The Economics of Khaddar" and "The Psychology and Strategy of Gandhi's Non-Violent Resistance," spent nearly four years in India, living most of the time in the Gandhi colony.

SHERWOOD ANDERSON, author of "Winesburg, Ohio," "Dark Laughter," and other works, edits the News in Marion, Virginia.

BENJAMIN GINZBURG is the author of "The Adventure of Science."

THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL won The Nation's poetry contest in 1927.

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, is the author of "Machines and Men in Russia."

ALICE BEAL PARSONS is the author of "John Merrill's Pleasant Life."

CLARENCE S. STEIN, a New York architect, was formerly chairman of the Commission of Housing and Regional Planning of New York State.

JOHN CURNOS is the author of "The Devil Is an English Gentleman."

COOPERATIVE APARTMENTS

Amalgamated Cooperative Apartments accept applications for occupancy Sept. or Oct. 3, 4, 5 rooms available. Modern improvements include elevators, incinerators, electric refrigeration. Supervision, Board elected by residents and N. Y. State Board of Housing.

Uptown apartments in semi-suburban setting, surrounded by Van Cortlandt Park, Jerome Park Reservoir and Moshulu Parkway. Highest elevation in Borough. Public, High, Progressive schools, Hunter College, nearby. Kindergarten and Municipal golf links, tennis courts, other recreational facilities nearby. Cooperative food stores and services available. Monthly charges $9 to $12.50 per room. Investment required. Reached by Jerome Ave. subway, Moshulu Parkway Station.

Downtown apartments, heart of East Side, short distance from City Hall, financial district. Large rooms, full housekeeping facilities. Roof garden; shrubbery, flowers, fountains in large inner courtyard. Awarded 1930 gold medal for best apartment construction during year. Monthly charges $10 to $15 per room. Investment required. Reached by Madison St. bus from Chambers St., and Grand St. crosstown.

Amalgamated Housing Corporation
80 Van Cortlandt Park South
Bronx, N. Y. C.
Kingsbridge 6-4007

Amalgamated Dwellings, Inc.
504 Grand St.
N. Y. C.
ORchard 4-2879

PLAYS

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN With GLENN ANDERS
DOROTHY STICKNEY, MARGARET WYCHERLY, JOHN BEAL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."
—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

BOOTH THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

Now is the time

Our readers are thinking of Apartments. Our compactness makes their attention easy to reach.

30 words (1/2 inch) $3.08

Additional lines (6 words) $.62

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
Cortlandt 7-3330

SCHOOL

HOFFMANN SCHOOL for Individual Development

3997 Gouverneur Avenue, between Sedgwick Avenue and Van Cortlandt Park, N. Y. C.
Fees Commensurate with Present Day Conditions

Day and Boarding School CHILDREN 4-13 YEARS SCHOOL BUS

HELP WANTED

ENGINEERING SALESMEN. Two young men, preferably with knowledge of steam engineering, wanted to sell in New York on liberal commission well advertised specialty in industrial field. Write fully Box 737, c/o The Nation

POSITION WANTED

SEEKING co-operative (farming?) venture, anywhere, which can use able-bodied couple aged twenty-three: musical and literary abilities, experienced teaching and social-work: anxious practice socialism NOW. Box 741, c/o The Nation.

COLLEGE graduate, experienced teacher, executive, financial literary secretary desires position with educational, economic, social organization. Box 740, c/o The Nation.

FOR RENT

FOR RENT IN COOPERATIVE APARTMENT HOUSE

Three room and terrace apartment; north-eastern exposure; living has windows on three sides and wood-burning fireplace; light airy bedroom; real kitchen; roof and garden available to tenants; cooperative cafeteria and store on ground floor make housekeeping easy while other cooperative features help to reduce cost of living; all modern conveniences, including electric refrigeration and incinerators. Moderate rental. See Renting Agent, 433 West 21st Street (in the old Chelsea district between Ninth and Tenth Avenues) or call CHelsea 3-7631.

FOR YOUNG WOMAN, ARTISTICALLY FURNISHED ROOM IN STUDIO APARTMENT. PRIVATE ENTRANCE, FIREPLACE, COMPLETE KITCHEN. $30. REFERENCES EXCHANGED. CALL EVENINGS STUYVESANT 9-5751. MISS BROWN, 240 E. 22 ST.

CULTURED couple wish to share home with couple or family with one child. Individual. All privileges. Finest residential section Jamaica, convenient, schools, transportation. Very reasonable. Donner, 164-07 86th Rd., Jamaica. Re-public 9-3169.

RESORTS

RESORTS

RESORTS

This Summer
MAKE IT AN ADIRONDACK VACATION
Come to CAMP WALDEN
 FORMERLY SCOPUS, LAKE GEORGE

Special
LABOR DAY WEEK END
 3 Full Days at Camp including transportation for $25.00

All sports and social activities
 —GOLF—TENNIS—HORSE-BACK—BASEBALL—SWIM-MING—FISHING—BOAT-
 ING, Etc.

Marvelous accommodations
 —CUISINE unexcelled.
 ...Sept. Rate—after Labor
 Day $25.00 per week

Under Supervision of
GEORGE ZINOVY
 of Beekman Fame

Illustrated Booklet on Request
 For information write
Camp Walden, Lake George, N.Y.
 N. Y. C. Office—11 W. 42 St.
 Tel.: PBennsylvania 6-8569

COOKS FALLS LODGE

ROSCOE, N. Y.

On the beautiful Kodak trail

John Rosenfield, Prop. Tel. 2 F 13
 Just what you have been looking for—a modern hotel in gorgeous country, with all camp activities. Facing Beaver-kill River, famous for its trout fishing.
 Private lake. Tennis, handball, golf, fishing, swimming, etc. Also Egyptian card room and Bohemian Tea Room.

REDUCED RATES $22.50 — $30.00
(Equally attractive rates for September)

OPEN SHELF

CURIOUS BOOKS Send for Catalogue of Privately Printed
 Unexpurgated Items
 Exotically Illustrated
 Limited Editions
THE FALSTAFF PRESS
 Dept. N, 260 Fifth Avenue, New York

EDUCATIONAL

CONVERSATIONAL FRENCH

Spanish - Italian - German

Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
 1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

FRENCH Spanish, Italian, German
 Russian, Conversational.
 Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c. Daily 9-9.
 Fisher School of Languages, 1264 Lexington
 Av. (bet. 85-86 Sts.) Est. 1905. AT-water 8-8711

Announcing Radically New Low Rates at

UNCAS LODGE

$20 per week or $36 for two weeks
 Group of 3 or more $18 per week

Rates include the following facilities:

- 3 clay tennis courts.
- Private lake-water sports.
- Cement handball court and basketball.
- Delicious food under the supervision of Jerry.
- Saddle horses and golf nearby.
- Free transportation from New London to camp.

In the evening . . . dancing to a rhythmic 5-piece orchestra—theatricals—campfires—comraderie

UNCAS LODGE

UNCASVILLE, CONNECTICUT

Phone Norwich: 1858 ring 5

N. Y. Phone: President 3-9823

DIANA BERMAN ABE BERMAN
Send for Booklet

OUR TREAT TO MUSIC LOVERS SYMPHONY CONCERT

—under the stars

A program of tuneful symphonic numbers will be rendered, on our lawn, by a noted Symphony Orchestra of 55 instruments, on Saturday, August 27th, at 8:45 P. M.

All are welcome to this concert, which has been arranged in appreciation of the friendship and support of a patronage comprised predominantly of music lovers.

Come up and enjoy a delightful musical evening in a superlative outdoor setting. No admission charge, — contributions, no obligation.—Our treat!

OPEN ALL YEAR

BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE

FURNACE DOCK RD. PEEKSKILL, N. Y.
 PHONE PEEKSKILL 1403

By railway: N. Y. Central to Harmon Station.

ALL INDOOR AND OUTDOOR SPORTS, GOOD SANDY
 BEACH. GALA ENTERTAIN-MENTS, DANCING, EXCEL-LENT MENUS.

Modern Hotel Accommodations

RATES

as low as

$22.50

TROUT LAKE CAMP
 PICTURESQUE in the Adirondacks

$30 for 1 week including transportation.
 $50 for 2 weeks including transportation.
 Write to camp for Booklet or phone N. Y. Office for information.
 Sept. Rates—$17.50 per Week
 LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.
 Bolton 96, 55 W. 42nd Street, N. Y.
 Lackawanna 4-5894

RED OAKS

Atlantic Highlands New Jersey

A 150 acre country estate one hour from New York, with private lake for swimming and boating. Ten-Old Gardens. Famous Cuisine. Beautifully appointed rooms. Intellectual and congenial group.
 Splendid opportunity for those wanting to finish a piece of work. Open all year. Reasonable rates.

Management—Mascha and Hyman Strunsky

Phone Atlantic Highlands 264

CAMP TOPST

BRANCHVILLE.

$22.50 PER WEEK $4 PER DAY

Special Sunday Dinner including Tennis, Boating, Swimming, $1.50. Reduced
 R.R. fare, weekends Round trip $2.70.

New Golf Course 10 Minutes from Property

Dietary Laws Carefully Observed
 N. Y. Office—Dry Dock 4-5900
 SHAPIRO BROS.

SLACKIN MANOP

In the Heart of the Adirondacks
AFTER LABOR DAY TILL OCT. 1st

Hotel Comforts Complete Social Staff
 No Green Fees On Our Beautiful 9 Hole
 Golf Course
 Rooms with Private Bath
 Extremely Low Rates
CLAY TENNIS HANDBALL

SCHOON LAKE, N.Y.

MERRIEWOODE LODGE

(In the White Mountains)

TO those who know how, and love to play in the great outdoors, Merriewoode offers superb physical environment; beauty—space—mountains—10-mile lake; equipment for land and water sports; delightful trails for riding and hiking; excellent objectives for trips; congenial companionship.

Rate: $25.00 weekly—no extras

Address Merriewoode Lodge, On Highland
 Lake, Stoddard, N. H.

Top off the summer at

DELAWARE CLIFF CAMPS

In the Kittatinies, Flatbrookville, N. J.

Modern children's camp available to adults for Labor Day week-end. 800 acre estate—river beach—tennis —horses—hand ball—excellent cuisine. Friday morning until Tuesday morning (3 or 3½ day week-end) for $12. For reservations phone Bushkill 9019R2 or write to DELAWARE CLIFF CAMPS, Flatbrookville, N. J.

THE FAYLAND, Hudson, N. Y.

ALL-YEAR TOURISTS' stop-over. Albar
 Post Road U. S. 9. Four miles south of Hudson Garage, electricity, baths, radio, farm product home cooking. Swimming. Ping Pong. $1 weekly. B'klyn tel.: Dewey 9-1059 after 4 p.m.

VINEYARD LODGE, Ulster Park, N. Y.
 "Garden spot of Ulster County." Moder-hotel amidst beautiful 200-acre fruit and grain farm, solariums, saddle horses, tennis courts, sociactivities; refinement; congeniality; America
 Jewish cuisine. Rates reduced to $18.00 weekly.
 Joseph Rosenthal. Phone, Kingston 3430.

COME to the seashore for delightful and vacations. The finest surf bathing on Long Island; beautiful beach and boardwalk. At at Reiber's Cottage you get most comfortable accommodations and choicest food. Reasonable rates. Belle Harbor 5-0089.

AVOID CROWDS ON LABOR DAY A "BROOKWOOD," in the hills, Katonah
 New York. Forty miles from the City; new swimming pool, interesting people, special rate.
 Weekly accommodations until September 15th.

CAMP DAVIS, BUDD LAKE, N. J.
 Labor Day week end fun for all. $3.50 a day $9. from Friday. $7. Saturday afternoon. $16.
 week. Call Tompkins Sq. 6-5800 or Tremont
 4196 or write R. Davis, Stanhope, N. J.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1932

No. 3505

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	201
EDITORIALS:
Japan's Challenge .....	203
Prosperity by Headlines .....	204
Toward a New System .....	205
Geography .....	205
THE POT AND THE KETTLE: Prophecies, Straw Votes, and Campaign Chests. By Oswald Garrison Villard .....	206
THE FARMERS' REBELLION. By Wayne Gard .....	207
SABOTAGE AT GENEVA. By Robert Dell .....	209
THE SHOW BUSINESS. I. THE CRISIS IN THE THEATER. By Joseph Wood Krutch .....	211
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .....	212
CORRESPONDENCE .....	213
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE .....	213
BOOKS:
But Plato. By Joseph Auslander .....	214
Bowdlerized Lawrence. By Henry Hazlitt .....	214
A History of Shakespeare. By Mark Van Doren .....	215
The Fetish of Duty. By Clifton Fadiman .....	215
Profits and Power. By Norman Thomas .....	216
Ethics Without Inspiration. By Benjamin Ginzburg .....	218
Shorter Notices .....	218

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
MARGARET MARSHALL

LITERARY EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN H. L. MENCKEN MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON ARTHUR WARNER

MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 2 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

IT HAS NOW BECOME thoroughly clear that the so-called National Conference of Business and Industrial Committees is in essence nothing more than a part of Mr. Hoover's campaign for reelection. Its program is vague to the point of absurdity; its tone is that of a salesman's pep meeting. All it proposes is somehow to force still more credit down the throat of a business structure already sick from an excess of debt, and to employ more men, not at the expense of employers, but of the workers who still have jobs, by asking them to give up part of their part-time to others. If there is any fundamental difference between the present conference and the completely abortive conferences called by the President in late 1929 we should like to know what it is. We do not believe the American voter is going to be easily fooled by such tactics, even though a few Democrats like Owen D. Young have allowed themselves to be used. Recent straw votes point so uniformly in the same direction that they can no longer be ignored. The Democratic National Committee has given out a list of nearly a dozen such straw votes, which reveal Roosevelt leading Hoover in the average ratio of three to one, with Roosevelt taking an amazing lead in polls conducted by the Western newspapers. But will these hopeful voters receive any better treatment at the hands of the Democrats? Perhaps, though certainly not on the prohibition question. In his speech at Sea Girt, New Jersey, Roosevelt was at pains to show that the Democratic position on prohibition differs but little from that of the Republicans. He seemed offended by Hoover's suggestion that the Democrats were not promising the dries as much as the Republicans.

MR. HOOVER SEEMS TO HAVE MADE rather a sorry mess of his prohibition strategy. He was to catch the wet vote by promising to do away with national prohibition and the dry vote by promising federal protection to all States that want to retain prohibition for themselves. But apparently neither the wets nor the dries want to play with him on that basis. This is especially true of the dries. All but one of the prohibition organizations have decided that they will support neither Mr. Hoover nor Governor Roosevelt, but will instead work for the election of Senators and Congressmen pledged to defend the Eighteenth Amendment. The single exception is the organization calling itself the Allied Forces, the chairman of which is Dr. Daniel A. Poling. It is doubtless not entirely a coincidence that many of the sponsors of the Allied Forces are also Republican politicians. In any event Dr. Poling promised Mr. Hoover the support of this group, not neglecting to mention, of course, that the Allied Forces represent prohibition societies with a total of 1,500,000 members, all of whom presumably are voters. Grateful for this promised support, the Republican nominee promptly penned an ecstatic note of thanks, asserting that Dr. Poling and Mr. Hoover were fighting on common ground against the materialism of the age. We must, he said, "shift our drift from materialism to a higher note of individual and national ideals." But in promising to support Mr. Hoover even the Allied Forces played safe. Dr. Poling's pledge, in the words of the New York Herald Tribune, "reserved" for the Allied Forces "the right to fight repeal" of the Eighteenth Amendment. Ardent prohibitionists could hardly ask for less.

THE BONUS ARMY WAS DRIVEN OUT of Washington only recently but the Hoover Administration is already reaping its reward. Everywhere State conventions of the American Legion are demanding that the adjusted compensation certificates be paid in full as soon as Congress reconvenes. The latest to take action was the New York State branch of the Legion, which by a vote of 499 to 138 demanded "immediate payment" of the bonus. There is little doubt that at its national convention this month the American Legion will reverse its decision of last year when under pressure from Washington it voted against the bonus. The inhumane display of force, which took place on July 28 and which was intended to show the country that American institutions were safe in the keeping of Mr. Hoover's firm hand, has turned out to be a virtually unprecedented measure of political stupidity. The Hoover forces have been driven almost to desperation by the reaction. No other explanation can be found for the ridiculous and demonstrably false assertions made by F. Trubee Davison, Assistant Secretary of War, before the New York State convention of the Legion. He repeated the Hoover-Hurley charge that the bonus army was composed largely of "Communists and criminals," and announced the discovery of a secret printing press from which forged army discharge papers had been turned out by the wholesale. This in face of the fact that the Veterans' Bureau, by checking its own records, had satisfied itself that at least 94 per cent of the bonus-seekers in Washington were bona fide veterans. No wonder Davison was subjected to heckling and boos from the floor and the galleries.

CHANCELLOR VON PAPEN has worked out an exceedingly intricate and somewhat confusing scheme for the financial salvation of Germany. Before these lines appear his program will probably have become law through an emergency decree issued by President Hindenburg. His plan is briefly this: All taxes will be collected in the usual manner in the year beginning October 1, but certain of these taxes, including the turnover and real-estate taxes, which are "especially obstructive to the productive process," will be refunded in the form of credit bills. In other words, instead of paying taxes the industrialists and land-owners will be in effect lending money to the government; instead of receiving tax receipts they will get credit certificates from the government upon which they themselves can borrow money at the bank. Von Papen frankly admitted that he was gambling on the return of world-wide prosperity before the end of the next year. If the industrialists and Junkers are not able to repay the loans obtained on the strength of the credit bills, the government as guarantor of these certificates will have to take up the debts, which may amount to as much as 1,500,000,000 Reichsmarks. If prosperity fails to return, and the government is unable to meet these bank loans, the whole German financial structure will be imperiled by this novel scheme. A similar plan is to be initiated for the purpose of stimulating employment. Moreover, "the employer hiring additional men will be authorized to pay less than the present collective wage rates. The more men he hires, the lower wages he will be permitted to pay." Favoritism for the industrialists and Junkers, further penalties for the working class—nothing better could have been expected from the present government; and even then there is grave doubt that the Von Papen program will do any more than increase the economic chaos in Germany.

THE NATIONALISTS OF GERMANY have tried for fifteen years to silence Professor Eric Gumbel, one of the most courageous liberals and pacifists of that country. At last they have succeeded in having him removed from the chair of political economy at Heidelberg. But if they believe that that will silence him, they will surely be disappointed. Professor Gumbel was one of the few Germans who had the courage to denounce and oppose the war. In 1919 he dared write a book, which he audaciously titled "Four Years of Lies," charging the rulers of his country with having resorted to trickery and deceit to keep the war spirit alive. The following year he published "Two Years of Murder," in which he depicted the senseless slaughter with which both the revolutionary and reactionary elements prosecuted the civil war that followed the armistice. In one of his most recent books he cited three hundred political killings to prove his charge that "fascists are murderers." Obviously he made enemies of the National Socialists. They tried in every way to persuade the Ministry of Education in the state of Baden, which still has a republican government, to dismiss this outspoken educator. That they succeeded shows all too clearly the tremendous influence the rise of fascism has had on even the moderate and liberal public men of Germany. Pacifism, liberalism, and honest criticism are having to give way before the mad, jingoistic nationalism of the Hitlerites. This is taking place even though the fascists have not yet come into power. What a menace to world peace Germany will be, if and when they take over the government.

HENRY W. L. DANA, a pacifist with radical social ideas, has been refused permission to land in Great Britain—reportedly because of his political views—by the government of Ramsay MacDonald who came first into fame and power as a pacifist with radical social ideas. Dr. Dana has gone on to Amsterdam to attend a world congress against war. A dozen years ago Mr. MacDonald might have been going to the same congress himself. Today, in the name of the empire, he is collaborating with his elegant Tory cabinet-mates in building a wall against free trade not only in merchandise but in ideas as well. It is a long way from socialism—even the "gradual" sort—to the dazzling grandeur of a Tory cabinet on the right hand (not the left) of the King himself. It might be blinding to almost any human being. Yet it is hard to understand how Ramsay MacDonald can fail to see how ridiculous it is that the British Empire should be afraid of pacifists with radical social ideas.

AMELIA EARHART is a lady after our own heart. Her latest exploit of flying the continent in nineteen hours without a single stop compels us to bow low to her in homage. What we like about her is that she is so extremely well-behaved about it all. There is never any blare of trumpets before she starts off on one of her record-breaking flights, and after them she refuses to give foolish interviews to the press and let herself be exploited. Yet we have a suspicion that she is not above being a financial victim of the depression. The point is that she does whatever she undertakes in the most workmanlike way and then seems to forget all about it and begins to make plans for her next job. She has certainly contributed enormously to the final breaking down of the old theory that women do not have the endurance to undertake great physical feats. What, we wonder, would Jane Austen have thought if some one had told her that the day would come when a woman would fly by herself across the Atlantic Ocean and think nothing of spanning the American continent in one hop of nineteen consecutive hours—without taking with her a single bottle of smelling salts or Eau de Cologne or any remedy for the migraines or the vapors. Even if Jane Austen could have been made to believe that, she could certainly not have been persuaded to believe that the vixen who could put this over would also prove to be a singularly modest, unassuming, and winsome young woman.

HAIL TO ALFRED E. SMITH, contributing editor of the New Outlook! We began to think that he was harboring literary aspirations when he was good enough to review in our issue of August 17 Morrie Ryskind's "The Diary of an ex-President," but we were not prepared for so deep a plunge. To say that we wish him success is to put it mildly. With such a contributing editor the New Outlook's circulation ought to rival that of the old Outlook in the days when the redoubtable T. R. shook his big stick, which wasn't so big after all, through its pages. Certainly, Alfred E. Smith has a following that every editor must long for. We even have a sneaking suspicion that Editor Alfred E. Smith will learn a lot. There is nothing like having to put your opinions down in black and white at regular intervals to fortify you in what knowledge you may have and to induce you to acquire more. It may even be that if he really goes into the matter of new outlooks, he will find that there are whole worlds into which he has not yet trod, of which he has probably not been even dimly aware. But let him beware. If he ventures too far, he may become as wickedly radical as his friends and well-wishers, the editors of The Nation.

IT IS APPROPRIATE that John Macy, who was literary editor of The Nation in 1922 and 1923, should have died while delivering a course of lectures under the title "Revolution and Rebellion in Classical American Literature" and that he was giving the course at the summer camp of a group of workers—the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. For Macy early became a Socialist, and saw literature always to some extent in that social and economic context so much emphasized in literary criticism in the last two years. This was evident in "The Spirit of American Literature," published in 1913, in which he revalued the leading historic figures in our national letters both from a romantic and a social standpoint. In dealing with a ruling god like Howells, Macy insisted that he did not know life because he would not know "how to sit down and eat his grub with a bunch of workmen and find out what they think of things." Macy's book helped to raise the current reputation of Whitman in particular; it was a pioneer volume in the attack, which H. L. Mencken was later to carry much further, against the genteel tradition dominant then not only in the universities but in most current criticism. It ridiculed the pretensions of literature that did not draw "the grand passions, sexual or other." If it seems a very quiet and moderate book to most readers today, it is only because the point of view for which it argued has now been so widely accepted.

THE DIVERSE UTOPIAS imagined by what is called the mind of man resemble one another in only one respect—no sane person would want to live in any of them. As Schopenhauer remarked, adequate hells are easy to imagine, but no heaven quite good enough to spend even a long life in has ever been described, and Mr. Huxley's "brave new world" is scarcely less inviting than the futures seriously outlined by less sardonic prophets. It is, therefore, quite a relief to notice that in addressing the sixth International Congress of Genetics J. B. S. Haldane ridicules the idea that it is possible to establish any "perfect" type of man which society should undertake to breed. "I don't believe in uniformity," he said, according to the Herald Tribune. "Among dogs you have all sorts of breeds—shepherd dogs, dachshunds, St. Bernards, and various other kinds. What makes human life amusing is getting different types all in one family. One hope for humanity is that this sort of thing should go on." It is true, of course, that the human dachshunds, poodles, and Pekingese turned out by nature sometimes make one question either her sobriety or her kindness, but, on the whole, we should rather trust her than allow the grim scientists to populate the globe with a single breed of dully virtuous collies.

Japan's Challenge

JAPAN has challenged the new Stimson peace doctrine. Through Foreign Minister Uchida, Japan has given notice that it intends to approve the new territorial arrangement in Manchuria, that is to say, it intends to recognize the "independent" government of Manchukuo. Everyone knows that this supposedly independent state is the creature of Japanese militarism; all neutral observers are agreed that Manchukuo would automatically pass out of existence with the withdrawal of Japanese military support. Even ignoring the precedent Japan established in Korea, it is hardly enough for Count Uchida to say that Japan is not "seeking to annex Manchuria or otherwise satisfy her thirst for land." The fact remains that in violation of the Washington treaties and the Kellogg Pact the Japanese have by force of arms set up a puppet government in a section of Asia which the United States, Great Britain, and other Powers have long considered an integral part of China. It was just such a partition of China that the Washington treaties were designed to prevent. Secretary Stimson has three times declared that the United States will never recognize any territorial or other arrangement arrived at in violation of these treaties or the Kellogg Pact. The test of this policy will come when Japan formally acknowledges the existence of an independent Manchurian government, which it has itself created.

Obviously a challenge of this nature must be met, if the peace treaties are to survive. But it cannot be met by resort to war, for that would defeat the very purpose of the Stimson doctrine. It can only be met by the pressure of world opinion united against treaty violators. The United States has put forward a practical and just method of dealing with this situation, but some of the great European Powers, notably England and France, remain ominously silent. True, their delegates in the League Assembly did join with the representatives from forty-eight other nations in approving a resolution indorsing the Stimson doctrine, but neither Downing Street nor the Quai d'Orsay has to date publicly declared that it would support the State Department in refusing to give international sanction to Japanese gains in Manchuria. Nor has either suggested any other way of dealing with this violation. There is reason to believe that the continued silence of France and England has really encouraged Japan to take a determined stand against the Stimson doctrine.

It is now reported that "because of anxiety in high quarters over what is regarded as growing tension in Japanese-American relations," Vice-Admiral Kichisaburo Nomura will be sent to the United States on a "good-will mission." We shall welcome Admiral Nomura. He will learn much here that ought to help his government rid itself of its false notions concerning the American attitude toward the Manchurian question. He will learn, to begin with, that there is no "growing tension in Japanese-American relations" except that which arises from America's insistence upon faithful observance of the peace treaties. Japan can correct that upon its own initiative. If Tokio does so, it will promote genuine good-will between the two countries. And that is all the State Department desires.

Prosperity by Headlines

THE main lines of Mr. Hoover's economic policy and campaign strategy—for he has made the two identical—have now become plain. The depression is to be exorcised by a trick of grammar. The word has apparently gone out to all the trained seals of the party that the depression is never to be referred to except in the past tense. This, of course, is the same strategy that Mr. Hoover has been following for the last three years. It has the merit that no matter how often it is exposed, there is always the possibility that it may work the next time. Because the policy has now been resumed with more thoroughness and brazenness than ever, it may be well to set down here once more a series of earlier Hoover statements:

December 3, 1929: "We have reestablished confidence."

March 7, 1930: "All the evidence indicates that the worst effects of the crash and unemployment will have passed during the next thirty days."

May 1, 1930: "We have now passed the worst."

December 2, 1930: "We have already weathered the worst of the storm."

One would think that Mr. Hoover would become discouraged, but the technique was resumed in all its original vigor in his acceptance speech, and in his address to the latest "prosperity conference" on August 26—"We have overcome the major financial crisis"—and is now imposed on all his lieutenants. "I am aware of the suffering our people have undergone," broadcasts Mr. Chapin, the new Secretary of Commerce, on August 21. "The American people," he continues, "are still very much on their feet after a series of shocks that might well have made them stagger, but that were finally resisted in a way that astonished the world." Secretary Chapin might tell us just which American people are still on their feet. The farmers in Iowa and elsewhere now driven by desperation to direct action? The 11,000,000 unemployed and all their dependents, as moderately estimated by the American Federation of Labor? The forty-five out of every one hundred factory workers employed in 1926, now jobless, as reported for July by the federal government's own official figures? The workers still employed who have had both their wages and their hours reduced, so that factory workers as a whole are now receiving—again according to the federal government's own figures—only thirty-six cents for every dollar they were getting in 1926?

Perhaps the most astounding attempt to talk the depression into the past tense has come from the Washington correspondent, Mark Sullivan. It appeared in the New York Herald-Tribune of August 10, the President's birthday.

There is symbolism [chanted Mr. Sullivan] in the coinciding of President Hoover's birthday, August 10, with the assured ending of the series of shocks. . . . Somewhere between about July 10 and this week is a day which, as definitely and certainly as Armistice Day at the close of the war, marked the end of this three years of economic convulsion. How serious it has been is not realized even by those individuals who have suffered terribly from it.

The men and women who have been out of work for two or three years can now reflect how lucky they were not to have realized the seriousness of their condition. That, apparently, had been realized only by the bankers, the industrial magnates, and Mr. Hoover. "To an extraordinary degree, not even faintly understood," continued Mr. Sullivan, "the President of the United States bore the brunt." He bore it, as the Chicago Tribune has shown, by drawing the unprecedented average of $539,000 a year from the Treasury for his White House expenditures. Little wonder that the unemployed can only faintly understand such a brunt.

Not satisfied with throwing the depression gaily into the past tense, the Hoover satellites constantly distort and contradict even current official statistics. When the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics itself reports that in July employment fell off 3.4 per cent, leaving only fifty-five men employed for every one hundred employed in 1926, the United States Employment Service announces an "expansion of industrial activity" in that month, a course which Miss Frances Perkins, New York State Industrial Commissioner, has characterized as "cruel and irresponsible . . . particularly at a time when the unemployed are reaching the end of their resources and when cities, States, and private organizations are attempting to raise the funds for relief for the next winter."

The plain truth about the "business revival" we have so far experienced is that it has been almost entirely confined to the speculative markets, to Republican campaign statements, and to newspaper headlines. Whenever we glance at the actual statistics we find a different story. The New York Times's index of business activity, based on an average of railway freight-car loadings, steel-mill activity, electric power, automobile, and carded cotton-cloth production, showed business activity as of August 20 at 52.2 per cent of normal, the lowest point it has yet touched.

One might charitably attribute all this complacent optimism to the naive belief, which persists in spite of a thousand rebuffs, that prosperity can be brought back through the process of convincing enough people that its return is near and inevitable. Even when we make this charitable assumption, we cannot overlook its implications. The first of them is that we can get prosperity back without correcting a single one of the fundamental evils that forced the depression upon us. Instead of reducing tariffs, adjusting war debts, curbing financial buccaneers, addressing ourselves to the vital problems of the distribution of wealth, all we need, these optimists believe, is a few pep meetings and more injections of government credit. A more sinister implication still is that once we can convince everybody that the corner has been turned, it will really not be necessary to concern ourselves with the problem of relief. Presumably if we could get 1,000,000 men back to work in the next six months, we should not need to bother our heads about the 10,000,000 still walking the streets. This is the shocking callousness that lies behind all the official "patriotic" optimism. But headlines cannot feed the hungry. Mr. Hoover's plain duty is to summon Congress for the immediate appropriation, not of a ridiculous $300,000,000, but of a sum at least ten times that size, a sum that would provide at least a bare subsistence for the unemployed and the starving.

Toward a New System

MODERN technology harnessed to an outmoded social technique and an obsolete political theory is shattering our social structure. Unemployment is certain to increase, perhaps involving 20,000,000 workers within the next two years; our already staggering debt burden will grow still larger; our industrial organization is being quickly undermined—such, in any case, is the mature judgment of a group of prominent engineers who ten years ago set out to determine for themselves what effect the rapid development of technology in the machine age was having upon our social, political, and industrial lives. This group, which has organized itself under the name of Technocracy, includes such outstanding men as Howard Scott, consulting engineer who has been a technician for the Muscle Shoals project; Robert L. Davison, housing engineer; Dr. Richard Tolman, professor of physics at the California Institute of Technology; and Professor Walter Rautenstrauch, head of the department of industrial engineering at Columbia University. Before they died Charles P. Steinmetz and Thorstein Veblen were members of Technocracy. In the report based upon their decade of study these engineers asserted:

Our charts prove with startling vividness that the impact of technology on the price system is shattering the social structure. The production curve oscillates to the breaking point. When the crisis comes, no palliatives of a political nature will be adequate, because the problem is not political, but technical. Orators may appeal to and sway manpower, but they are impotent when it comes to handling energy. Neither socialism, communism, nor fascism is equipped to do this job in a society as highly technical as America today.

Nor do the engineers see any more hope in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the five-day week, or the various low-cost housing schemes, for these amount only to a "reshuffling of the cards," and do not get at fundamental causes. The present system is doomed, the engineers agreed, "and a new system of standards must be erected in order to deal with the physical conditions which have arrived by virtue of this hodgepodge created by the impact of technology on an old and outmoded social technique."

As yet Technocracy has not pointed the way to this new system. Just who is to bring about the necessary changes? Will they come gradually, by legislation and similar means, and, if so, will they arrive before the old system cracks and falls? Or must they be accompanied by violent revolution? But of one thing there can be no doubt. No reform of our economic and social structure can possibly succeed, whether it is undertaken by liberals or Socialists, who prefer constitutional or at least legalistic methods, or by Communists or fascists, who lean toward direct action, unless the reforming party has a thorough grasp of the technological problems involved. We are today the most intensively industrialized country in the world. Our complex political, social, and industrial machinery cannot be operated by philosophic theories alone. The new rulers must have scientific guidance and technical assistance as well. Technocracy's report is the first step toward a genuine revolutionary philosophy for America.

Geography

GEOGRAPHY, when we were young, was completely concealed by a plane surface divided by arbitrary lines into patches arbitrarily colored on which, in our imagination, were piled vast quantities of cotton in bales or bananas in bunches, otherwise known as exports and imports; just as the mysterious world of music was shut off by two impenetrable fences known as the treble and bass clefs on which were perched spheroids equipped with flag poles and invariably known as do, re, me, fa, sol, la, and ti.

Geography is only beginning to be popularized or even humanized—such books, for instance, as "Van Loon's Geography" are all too rare. As a result Americans as a people are immensely ignorant of the geography not only of the world but even of their own United States. It may be in part the result of having too much geography, what with two major sea coasts and Texas. Whatever the reason, ask any man you know, except perhaps an Iowan, to "bound" Iowa. There is only one chance in ten that he can do it right off, and very likely he will not be able to do it at all. There is, of course, no rational reason why he should be able to "bound" Iowa, since the idea is quite irrelevant to his experience. And it is only necessary to remember what a large part such silly exercises play in the teaching of geography to know why ignorance of it is so widespread.

Maps in themselves are beautiful. But since they have only an intellectual relation to the rocks, dirt, and water of which the world is made, it is no wonder that a child gets the idea too firmly fixed ever to be quite wiped out that he must cross a black line going from Idaho into Montana and that India and Afghanistan are forever and literally divided by another black line on one side of which is to be found a bright red world and on the other a nondescript grey-green one. As for the shape of the earth, we know well enough that it is a spheroid. Yet because of an early overdose of maps we shall never be able to visualize it as anything but a flat and static piece of gaily colored stuff from which patterns for vast and strange designs have been cut out.

We thoroughly approve of Mr. Van Loon's definition of geography as the study of man in search of food and shelter and leisure for himself and for his family and an attempt to find out the way in which that man has either adapted himself to his background or has reshaped his physical surroundings in order to be as comfortable and well-nourished and happy as seemed compatible with his own limited strength.

As for the pictures which adorn his book, they are more enlightening as well as more exciting than anything we were ever allowed to connect with geography. To see a series of Van Loon pictures showing the mechanics of an earthquake is as good as experiencing one—in fact a great deal better. Because through his representation of the Gulf Stream one can almost feel its warmth, one is in a fair way to remembering why it is, and his pictures of how the Atlantic and the Pacific and the British Channel would look if they should run dry are as revealing as they are unforgettable.

We are glad that geography is being given a chance to develop its possibilities as an art after the dullness it has enjoyed as a science. The children, at least, will be grateful.

THE POT AND THE KETTLE

I SEE that Will Rogers claims that he is the only man in the United States who does not know who is going to be the next President.

Everybody he meets knows and assures him with unquestioned certainty of opinion that it will be Roosevelt or that it will be Hoover. I, too, do not wish to pose as the seventh son of the seventh son, but I wonder whether the surety of the people Will Rogers meets is not due to the fact that one side is certain that we are not going to break with the historic American tradition of turning out the party in power when evil befalls us, while the other is determined that it will hold on to the special privileges which it has got, and keep in office a man who has shown for four years that he can be trusted in the long run to do every single thing that the real owners of the country, the great capitalists, demand of him. So much can happen in the two months that lie between us and the election that it is idle indeed to prophesy. Yet if I were forced to give an opinion I should unhesitatingly side with the verdict of all the straw ballots that I have so far seen or heard of. Roosevelt leads—tremendously—in them all.

That the rich, present and past, the well-to-do, all who are affiliated with the institution of property are willing to chance it again with Hoover is true. They think that the tide has turned. They do not deny that Hoover lied to the American people at the beginning of the trouble, but they insist that if he had not lied we should have had a veritable panic and an even greater collapse. Some think that he has done his worst and that from now on things will go better. They ring the changes on that dreadful saying of Lincoln's about swapping horses while crossing the stream—I wish I dared print here a joyously obscene modification of it attributed to one Alfred E. Smith! But for all that I am about convinced, as things stand, that these conservative citizens of ours are going to be out-voted by the twelve or more millions of Americans who are out of jobs and the millions more who are sick and tired of the whole Hoover philosophy and conception of American life and ideals. In other words, it would appear at present as if the plain American people were going to have their innings this time and that we are in for a change.

Oh yes, I know that superhuman efforts are going to be made to put the Republican Party over once more. The present rise in the stock market—if it lasts—will help them, and we may count upon another boom just before election to send the quotations up further. The newspapers will again be full of stories of the companies that are increasing the number of their employed and perhaps will again bury under utterly misleading headlines the fact that the steel business of the country is operating at only 14 per cent, that unemployment is greater, and that the official figures show that the actual wages paid are at a lower figure than ever before.

*Prophecies, Straw Votes, and Campaign Chests**

Wherever I go I talk with the various people with whom I deal or come into contact. They no longer believe what is in the papers; all the shopkeepers tell you that conditions are worse. It was a parking-place keeper in Hartford who told me the other day, the minute I drove in, that his price was only fifteen cents for three hours parking and then added that if Herbert Hoover came into office again, he would certainly have to close up his place. One Connecticut brass concern was recently reported as having added several hundred men to those employed. The dispatch failed to add that 6,600 other employees of this company have been working four days a month, six hours in a day. These men vote for Herbert Hoover? I cannot believe it and neither can my friend, the Italian bootblack, who says that the five votes in his family which went to Hoover four years ago are going to Roosevelt this year.

But far beyond these individual signs which may well be deceptive, however often multiplied, are certain facts as to the Republican situation which cannot be denied. For years past, as the political chart shows, victory at the polls has had a distinct relation to the size of the campaign chest of the winning party. I have no doubt that the Republicans will raise far more money than will the Democrats, but it is likely to be the smallest campaign fund in generations. More than that, the Democrats have not in years needed a campaign fund so little. Roosevelt is going to be elected, if chosen, because of the horrible suffering that multitudes of Americans have undergone since 1929. The facts are there. They are known to the plain people of America, who see men starving before their eyes. Mr. Hoover may think that there is no cold and hunger and suffering in the country. Every time he says it he loses votes.

Again, the Republicans cannot raise the cry of dangerous radicalism that they expected to bring out when Franklin Roosevelt was nominated. Mayor Walker has dealt them a dreadful blow by giving Governor Roosevelt his chance to shine as a remarkably self-controlled, a dignified, and an able judge. Again, if he keeps the level of his speeches up to that of his recent utterance at Columbus, it will be impossible for the Republicans to describe him either as a dangerous demagogue or a wild-eyed visionary. Not that the Governor was anything like definite enough in his remedies. His program makes a real liberal smile. But the Republicans cannot pin upon him the sort of label they were able to attach to the name of La Follette because La Follette championed Lincoln's idea of popular control of the Supreme Court, or upon Theodore Roosevelt, the Bull Mooser of 1912, when he came out for the recall of judicial decisions. I wish it were otherwise, heaven knows. I wish that Roosevelt had a strong, radical program to invite the bitterest attacks of his political enemies. I am only recording the fact that he has spiked their guns at half a dozen different points; he has made it quite impossible for them to classify him as another La Follette or Theodore Roosevelt on the loose.

* The first of a series of weekly comments on the election which will appear during the campaign.

The pity of it all is that at bottom it is only the pot attacking the kettle, and the kettle attacking the pot, and that fundamentally, as I have said before, the American people are not going to gain by a change. It will be like a breath of fresh air to clean out the White House and the Cabinet room, but when it comes to expecting any deep-seated constructive measures, that is beyond the possible when one looks at the corrupt and crooked Democratic Party, devoid of all principle, recalls the very great limitations of that charming gentleman Franklin D. Roosevelt, and remembers how little Woodrow Wilson's crusade to free America from "its masters, the great capitalists" achieved.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The Farmers' Rebellion

By WAYNE GARD

STANDPAT politicians in the Middle West, as well as farm creditors, have been quaking in their boots at the unexpected enthusiasm generated by the agrarian strike. While the farm-holiday project has made but little headway toward its major objective, the movement has spread like wildfire across the prairies, bringing into flame a rebellion that had been smoldering a long time. Henry A. Wallace, editor of Wallace's Farmer, views the crusade as a gesture which, without immediate import, may attain a far-reaching significance.

Torpedoes, tear gas, rotten eggs, brickbats, and planks spiked to puncture truck tires figure in this latest effort of corn-belt farmers to boost the prices of their products to the cost of production. Declaring a holiday on selling, thousands of farmers have been picketing the roads to "persuade" their neighbors to join in holding back produce for higher offers. The movement began quietly but soon was dramatized by the dumping of several truckloads of milk on a road outside Sioux City, Iowa. The pickets allowed milk and cream for hospitals to enter, however, and they donated 2,200 gallons of milk to the unemployed. Suddenly realizing that 90 per cent of the shipments from nearby milk-producers had been cut off, Sioux City people began frantically to order milk shipped by train from Omaha and to have the blockade run by trucks bearing armed deputy sheriffs. This local milk war soon ended in a price compromise, but it gave impetus and publicity to the more widespread and more inclusive program of the National Farmers' Holiday Association with which it was not directly connected.

The holding back of produce in an attempt to force prices up has often been advocated in the corn belt; but it has seldom been tried, mainly because the farmers have not been united and because so few of them have had enough cash, credit, or storage facilities to withhold their produce for any long period. The current farm strike had its inception in agitation by Milo Reno, kingfish of the Iowa Farmers' Union, and by John Chalmers, a Boone County farmer who is vice-president of the union. At Boone last February, a local meeting drew one thousand farmers and led to the calling of a State meeting. This conclave was held in Des Moines in May, with about ten thousand present. Here the National Farmers' Holiday Association was born, with Reno as its temporary head.

A thirty-day holiday on farm selling was begun August 8 and later was extended indefinitely. Thus far, the strike has centered mainly about the Sioux City and Omaha markets, but lately it has spread into the Dakotas, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Illinois. At the height of the Sioux City milk war, two thousand sunburned and overall-clad farmers were living in tent colonies along the nine trunk highways leading to that city. Some were armed with pitchforks for use on truck tires. But except for sporadic outbreaks the picketing has been peaceful, and truck drivers not amenable to argument have been allowed to pass on. On August 17, a crowd of 450 farmers, equipped with clubs and brickbats, tried to remove animals from stockyard pens in Sioux City and from trucks which had run the blockade, but this attempt was repulsed by deputy sheriffs and city policemen.

Skirmishes have taken place along some of the roads. At one point outside Sioux City, pickets stopped trucks by spreading across the pavement a section of threshing-machine belt studded with menacing spikes, but this weapon was later confiscated by deputy sheriffs. In other instances, roads were blocked with railroad ties, logs, boulders, or cables. A few windshields were shattered with rocks or clubs and one sheriff was overpowered, and his gun taken from him, after he had fired a shot to warn the pickets.

Yet, in spite of such incidents, resort to force has been exceptional. The usual method of stopping trucks has been for a mass of men to stand doggedly upon the highway, in the manner of Gandhi's followers, defying the truck-drivers to crash into them. Since the drivers do not want to be guilty of manslaughter, they always stop, though some—not influenced by the arguments of the pickets—later drive on. Some of the picket forces have included women. The two rules of the patrols are "no guns and no liquor."

The picket groups have been even more active by night than by day, since much of the rural trucking is habitually done at night. Many of the picket squads have been without recognized leaders. The men come and go as they wish, but many have been on duty almost continuously.

"I'll stay till corn pickin'," one farmer declared.

"Till corn pickin'?" said another. "What do you care about corn pickin'? No use doin' all that work the way things are now."

Cars and trucks other than those bearing farm produce to market are, of course, allowed to proceed without molestation. One truck-driver, headed for Sioux City, was allowed to pass unharmed when his load was found to consist of thirty one-gallon jugs of whiskey.

At Council Bluffs, fifty-five pickets, jailed on a charge of unlawful assembly, were released after a crowd of one thousand farmers had threatened to storm the jail, which had been surrounded by officers armed with machine guns. Preparations have been made for sending a unit of the Iowa National Guard to that city. One sheriff has boasted, "We are going to stop this picketing if we have to enlist 50,000 deputies to do it." The pickets, he declared, "are hoodlums just as much as are Chicago gangsters." Other sheriffs and deputies, however, have been more sympathetic with the strike, and some have conveniently looked the other way when trucks were turned back.

Thus far, the strike has affected prices only locally and sporadically. Hog receipts have been almost halved in Sioux City, and in some towns a shortage of vegetables has sent residents scampering to their own or their neighbors' gardens or has forced them to use more tinned food. But considered on a national scale, the farm holiday has neither reduced the available supply, nor raised the price, of any agricultural product. In fact, the prices of wheat and hogs have come down during much of the period in which the sellers' strike has been in progress. In the Sioux City milk fight, the farmers did effect a small gain. Whereas they had been receiving only 2 cents a quart for milk which retailed at 8 cents, the new agreement allows them 3.6 cents and will force consumers to pay 9 cents.

The enthusiasm of the farm-holiday leaders appears, however, to have gained new momentum. "It is a finish fight now," declared Milo Reno as his organization dispatched one hundred emissaries to carry the strike west to Montana and east to Ohio. Even some of New Jersey's potato-growers have joined the movement, which obviously is an effort not so much of radicalism as of desperation.

One of the strikers, who had just gone through a barrage of overripe eggs handled by blockade runners, explained the holiday movement in terms of his own experience:

I own a farm near Boone. My share of the oats crop from twenty-four acres on this farm was $40. My taxes on this same land amounted to $44.16. Before prices took a jump, I could buy a 400-pound packing sow for 90 cents a hundred, or $3.60. At the same time, I went to a meat market and priced a 20-pound smoked ham. It was $3.20. I told them to go to hell; I'd buy a whole hog and cut off a ham.

The Farmers' Holiday Association, while deploring the use of violence, has reaffirmed its aim to strike for farm prices which will equal the cost of production plus a fair profit. It seeks wheat at $1.36 a bushel, corn at 92 cents, oats at 49 cents, barley at 73 cents, hogs at $11.25 a hundred-weight, chickens at 24 cents a pound, and eggs at 35 cents a dozen. The strikers have gained encouragement from Governor Floyd B. Olson of Minnesota, who has declared his willingness to join the governors of other States in a plan, "even martial law," to stop farm marketing until prices rise. But other governors have remained silent or non-committal, and apparently no one has heard a peep from that habitually noisy friend of the farmer, Senator L. J. Dickinson of Iowa.

Thus far, the holiday movement has gained its chief support from the left-wing Farmers' Union. The Farm Bureaus, which have five times as many members in Iowa and which have the less indigent and more conservative farmers, are holding aloof. Even some of the less radical farmers, however, see as much justification for the farm holiday as for the recent bank holidays in which depositors have been induced to waive their withdrawals for a specified period.

The corn-belt insurgents have been following Milo Reno's leadership for a long time. Reno was president of the Iowa Farmers' Union from 1921 to 1930 and is still the driving force of that organization. A belligerent and witty debater, despite his sixty-six years, he assures his hearers that he is "as poor as the rest of you farmers" and rants against the Farm Board and against the compulsory testing of cattle for tuberculosis. He is a McNary-Haugenite, and in 1930 he was an unsuccessful Farmer-Labor candidate for the United States Senate. If someone more responsible than Reno were at the head of the farm-holiday project, the movement might possibly gain a larger degree of support and its political implications might be even more disturbing. Many corn-belt farmers have scant respect for the schemes hatched under Reno's five-gallon Stetson. On the other hand, another leader might have realized the economic futility of such a sellers' strike. From its start, the movement has been doomed. It is pretty certain that farmers will not join the strike in sufficient numbers to curtail the market supply enough to raise prices. And even if prices were raised by the strike, the higher figures would be available only to the boot-leg sellers who refused to observe the holiday. At the close of the strike period, with the withheld produce coming on the market again, prices would drop immediately to the former level. The real value of the strike is in its publicizing of the plight of the farmer, the most hard-hit victim of the current deflation.

The saviors of the farmer are many, especially in election years, but most of their panaceas have already been found wanting. The acreage reduction prescribed by the Farm Board has not worked, nor is there much hope for the enactment—or for the success, if enacted—of such radical measures as the equalization fee or the export debenture. The basic principle of these schemes was at the bottom of the Farm Board's price-fixing venture, which met tragic failure.

More could be done than has been in the lowering of farm taxes and the cheapening of farm credit, but tax reduction is not easy and the mere extension of credit will remain only a postponement of calamity as long as selling prices remain below production costs. Farmers hope to gain slightly higher prices upon the completion of the St. Lawrence waterway; but the present treaty may require several years for ratification, and after that six or eight years more will be needed for the construction of the channel. Some benefit might come from a temporary cessation of the government's land-reclamation activities, part of which bring under cultivation more marginal land when too much is already available. Corporation farming often is advocated as a method of reducing farm costs. Yet such farming, while it has in some instances reduced the cost of raising wheat, is less suited to the mixed farming and livestock production of the corn belt. And whatever advantage the possibly inevitable corporation farm may have in normal times, under present conditions the corporation farms are little better off than those of family size. Moreover, the extreme type of corporation farm would not help the present farmer; it would drive him from the land, replacing him with a transient worker.

The farmer's outlook is anything but hopeful. Unless world market conditions or a sharp business upturn boosts the prices of farm products, the mortgage holders and the tax collectors will take over more and more farms, many of which will be abandoned to weeds and hidden stills. And those who keep on trying to make a living by tilling the soil may be driven to measures far more desperate than the current sellers' strike.

Sabotage at Geneva

By ROBERT DELL

Geneva, August 15

THE disarmament conference adjourned on July 23, leaving everybody who had followed its proceedings at Geneva doubtful whether it would ever meet again. Everybody, that is to say, except Professor Gilbert Murray, who announced in a letter published in the Manchester Guardian on July 29 that he had returned from Geneva "inspired, almost elated." On July 26, the day before Professor Murray's letter was written, General von Schleicher had declared in a broadcast address to the German people that the disarmament conference had been a catastrophic failure, that after its failure nobody expected a miracle to happen and other countries to disarm to the German level, that, this being so, the only alternative was for Germany to reorganize her army, and that this would certainly be done. On August 1 a Roman paper published an article by General Balbo, the Italian Air Minister, in which he declared that all the highest officials of the disarmament conference were creatures of France and England, who had secured complete control of the proceedings and had not given the Italians a chance of making their opinions felt, and that England and the United States had increased their naval armaments before the conference and did not sincerely desire disarmament. He threatened the withdrawal of Italy from the conference and said that the matter would be considered by the Fascist Grand Council. This sufficiently ominous article was closely followed by a still more ominous one signed by Signor Mussolini himself and quite in his old manner. He said by implication that Italy had not been sincere in demanding general disarmament and declared the idea that war could be got rid of to be a delusion.

Thus, within ten days of the adjournment of the disarmament conference, we have a complete change of front on the part of both the German and Italian Governments. Having been at Geneva for the past six months among the strongest advocates of drastic measures of disarmament, these governments have now told the world that it is hopeless to talk about it any more and that for their part they propose to increase their armaments. Both governments have explicitly threatened to withdraw from the disarmament conference. It may be presumed that they will not put their threat into practice before the bureau of the conference meets at Geneva on September 21, but unless there is meanwhile a radical change in British and French policy in this matter that meeting may be the end of the conference—indeed, it probably will be. The situation is critical, and we shall not promote the cause of disarmament by blinking the fact. On the contrary, the only way to save the situation, if it can be saved, is to proclaim the fact from the housetops and try to stir up the French and English peoples to bring the necessary pressure on their respective governments, who with the American Government are responsible for the situation. And the British Government has the heaviest responsibility of all.

Nobody who has followed at all closely and intelligently the lamentable proceedings at Geneva during the past six months can be much surprised at their culmination. The scandal of the "technical" committees was in itself enough to show that the British and French Governments who were responsible for it—the committees having been set up by the joint resolution of Sir John Simon and M. Paul-Boncour on qualitative disarmament—were not sincere and hoped to drown qualitative disarmament, as in fact they did, in a sea of technicalities. General von Schleicher's broadcast address of July 26 was foreshadowed by the marked change in the attitude of the German delegation after the Hindenburg-Von Papen coup d'état and consequent change of government in Germany. There was nothing new in the claim of equality of status for Germany, which had been made from the first, but there are two ways of realizing equality of status—by reducing the armaments of other countries to the level of those of Germany or by raising German armaments to the level of those of other countries. Before the change of government the German delegation at Geneva was sincerely in favor of the former method: after the change of government the new German delegation was clearly in favor of the latter, while still pretending to desire the disarmament of other countries. It was persistently reported at Geneva that the British delegation encouraged, at least to some extent, the hope that Germany would be allowed to rearm, and all the evidence suggested that the reports were accurate. Given the refusal of the British Government to disarm, it is difficult to see how the British delegation could have taken any other course, for it is clear that equality of status for Germany by one method or the other is inevitable. The French nationalists see that clearly enough. "Pertinax" said in the Echo de Paris some months ago that ultimately France would have to choose between an increase in German armaments and a great reduction in her own and showed pretty plainly that he would prefer the former alternative. General von Schleicher's broadcast address is a godsend to the French nationalists. Had he wished to play into their hands, he could not have acted otherwise, and perhaps he did wish to play into their hands, for he certainly wishes to wreck the disarmament conference. It is not at all improbable that both the British admiralty and the French general staff—who are in close touch with the nationalist politicians in France—would prefer German rearmament to a serious reduction in British or French armaments. The French general staff and the French nationalist politicians are not in the least afraid of Germany. They intend to make sure that German armaments shall never catch up with the French, and what they long for is an excuse for walking into Germany and finishing the war which, in their opinion, as M. Poincaré said not long ago, is not finished yet. General von Schleicher has given them a hope that they may sooner or later be provided with the necessary excuse and also an opportunity of scaring the French people out of the desire for disarmament so emphatically expressed last May. The French general staff and their friends, the nationalists, may not be far out in their calculations. The men now in power in Germany are a bad lot, but also a stupid lot. They are in fact the very men whose stupidity dragged Germany into the disastrous World War of 1914. They may do it again.

For the abrupt change in Italian policy Sir John Simon has a peculiar personal responsibility and it, too, has not greatly surprised those who watched in powerless dismay his tactics at Geneva. Nothing could be more distasteful to me than personal criticism of Sir John Simon, but the issues at stake are too serious to allow any personal considerations to prevent the telling of the brutal truth. And the brutal truth is that, in the opinion of the vast majority of those who have observed him at Geneva, Sir John Simon is the most unsatisfactory foreign secretary that England has had for some generations and the worst British representative that has appeared at Geneva since the League of Nations came into existence. He has put up the backs of the majority of the delegations and made himself generally distrusted. This distrust may not be justified—I am inclined to think that what appears to be shiftiness is, to a great extent at least, a constitutional inability to get really into touch with people and win their confidence—but the fact remains that it exists and that the feeling against Sir John Simon is such as to make it an almost essential condition of averting the too probable collapse of the disarmament conference that he should not return to Geneva.

I shall not forget the amazement in Paris last autumn, when the League Council met at the Quai d'Orsay to consider the Sino-Japanese conflict, at the discovery that Sir John Simon knew nothing about the history of the Manchurian dispute or of the treaties that defined the respective rights of various Powers in Manchuria. It was presumed in Paris that either Sir John Simon had not been properly briefed by the foreign office or else he had not studied his brief. At Geneva, on the other hand, where he gave the impression of having been briefed rather by the British admiralty than by the foreign office, Sir John Simon had evidently got up his brief remarkably well. And the clever way in which he maneuvered to kill the Hoover proposal without appearing to have any such intention was worthy of his brilliant forensic reputation. He made, however, a great tactical blunder when he initiated the secret conversations between the British, French, and American delegations, and that blunder is responsible for Signor Mussolini's repudiation of Signor Grandi's policy at the disarmament conference. Long before the adjournment of the conference it was evident that the systematic exclusion of Italy from the conversations was bitterly resented at Rome. The reason of the exclusion was equally evident. It was that Signor Grandi had consistently, and without any doubt sincerely, proposed a drastic reduction of armaments (including the acceptance by other countries of the measures of qualitative disarmament imposed on Germany by the Treaty of Versailles) and had at once accepted the Hoover proposal unconditionally. No wonder that Signor Mussolini concluded that Signor Grandi's policy had failed! Nor was Italy alone in resenting the secret conversations. They were resented by the great majority of the delegations, who regarded them as an attempt on the part of a group of three Powers to impose their will on the conference. Certain delegations even protested to the president of the conference against them. In spite of these protests and these warnings Sir John Simon persisted, and the consequences of his persistence are before us. There is now a danger that Germany and Italy and perhaps also Russia may withdraw from the disarmament conference. It is unlikely that the publication of General von Schleicher's broadcast address and the articles of General Balbo and Signor Mussolini within a few days of one another was a mere accident. The most probable hypothesis is that of concerted action on the part of the German and Italian Governments to torpedo the disarmament conference on the pretext that it has failed.

Nothing is more incomprehensible in this affair than the conduct of the American delegation. What can have possessed them to join with two of the three delegations at the conference hostile to the Hoover proposal (the third being the Japanese) against the delegations in favor of that proposal? The most probable explanation is that they were hoodwinked, for it was painfully evident throughout the conference that they were hardly equal to their task. Perhaps they thought that the least bad result in the circumstances would be the unanimous acceptance of a resolution that, if it included little or nothing, at least did not exclude anything. In that case, they must have recognized their mistake when Germany and Russia voted against the resolution and Italy abstained.

The case of France is no mystery, but comes near to being a tragedy. Three months ago the majority of the French people declared unequivocally for disarmament and, in fact, for peace at any price. M. Herriot succeeded in thwarting their will and formed a cabinet that was a defiance of the popular verdict. Yet, although MM. Herriot and Paul-Boncour, especially the latter, are clearly under the thumb of General Weygand and the French general staff, even French policy at Geneva was less obstructionist than British policy. Had Sir John Simon been willing to accept the Hoover proposal as a basis of discussion, as the Germans, Italians, and Russians desired, the French delegation would almost certainly have agreed. Ten days ago I was convinced that the French people would not allow their will to be thwarted much longer and that the autumn would see the advent in France of a government ready to give a bold lead in the matter of disarmament, but now the future is uncertain. It is too soon to say what effect the change in German and Italian policy will have on French opinion. Signor Mussolini's article has delighted the French nationalists as much as General von Schleicher's broadcast address—see, for example, M. Saint-Price's significant comments in the Journal of August 8. They are already sure that the great victory of the Left last May is annulled and that, in the words of L'Ordre, France is recovering from her "pacifist hypnosis." One can but hope that they are mistaken, but one cannot be at all sure of it. M. Léon Blum is undoubtedly right in thinking that the change in German and Italian policy is yet another reason for proposing drastic measures of general disarmament, which would necessarily involve effective international control. If the German and Italian Governments refused to accept their own proposals when made by other Powers, or refused to agree to effective international control, we should know where we were. If, on the other hand, they accepted both, France and all other countries would be provided with the best possible guaranty of "security" in existing circumstances, and, although war would not be abolished—for it can be abolished only by abolishing its causes—it would have been made much more difficult. But this is the language of reason, and experience has taught us that reason rarely directs human affairs.

The Show Business

I. The Crisis in the Theater*

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

AT the present moment there are about seventy legitimate theaters in New York City. No other city has anything like so many and their existence is an outward sign of the fact that New York has been, for a decade past, the center of the world's theatrical activity. No one else produced anything like so many new plays as we and no other country could boast a group of young playwrights so obviously original and vigorous.

A glance at the newspaper any time during the summer just past would, however, have revealed the startling fact that only six or seven of these seventy theaters were actually in operation and there were periods during what should have been the height of last winter's season when thirty or forty playhouses were either dark or given over to vaudeville, burlesque, or moving-picture entertainments. In other words the flourishing theater of New York had come pretty near to collapse and, as a symbol of the fact, the house of Shubert—the most powerful factor in the American theatrical business—went into the hands of the receiver.

No one knows, of course, what this year will bring. Theatrical managers are notoriously good gamblers and they are making vigorous plans to try again. But how many of the new productions will actually succeed? Last year some one hundred and fifty made their bid for popularity but one hundred and twenty of them were acknowledged failures and, of the remaining thirty, a considerable number probably involved a net loss for their producers. If we leave the musical shows out, not more than ten or twelve plays were commercial successes and, under present conditions, the theater cannot continue long to operate on its present scale. Unless some change in its affairs takes place very soon many of the playhouses will have to be abandoned, many established actors will have to seek new professions, and Broadway will no longer astonish European visitors by the scale of its theatrical activities.

I do not want to be unduly sensational and, especially, I do not want to make the mistake of confusing the theater as a business institution with the theater as an art. We do not need the two hundred and fifty productions which make up a normal theatrical season. We do not need even the one hundred and fifty that were produced last year. A large number of the failures deserved to fail. Probably we do not need seventy theaters, and it is not certain that the importance of New York as a theatrical center would be decreased if a third or a half of them were to disappear. But neither do I want to take too romantic an attitude or to encourage the delusion that those who are interested in the art of the theater ought to be indifferent to its success as a business. As it is now constituted and as it probably will continue to be constituted for some time to come, the two are intimately related. Plays will not be produced unless they can pay for themselves, and the American theater was able to develop as it did during the last ten years because it was prosperous.

To a certain extent all artists depend upon the market for their products. Books can be published only because books can be sold. But the theater is the most expensive of the arts except opera, and it feels a business depression more quickly and seriously than any of the others. It costs from one to two thousand dollars to print a book. It costs from ten thousand on up to several hundred thousand to produce a theatrical exhibition. And the difference between those two sums is almost a measure of the difference between the extent to which the production of books and the production of plays is dependent upon large commercial success. It is easier to experiment with books because experiment there is so much less costly, and it is ridiculous for the spectator to take too lofty an attitude.

Broadway and Forty-second Street are today lined with burlesque shows which have sprung up since the beginning of the depression, and they may be taken as a symbol of what is likely to happen to the theatrical world of New York unless some steps are taken. A hard-pressed manager tends to produce only sure-fire hits and we know what a sure-fire hit is likely to be. Theoretically the depression should have made people more interested in serious things. Actually it has obviously had an opposite effect on the vast majority. Perhaps it has inclined a certain number of people to take economic and political subjects more seriously, but it has not inclined them to a greater interest in serious art. From the standpoint of the theatergoer that is the important result of the plight of the theater. He does not need two hundred and fifty productions a year. He does not need seventy theaters. But he does need a theater in which a certain number of intrinsically excellent plays are produced during a season. And the real danger is that these are the very ones which financial difficulties will squeeze out.

The next question is, of course, what can be done. And to that question there is no one simple answer. But in general terms the answer is that the theater must readjust itself to a change of conditions which is probably permanent—in part at least. What we did not entirely realize is the fact that the flourishing theater of the last few years was a part of the great boom; that its feverish activity was analogous to the feverish activity of the automobile and most other businesses. That does not mean that the immediate results were not good or that excellent plays were not produced just as excellent automobiles were turned out. What it does mean is that the whole activity was proportioned to a boom which could not last and carried on in a manner recklessly improvident. The theatrical business, like most other businesses, was being constantly expanded upon the assumption, not merely that it would continue indefinitely on the current scale, but that it would continue indefinitely to increase at the same rate at which it had been increasing.

The first and inevitable stage of the readjustment will be, I am sure, a deflation—particularly a real-estate deflation. Many of the theaters at the present moment dark will never, I think, be again continuously used for the purpose for which they were built. Many had been constructed quite recently and owed their existence to a flurry of construction provoked by a shortage of theaters a few years ago. But the over-supply which resulted from an exaggerated effort to meet the real need had already begun to be evident before the general depression occurred. Theaters, like most other things, had been produced beyond the need for even boom times, and when a depression began to be felt the already top-heavy structure was ready for immediate collapse, just as the already top-heavy structure of most industries was ready for collapse. The builders had positively asked for catastrophe and catastrophe is what they got.

* The first of a series of four articles on The Show Business. Next week, The Show Business: What It Costs.

The immediate result of the deflation is already evident. A few years ago it was impossible for any producer to get any theater without guaranteeing its owner at least four thousand dollars a week rent. Today any manager can get almost any theater on a purely percentage basis provided he can convince the owner that he has a ghost of a chance for success. And the only unfortunate part of the situation, the only thing which prevents the beneficent effect of cheap theaters from being felt more than it is, is the fact that many of them, having been taken over from mortgagees, are now in the hands of corporations whose members know so little of the theatrical business that they exercise very bad judgment both in letting and refusing to let the house to managers with a show to produce.

That situation will, however, undoubtedly work itself out, and a real-estate deflation ought to prove a very great help to the whole institution of the theater, which has been burdened with outrageous rents. In the course of that deflation fortunes will be lost, exactly as they will be lost in other major commercial enterprises. Some theaters will be dismantled and the general level of rents will be lowered. But however unfortunate that may be for the real-estate operator, it will represent an important gain to the manager and through him to the institution of the theater. That particular gain is one much needed for the simple reason that the thing most obviously wrong with the whole institution of our theater was the fantastic cost of production. In 1929 nothing was so much needed as a way of producing a play without involving a fortune in the gamble, and a decrease in the cost of a theater lease is one important step in the right direction.

However, rents were not, of course, the only things which cost too much. Everything about the theater business has been characterized by a kind of mad extravagant costliness. Managers were rich one year and broke the next; actors got very large salaries while they worked and did not work three-quarters of the time. Producers, most of them, worked on hunches and enthusiasm. They threw away vast sums on impossible productions that never opened and laid out thousands in a moment of exuberance only to regret it in moments of judgment. We have heard a good deal more about the absurd lavishness of Hollywood and it was more absurd than the lavishness of Broadway because it was a sort of super Broadway. But on a smaller scale the theatrical business was absurd in the same way that the moving-picture business was absurd. It existed in an atmosphere of gaudy projects and reckless wastes. Just now it is wondering whether or not it can get out of that atmosphere and learn to exist under saner conditions.

What it comes down to in the end is this: the New York theater is in much the same sort of plight that American business as a whole is in and the causes of the plight are in general the same, except for the fact that the theatrical business has always been more reckless, and unstable, than almost any other. If it reveals a capacity to reorganize itself as a result of the lessons learned the total effect may be very good. If it does not, it may go down in collapse and it is too soon to say of it (as it is too soon to say of American business as a whole) which course it is most likely to take. The depression may do us good—if we can survive it.

Back in the winter of 1930 when all the professional optimists were discounting each fresh wave of the depression as merely a salutary pause in the march of prosperity, someone remarked wisely: "One more healthy reaction and the patient will be dead." Something of the same sort occurs to me in connection with the theater. It will be better if it ever gets well. But it is not yet quite certain that it ever will.

In the Driftway

SLIGHTLY confused but aggressively "broadened" by a summer of foreign travel, the sight-seers are home again. And once more the Drifter is having to admit to those eager travelers who have seen every museum in Europe in three months how many sights he himself has missed, how often he has stopped short of a twelfth-century church for the ephemeral delights of a twentieth-century cafe; or wasted an entire afternoon watching chickens cross and recross the street of a French village while a chateau languished not a mile away. The Drifter, in fact, is such a confirmed non-sight-seer that his friends' lyrical descriptions of the wonders of the world arouse in him neither a sense of guilt at not having visited them when he could nor even a desire to rectify his oversight, but only a sense of weariness.

* * * * *

HIS happy state of imperviousness both to sights and to the scorn that sight-seers feel for him was not achieved, to be sure, in a day—it required one violent European tour. The Drifter can still remember the aching feet and the exhausted mind with which he went doggedly from museum to castle and back again; he cannot remember with any clearness any "sight" he saw. The Uffizi, to quote another rebellious sight-seer whose name he has forgotten, is to the Drifter a place where a thousand virgins and a thousand bambinos may be seen strangling each other. It is also the place where he learned that if one cannot stay away from museums one should at least go alone. Even the staunchest friendship can scarcely withstand a good-sized art gallery. The Drifter "did" the Uffizi one warm day with a trusted and understanding friend. Within ten minutes the expedition had resolved itself into a competition in which each irritated and irritating contestant was determined to see first, and to judge first, each one of a thousand pictures that neither one wanted to see anyway. It was only by an agreement to avoid museums that the friendship survived at all.

FOR the most part the Drifter has been faithful to the spirit if not the letter of that agreement. Where formerly he used to look up sights in guide books and go to see them, now, if he happens to see a sight that interests him he looks it up. It is much less wearing. As for museums, he never enters one except when the desire to see a particular picture overcomes his gallery phobia. On such occasions, having found out exactly where the picture is hung, he firmly imagines himself to be wearing those blinders with which nervous horses are protected from extraneous sights, and goes, not at the hesitating museum pace that kills but as if he were late for an appointment, to the object of his visit.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Colonel House and the War

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On the appearance of the article in your issue of July 27, Wilson Was for War in March, 1916, I wrote a letter with regard to it to Colonel E. M. House. My letter and his reply may be of interest to your readers.

My Dear Colonel House:

I have just finished reading an article in The Nation of July 27, written by C. Hartley Grattan, entitled Wilson Was for War in March, 1916.

While this was not news to me, your having something to do with it is of great interest to me. In a letter written to Senator Robert M. La Follette by me some time in 1916, I told him that President Wilson was going to bring this country into the war against Germany. I was neither for Germany nor for the Allies. I was against war all my life.

I hope some of the things stated in The Nation are not true, or are exaggerated.

(Signed) LOUIS EDELMAN

Dear Dr. Edelman:

In reply to your letter, all I can say is that no one, at any time, was more fervently in favor of peace than I was.

It was merely a question of how best to bring it about and what to do to make the United States less liable to disaster in the future.

Mr. Grattan is mistaken in saying that I was prejudiced against the Germans. I had many friends there then and have them today, and am in frequent touch with them.

(Signed) E. M. HOUSE

Chesapeake Beach, Md., August 1 LOUIS EDELMAN

Concerning Mr. Lehman

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A campaigner as overwhelmed with work as I now am finds it difficult to keep up with his own mail or even to answer such letters concerning himself as you have carried. But I do want to pause between trips to enter a very earnest protest against The Nation's brand of support of a new political realignment which permits it to give the impression that in a somewhat halting manner it prefers Lehman to Waldman as a candidate for Governor of New York. I respect Lieutenant-Governor Lehman's character and ability, but from the standpoint of the fundamental needs of America it becomes all the more dangerous that so good a man should be the window dressing for so corrupt and incompetent a party. Whatever are

Mr. Lehman's virtues, he has been the unprotesting member of an Administration which has contemptuously ignored the demands for unemployment relief which were pressed by Louis Waldman, the Socialist candidate for Governor. In this case emphatically it is the party and not the man which counts, or at any rate, counts first. I say this with pride in the ability and character of our Socialist candidate. No one in the State has a better knowledge of State affairs or has fought harder for measures The Nation would approve than Mr. Waldman. He would join me in urging, however, that the dominant consideration, as The Nation itself has admitted or nearly admitted in the past, is the building of an aggressive party to represent the genuine interests of the masses of workers with hand and brain.

New York, August 24

NORMAN THOMAS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation displays its customary brand of limping liberalism in its indorsement of Herbert H. Lehman's candidacy for Governor of New York State. This time it cannot even offer an apology of not knowing better; it admits that the "mere election of as good a man as Mr. Lehman will not improve the Democratic Party or make it worthy of public confidence."

Of course, The Nation strives for political realism. But this time the temptation was overwhelming. It is not often that modest bankers with liberal tendencies run for office. When they do, they must be rewarded, even at the cost of perpetuating in power a band of plunderers often castigated by The Nation itself. The Nation's indorsement of Democratic Lehman reveals its subconscious distrust of its own convictions.

New York, August 24

WILL MASLOW

E. MICHAEL WHITE

The Centralia Prisoners

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Centralia Publicity Committee, Box 37, Centralia, Washington, is in desperate need of funds to continue its efforts for the release of the five men who have already served thirteen years of undeserved imprisonment. The only salary paid by the committee is the twelve dollars a week on which the devoted secretary, C. S. Smith, manages to subsist. The death of Elmer Smith, who literally gave his life for these men, was a great loss. Cannot enough of us pledge ourselves to send the committee one dollar a month so that his work in their behalf shall not have been in vain?

FREDERICK A. BLOSSOM

Long Island City, N. Y., August 3

Contributors to This Issue

WAYNE GARD lives in Des Moines, Iowa; he teaches at Drake University and writes regularly for Vanity Fair and frequently for other magazines.

ROBERT DELL, Geneva correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, is a regular contributor to The Nation.

JOSEPH AUSLANDER is the translator of "The Sonnets of Petrarch."

MARK VAN DOREN is the author of "Jonathan Gentry."

CLIFTON FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

NORMAN THOMAS, Socialist candidate for President, is the author of "America's Way Out: A Program for Democracy."

BENJAMIN GINZBURG is the author of "The Adventure of Science."

Books

But Plato

By JOSEPH AUSLANDER

But Plato is a dogma: Plato's power
Is weak against this twilight and this hush
When earth and sky and water seem to flush
With some fine sanguine impulse of the hour,
Some blood of meditation that shall flower
Into a flame of stars, into a rush
Of radiant doctrine from a dazzled bush
Where the bird turns his leaf into a tower.
And as for Aristotle—oh, but here,
Scenting the sweet-fern and the bilberry blows,
The leopard frog knows more than that Greek knows,
Melodious and squat philosopher:
And still the bush is blazing like a rose—
And still the voice is thundering at your ear!

Bowdlerized Lawrence

Lady Chatterley's Lover. By D. H. Lawrence. Authorized Abridged Edition. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

A FEW weeks ago, in these pages, Mr. Morris Ernst reviewed impressively the unbroken chain of legal defeats to which the vice-snoopers have been subjected in recent years, and he summed up by remarking:

Since 1915 the leading vice agency of the United States, the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, has failed to gain a conviction in a single case where a book was published with an established publisher's imprint, or where the book had been openly sold by the retailers and reviewed by the press.

Against that encouraging record we must set the present edition of "Lady Chatterley's Lover." It is called, on the paper jacket and on the title page, the "authorized abridged edition." And on the jacket there is also printed a statement by Frieda Lawrence, the author's widow, which I quote in full:

It is a relief to know that you are bringing out the only authorized edition of "Lady Chatterley's Lover" in the United States, after all the expurgated pirated editions. Lawrence considered it his greatest work, and I feel that even in this revised form it has all the beauty of the original edition, and that it suggests to the greatest possible extent the original's strength and vigor.

And that is all. There is no preface, no publisher's note.

When we read the book, what do we find? It is abridged indeed, but the deletions are of only one thing. With complete thoroughness, and with surgical accuracy, the editor has removed every description of the physical act of sex. He has removed every four-letter word to which a censor could possibly object. Even this might be forgivable, if the reader had still been permitted to know at just what points his chastity was being protected from the depraving influence of the original volume. But though the editor occasionally inserts a row of asterisks where whole pages of matter are missing, the reader unfamiliar with the original edition is left to conjecture that these are the editor's asterisks and not the author's. And there is no consistency even in the use of asterisks: whole pages are dropped with no hint of the fact whatever.

It is misleading, then, to call this an "abridged" edition. The honest word is "expurgated." It is doubly misleading for the publishers to print Mrs. Lawrence's statement that this is the only "authorized" edition "after all the expurgated pirated editions." The implication of such a statement is that the present edition is not expurgated. And even to call the present volume expurgated would not be enough. It is expurgated and bowdlerized.

Let us see some of the things that have happened to it. The first omission, I believe, is that of the passage describing Connie's first intimacy with Michaelis. The omission of this, and of descriptions of succeeding intimacies, makes Connie's later aversion to Michaelis unintelligible. The omission of every passage describing any of her physical relations with the game-keeper, or her emotions during them, leaves her love for him largely unaccounted for. As the whole story turns upon her love for him, the omission is rather important; this becomes, indeed, a clear case of "Hamlet" with the Prince left out. As for the bowdlerization, one becomes aware of it before the end of Chapter IV. One character remarks:

"Me? Oh, intellectually I believe in having a good heart, a lively intelligence, and the courage to say things in front of a lady."

In the real book, the character believed in having another organ in addition to a good heart. And he did not say "things."

It cannot be denied that for the most part the euphemistic substitutes are orthodox. Connie's "heart" is made to do constant service for another part of her; and "love," ambiguous and all-embracing, takes the place of a more specific verb. But this substitution often makes Lawrence's words seem meaningless. What does the game-keeper mean by "cold-hearted loving"? What does he mean when he tells Connie: "You like loving all right: but you want it to be called something grand and mysterious, just to flatter your own self-importance"? And surely the editor is sometimes much too timid. Has "body" itself become an obscene word? When Lady Chatterley tells her lover, "I liked your body," the present editor changes it, meaninglessly in the context, to "I liked you." And why a sentence like "The Italians are not passionate: passion has deep reserves" is omitted in Chapter XVII I cannot even imagine, unless Mussolini's dictatorship is wider than I thought it was.

Let us admit that there is a relative justification for the present book. The authorities will not permit the original edition to be sent to this country; it is certain that, if it were openly published here just as it was written, the publisher would be prosecuted. What has actually happened, therefore, is that several pirated editions have been brought out here, and sold through underground and bootleg channels. And recently one particularly unscrupulous publisher brought the book out openly, bowdlerized to get by the censors, but with no acknowledgment either of the theft or of the bowdlerization. It was sold in many of the so-called respectable bookstores, whose owners, presumably, would have indignantly refused to handle a book in which the organs of the human body, and the act by which children are conceived, were described in good plain English, but who thought it quite all right to act as receivers of stolen goods.

Under these circumstances, the regular publisher of Lawrence was certainly justified in at least partly protecting himself and Lawrence's widow by bringing out an expurgated edition of his own. But would it not have been better to tell the reader, in a publisher's note, candidly and plainly just what the limitations of the present volume were, and why it was being published? Would it not have been fairer, both to the reader and to Lawrence's reputation, to let the reader know precisely how much and where something was being held back from him? Would it not have been better, instead of bowdlerizing, to have used dashes—to have printed, for example, one of the lines quoted here, like this:

"Me? Oh, intellectually I believe in having a good heart, a chirpy —, a lively intelligence, and the courage to say — in front of a lady."

Would it not have been better to print it so throughout, letting the reader know that the dashes were not Lawrence's, or even blacking out the words, as in the recent "Censored Mother Goose," to emphasize what a nasty and ridiculous thing censorship at bottom is? It might even be possible, now, to print the book in its original form. With the imposing list of court decisions already built up, with the liberties permitted to novelists like Hemingway and Dos Passos on the one hand and to sex writers like Mary Ware Dennett, Marie Stopes, Van de Velde, Dickinson, and Beam, and all the psychoanalysts on the other, it would seem to be impossible for the courts to rule, with any consistency, at least, against "Lady Chatterley's Lover."

I do not wish to be understood as accusing Mr. Knopf of lack of courage in this matter. That sort of accusation is too easy for perfectly safe people to make. Anyone who makes that charge should be prepared either to buy the rights himself or to offer to defray the expenses of the inevitable legal prosecution. I am merely saying that this emasculated edition should at least have been presented for exactly what it was. It is not enough to reply that half a loaf is better than none, or that many fine passages remain. The simple truth is that the editor has taken out precisely the passages and the words for the sake of which Lawrence really wrote the book. There is no need to ask what Lawrence himself would have thought of this edition. He has already told us in his little pamphlet on "Pornography and Obscenity":

The whole question of pornography seems to me a question of secrecy. . . . The insult to the human body, the insult to a vital human relationship! . . . Away with the secret! . . . The only way to stop the terrible mental itch about sex is to come out quite simply and naturally into the open with it.

The editor of the present volume, as I have hinted, has been a skilful surgeon. Out of "Lady Chatterley's Lover" he has carved nothing but the heart. The heart? I find I am using the language of the editor himself. Lawrence would have been more accurate.

HENRY HAZLITT

A History of Shakespeare

A History of Shakespearian Criticism. By Augustus Ralli. Oxford University Press. Two volumes. $12.

THE history of Shakespearian criticism is the history of Shakespeare—is the story, that is to say, of how a great man came into that sort of existence with which we endow anything by thinking about it. Such a story can be told in either of two ways. It may have a plot and develop around an idea; or it may be a mere chronicle of discoverable events. Mr. Ralli has chosen the chronicle form, and in so doing he has missed an opportunity to write the clever book which someone doubtless is destined to write. For the criticism of Shakespeare has had its dramatic moments; it has known sensational reversals, and it has revealed the characters not only of critics but of countries.

Mr. Ralli has not been clever then; but he has been enormously useful. He has begun at the beginning, with the first known mention of Shakespeare's sonnets and plays by Francis Meres in 1598, and has plowed straight on through time to Lascelles Abercrombie, his last commentator, who in "The Idea of Great Poetry" (1925) discussed certain moral implications of Shakespeare's tragic art. He has followed a triple course through England, France, and Germany (the United States falling for his purposes within the boundaries of England); and in his progress he has summarized every important or half-important volume, essay, preface, annotation, or article bearing upon his subject. He has digested the work of three hundred and fifteen critics, and digested it thoroughly.

This is not to say that Mr. Ralli is a critic himself, for such a man would find such a labor impossible—or if he did force himself to perform it, he would fail to keep that calmness which is Mr. Ralli's great virtue. A person of finer gifts would not have so fair a mind; he would add to this account, he would subtract from that, he would always be throwing a high light somewhere. Mr. Ralli plods along with a steady lantern which no wind of doctrine can blow out. The result is not a contribution to Shakespearian criticism; it is exactly what it pretends to be, a survey of that criticism as far as the year 1925. If Mr. Ralli has any position at all it is the idolatrous one—a bad one for any other purpose, perhaps, but good enough for the one in hand.

More than half of his eleven hundred pages are devoted to the past forty-six years. This may seem a sin against proportion, but it is these latter years which we are likely to know least well, and Mr. Ralli has not been unwise in paying so much attention to critics who may never again be as important as they are at the passing moment. Here again he is above all things useful.

His index could be fuller, and there could have been a bibliography of critical works; as it is, the reader is compelled to compile his own from the footnotes. But these are slight demerits in a work to which every student of Shakespeare will be indebted until such time as its inevitable successor is composed.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Fetish of Duty

Night Flight. By Antoine de Saint-Exupéry. Translated from the French by Stuart Gilbert. The Century Company. $1.75.

"NIGHT FLIGHT," winner of the French Prix Femina, is a tense and brilliantly written story, fusing the sensations of a company of air pilots, engaged in transporting mail by night over the gigantic prairies and mountain ranges of South America. Both the glamor and the terror of night-flying at high altitudes are invested by the author with a kind of metaphysical poetry which is nevertheless entirely concrete and convincing. "Here for the first time," Christopher Morley says, "an airplane enters into imaginative literature."

But this evocation of the beauty, the wonder, and the peril of night-flying, remarkable as it is, is not the heart of the book. Its moral and imaginative center is the figure of Rivière. Rivière is not a pilot at all, but the chief of the airport, the director, in a sense the creator, of the thrilling and sometimes fatal night flights. The book is a glorification of the character of Rivière, with whom the author has clearly made a personal identification. Rivière is a transcendental martinet, for whom the service is a kind of mystic categorical imperative. In order that the South American airlines may compete in speed with other systems of transport, in order that mail may travel with unnecessary rapidity from Bahia Blanca to Bordeaux, Rivière drives his men like machines, brutalizes them, intimidates them, sends them to their deaths. He applies the West Point-Prussian disciplinary system to the business of transporting mail. It is not that he is inhuman or greedy: no, he kills men for the sake of a pure idea, which he is never quite able to define even to himself. There is something in him that has gone hard and hopeless. His spirit is dead; and in order to hide from himself this deadness, this essential solitude in a world of living men, he apotheosizes Work. "The work in progress was all that mattered." He says of his men: "They need to be urged on toward a hardy life, with its sufferings and its joys; only that matters." And he thinks: "We behave as if there were something of higher value than human life. . . . But what thing?" He never succeeds in answering the question. There is no answer. His nearest approach to it is the Conradian formula of Duty, conceived in superhuman terms, Duty performed regardless of whether or not it is understood by Rivière or his underlings, Duty apart from its personal and social significance.

Rivière is a sick man, a rotting man, like all who are fascinated by the spectacle of pure power and pure efficiency divorced from beneficent ends. But the author does not admit it, does not wish to see it. Instead he holds up Rivière as the supreme mystic hero. After Rivière (though, like the Russian nobleman's, his heart is breaking) has stoically endured the death of his favorite pilot Fabien, the author ends the tale: "Rivière went back to his work and, as he passed, the clerks quailed under his stern eyes; Rivière the Great, Rivière the Conqueror, bearing his heavy load of victory."

It is disheartening to see a great artist like André Gide (who has just signed Rolland's manifesto against war) praising this book in fascist terms, making a virtue of its febrile heroism, declaring that "Man's happiness lies not in freedom, but in his acceptance of a duty." Can he not see that Saint-Exupéry's admittedly eloquent deification of mere will and energy leads straight to Von Treitschke and the megalomania of Il Duce? Does he not see that this lurid heroic sentiment can easily be impressed into service and that by its empty witchery men can be confused, blinded, and sent straight to their deaths? This is no mere story of adventure—would that it were!—but a dangerous book. It is dangerous because it celebrates a pernicious idea by disguising it as a romantic emotion. It is dangerous because it enlists a fine imaginative talent in the defense of a spiritual toriyism.

CLIFTON FADIMAN

Profits and Power

The Power Fight. By Stephen Raushenbush. The New Republic. $1.

THIS book is a model of its kind, and its kind is tremendously important in a day when the literature of generalities and the discussions of broad economic planning so far outrun the constructively critical examination of particular key industries and the problems they present. There can be no need of argument that among key industries electric power ranks very high; decidedly it is in the public mind and it is in politics. Mr. Raushenbush could have chosen no better subject for his lucid and vivid exposition. He has the gift of handling dry figures, not only so that they mean something but that what they mean becomes exciting. One feels the careful objectivity of his inquiry, yet he is never guilty of the futility of trying to discuss a question of such social importance as if our judgments of values were no more involved than in a discussion of the measurements of the craters on the moon.

At once the book establishes itself as a necessary guide to any one who would discuss the power industry. It is an amazingly compact and comprehensive handbook of significant facts—facts which the power companies cannot dispose of by the cry of "Bolshevik" and the rather clumsy lying in which they have indulged. (I write as the victim or beneficiary of false or irrelevant attacks which on occasion have at least guaranteed me a big audience!)

It would be a great disservice to any reader to give him a few quotations or even to summarize the author's comment so that mistakenly he will feel that he can dispense with the book. Instead, I shall point out what it does to our stock American arguments for private ownership of public utilities.

Briefly, these arguments are somewhat as follows: Private ownership rests upon and stimulates private initiative; it more or less automatically assures efficiency and honesty in operation; it gives the engineer a chance that would be denied him under a bureaucratic and wasteful form of public ownership such as we must expect from our politicians. Against the temptation to charge extortionate rates the regulatory commissions of the states are effective.

Never was a case more thoroughly disproved by the facts. The electric industry in America has indeed been a particular beneficiary of our extraordinary scientific progress. That progress has long since depended upon the careful work of the engineer; not the hunch or the greed of the entrepreneur. Already the power industry has become a quasi-monopoly. There is in it no question of individualism versus collectivism. If there is any return of competition it will be by small publicly owned plants. Private owners will lack the financial and political strength to get into the field now so closely knit by intricate systems of holding companies, most of them falling within some big banking sphere of influence, so that three groups—the Morgan-Bonbright-National City, the Chase National-Harris-Forbes, and the Insulls control 59.6 per cent of the industry's production. Eight more control 25.57 per cent of the installed capacity. To talk of individual initiative in this collectivism of financial control is about as meaningless as to talk of individual initiative in the telephone monopoly.

These allied interests through the National Electric Light Association and various other groups have sought to debauch and prostitute democracy by an extraordinary use of propaganda by which in press, schools, colleges, and civic organizations, advertising—dishonest—advertising is masqueraded as objective statement of facts. Mr. Raushenbush reviews the more flagrant evidence of this before the Federal Trade Commission. This subject had previously been discussed by him in "High Power Propaganda" and, more recently and in more detail by Dr. Ernest Gruening and by Jack Levin, so that it is probably fairly familiar to Nation readers. It is one of many dramatic proofs that the ignorance or misinformation of democracy is deliberately cultivated by these who then deride it, just as the corruption of democracy is primarily the work of those who exploit it.

Even so, it would be hard for any Tammany to steal what the power groups have legally appropriated. Mr. Raushenbush's analysis of the financing of the companies and the rate structure is a beautiful piece of clear exposition of the art of exploitation sanctioned by inefficient regulatory commissions and complacent courts. What can be done by holding companies to write up and conceal profits, how imaginary reproduction costs figure in valuations, what 8 per cent return on capitalization means for holders of common stock—and to the consumers!—is here set forth with a wealth of illustration. One chart of fourteen companies shows a write-up of 80 per cent over book costs in the process of effecting mergers. The Committee on Public Utility Rates of the National Association of Railway and Utility Commissioners has definitely and categorically rejected the comfortable picture that such write-ups of capital do not affect rates. Emphatically they do. Perhaps the most telling point in Mr. Raushenbush's analysis is his proof that now the private companies take from us, the consumers, about a million dollars a day more to pay for capital than would be charged through the use of government credit. This sum steadily increases. Looking to the future Mr. Raushenbush draws a picture which he thus summarizes:

We have seen here how the electric utilities are in a position where they can legally charge for the next thirty years close to $14,000,000,000 more than would be charged through the use of government credit. Or, charging the consumers no more than the private companies, government ownership would reduce the charges for money to zero at the end of thirty years. In order to make secure the dividends on their common stock large extra sums are allowed them out of rates, above and beyond the actual cost of the money. These sums pile up cumulatively, and the amount of excess earnings required from the consumers to safeguard these dividends increases annually. But the operating utilities have now been put into a position where the managers do not themselves control such matters. The control is in the banking houses behind the holding companies. They are not always interested in securing money for the operating utilities in the cheapest market. They make some of their largest profits in ways expensive to the operating utilities. They constantly attempt to gain the benefits from both premiums and discounts. They are in a position to force operating utilities to accept short-term loans at high rates of interest, and then themselves to borrow from the operating companies at very low rates. They have fought control of security issues successfully in over half the States and are not inactive in attempting to repeal or weaken it in those States where it has been attempted.

One more point to complete the picture of "efficient" private operation. Harassed commissions cannot pass on competence in management. Incompetence or deliberate manipulation of operating costs to conceal profits is rewarded by high rates! Not the stockholders but the consumers suffer.

Against this attack on the public pocketbook our defenses are weak—how weak only a careful reading of the record will make plain. Cities are usually hamstrung by State laws and commissions, arbitrary insistence on counting debts incurred for acquiring public utilities as if they were part of the non-productive debts and hence subject to the debt limits; rules requiring a two-thirds vote to sanction a bond issue for acquiring public utilities, etc. Commissions, State and federal, have become the refuge for the utilities and bear their indorsement. There may be logically certain things which would strengthen the power of the commissions, but neither their essential nature nor the constitutional limitations of one federal and forty-eight State governments, still less the history of achievement under commissions, gives any real hope of solving our problem by strengthening commissions.

By contrast public operation, or mixed public and private operation as in Britain, Germany, Canada, and many of our own cities, works well. Most readers will be particularly thankful to Mr. Raushenbush for giving us the facts concerning successful public operation. He effectively disposes of the familiar argument that the notoriously lower rates for domestic consumers in Ontario under public ownership are at the cost of low tax returns to the government and high charges to industries. In this matter high-power propagandists have done some tall lying.

Equally valuable is the author's account of Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam. The Hoover Administration and some of its agencies and their reports come in for caustic criticism. In discussing the famous report of the War Department on Muscle Shoals he observes: "It looks very much as if the engineers in the War Department did what they were told to do, and did it badly."

In short, the conventional arguments for the power trust are left without the proverbial leg to stand on. We still have, however, the question, granting all this, what at this late date can we do? Here the author gives us excellent hints in his description of the possibility of effective competition by such public developments as Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam, and smaller plants and distributing systems which power districts and cities can economically set up. He discusses optimistically

New Additions to the MODERN LIBRARY
complete and unabridged at 95 cents a copy

A FAREWELL TO ARMS by Ernest Hemingway 19	VICTORY by Joseph Conrad 34
SANCTUARY by William Faulkner 61	TCHEKOV'S SHORT STORIES 50
A HIGH WIND IN JAMAICA by Richard Hughes 112	SISTER CARRIE by Theodore Dreiser 8
CRIME AND PUNISHMENT by Dostoyevsky 199	DRACULA by Bram Stoker 31
THE MAGIC MOUNTAIN by Thomas Mann 200	TESS OF THE D'URBERVILLES by Thomas Hardy 72

A NEW BOOK FOR TODAY
KARL MARX'S CAPITAL
and Other Writings
Including all the important chapters from the monumental "Capital," The Communist Manifesto, Marx's Theory of History, and an essay on Marx by Lenin. Edited with an introduction by
MAX EASTMAN 202

TONO-BUNGAY by H. G. Wells 197	DEATH COMES FOR THE ARCHBISHOP by Willa Cather 191
CASUALS OF THE SEA by William McFee 195	SONS AND LOVERS by D. H. Lawrence 109
DROLL STORIES by Balzac 193	SWANN'S WAY by Marcel Proust 59
THE DECAMERON by Boccaccio 71	OF HUMAN BONDAGE by W. Somerset Maugham 176

A Complete List of 210 Modern Library Books costs you nothing

USE THIS COUPON

To YOUR BOOKSELLER or THE MODERN LIBRARY, INC. N-9
20 East 57th Street, New York City
Please mail me MODERN LIBRARY books Nos. ....
☐ I enclose $1.00 for each volume (95c for the book, 5c for postage)
☐ Send books C. O. D. ☐ Please send me, free of charge, your latest list of Modern Library books.
Name.....
Address.....
City..... State.....

the use of the public corporation to avoid direct public operation by political authorities. (The Port Authority of New York is an example.)

Yet here one wishes Mr. Raushenbush had gone farther and sketched more boldly a possible comprehensive plan. Shall we seek to buy out the existing trusts with the federal government owning the great control plants and transmission lines, while municipalities and power districts take over distribution? Or can we get satisfactory results by developing a competition which will ultimately drive private companies, now so arrogantly intrenched, to surrender? What is the relation of power to the coal problem? Must we deal with power and perhaps other forms of public ownership by further amendment to the Constitution, remembering that in the Eighteenth Amendment we have a precedent for rather ruthless confiscation, or destruction of private-property values? Can we successfully fight the power trust as an isolated issue, leaving untouched the general acceptance of the righteousness of the profit system? After all, the power trust is in no sense worse than some other forms of private ownership—perhaps it has fewer sins to its charge than our banking system or than the chaotic, competitive, private ownership of bituminous coal.

These and other problems demand answer. No one in America can answer them better than Stephen Raushenbush. May we not hope for the development of his suggestive chapter "A Program of Peace With Power" into a new volume?

NORMAN THOMAS

Ethics Without Inspiration

Ethics. By Nicolai Hartmann. Translation by Stanton Coit. Volume I: Moral Phenomena. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

PROFESSOR Hartmann's "Ethics" of which the present volume represents a translation of the first section, is an outstanding and important contribution to philosophy. It is written with a power of analysis rarely found today in philosophical literature, and it has in addition qualities of eloquence which under other circumstances would have made the book a work of genius. What seems to be missing, however, is a philosophical point of view capable of moving the reader and inspiring him to new spiritual heights. For this reason the work is likely to prove more valuable for its criticism of rival philosophies and for its incidental aperçus than for its constructive thesis.

The fault, as the reviewer sees it, derives from the tenets of the school of thought with which the author is associated. This is the school of phenomenology which has been developed in Germany under the leadership of Professor Husserl in the guise of a realistic reaction against the psychologism introduced into modern philosophy by Kant. The realism of the school is, however, not the ordinary empirical realism or naturalism, but a logical realism of essences directly intuited by consciousness. In their emphasis upon the objective rather than the subjective character of the phenomena given in mind, they pride themselves indeed on going back to Plato, but they lack his unifying drive, and the net result of their analysis is to break up the world arbitrarily into fields of self-existent essences without a principle of movement and without a principle of concretion behind them.

In ethics, where the point of view of the phenomenologists approaches that of the Anglo-American school of "values," the weakness manifests itself in the lack of a spiritual drive. Ethics becomes indistinguishable from a contemplation of aesthetic essences à la Santayana. There is none of the missionary quest for an all-highest, such as Santayana objected to in Platonism; without it, however, ethics loses all meaning. Professor Hartmann's book contains excellent critiques of the fallacies of empirical ethics, such as egoism, altruism, and utilitarianism. There is an emphasis on the a priori and ideal self-existence of ethical values. But on the crucial question of the relativity of values—that is to say, the relativity for different cultures and different stages of progress—Dr. Hartmann's message breaks down. Instead of giving us a conception of the relative as constituting stages in the progress toward an absolute, the author treats the whole problem descriptively as if it were analogous to the relation of the relative and the absolute in a system of physics. Any one who comes to the book with a troubled conscience and in quest of a way of life is likely to be grievously disappointed. Instead of an indication of a highest good, he will find a discussion of the properties of "valuational space"!

The fault in the message, as we have said, does not destroy the value of the book from other points of view. But it necessarily confines its appeal to the student of philosophy who is more or less professionally oriented.

BENJAMIN GINZBURG

Shorter Notices

The Ripening. By Colette. Translated from the French by Ida Zeitlin. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

The unimaginative greed and the imperfect scholarship of American publishers have recently been responsible for the foisting upon the public of a good deal of mediocre Colette. "The Ripening," however, is one of her finer novels and may be recommended to those who have already acquired a taste for this remarkable writer. Like so many of her books it is a study in adolescence, and particularly in adolescent love. Trembling between the worlds of childhood and maturity, sensitive and brutal as animals, secretive, sensual, wise, brooding—her fifteen-year-old Vinca and her sixteen-year-old Philippe will perhaps appear precocious, even decadent to Americans whose emotional childhood is indefinitely prolonged and whose shallow adolescence finds its exact interpretation in the shallow pages of a Booth Tarkington. But there can be little doubt of the genuineness of Colette's insight into the turbulent savage minds of her young boys and girls. It is true that only France can produce them and only a Frenchwoman, perhaps, interpret them; but so skilful is her art that the appeal of these children is made universal. Her whole concern, it would at first appear, is with the senses. It is not into the hearts of her characters that she looks, but at their nerve-ends. Yet from these shudders of the epidermis, "these pleasures," as she has elsewhere noted, "which we lightly term physical," she extracts a whole universe of psychological insights and emotional notations which are of the same order though not of the same depth as those of Marcel Proust. Colette is a writer to be read and reread; there is far more in her than would appear on the surface.

The Indifferent Ones. By Alberto Moravia. Translated by Aida Mastrangelo. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

The praise heaped on this novel in its native land is in part explained by the comparatively degenerate state of contemporary fascist literature. Strangely enough, in Mussolini's Italy, where the virtues of vigor, optimism, and strength have been established by police decree, Moravia's book, a record of futility, weariness, and despair, has been enormously popular. Its central situation—that of the lover who forsakes his aging mistress for the fresher body of her daughter—reeks of the rottenness of D'Annunzio's era. But the characters are not animated by D'Annunzio's passion; they are, as the title suggests, indifferent, tired even of their own decadence. They represent a class, as Moravia makes clear, which has lost confidence in itself. Their sensuality is half-hearted; their commercial acumen has withered to a desperate, clawing greed; they are devoid of loyalty to self, family, class, or country. Their subconscious desire is to die, to destroy what they hate most—theirself. Thus their very blood anticipates the stern judgment of history. Though his book is boring, Moravia has succeeded in indicting Italy's decaying upper middle class. It is astonishing that Il Duce should have permitted this morbid and life-denying novel to circulate freely among the inheritors of the tradition of the Caesars.

Song and Its Fountains. By Æ. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

This is a somewhat involved and emotional statement of Æ's philosophy and theory of aesthetics. For Mr. Russell, beauty is the "bridal night of soul and body," and to be arrived at through the practice of meditation. This philosopher and poet finds that the certainty of the perfect dream-state dims as one grows older, that only the child obtains it easily, that the adult, to create, must strive always to sink back into that state of mind in which the subconscious predominates. But Mr. Russell makes use of no psychological terms in analyzing the creative state of mind; his tendency is toward a very obscure metaphysics. A dream which he actually had as a child becomes symbolic to him of the "circle of light" toward which he must strive if he is to sing out of a kind of trance. And for him the process of creation must take place in a kind of trance. The intellect plays little part in this poet's writings; they spring from emotional absorption in a feeling which instantly becomes significant to him when it seems to flow out of and toward the Vast.

PLAYS

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN With GLENN ANDERS
DOROTHY STICKNEY, MARGARET WYCHERLY, JOHN BEAL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."

—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

BOOTH THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. Sat. 2:40

The Nation's Radio Hour

Henry Hazlitt, Literary Editor of The Nation, will discuss André Maurois' "Voltaire" on Wednesday, September 7.

Station WEVD

8:15 p.m.

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

Another Language—Booth—45 St., W. of B'way.

Bridal Wise—Cort—W. 48 St

Of Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.

Show Boat—Casino—7 Ave. at 50 St.

The Cat and the Fiddle—Cohan—43 St. & B'way.

A NEW DEAL

By STUART CHASE

Author of 'MEXICO', 'MEN and MACHINES', 'TRAGEDY of WASTE' etc.

STUART CHASE

"A better economic order is worth a little bloodshed."

"Why should Russians have all the fun in remodeling a world."

"Thousands of young, ambitious, intelligent Americans have chosen racketeering as their life work."

WHAT is the real role of Henry Ford in Modern Business?
WHAT are the Sixteen Basic Methods for Becoming Wealthy?
WHAT big names contributed directly to The Depression—and How?
WHAT is The Inescapable Next Economic Development—and Why?

The answer to these questions is only a small part of the lively reading to be found in Mr. Chase's latest work. He details steps which should be taken to effect an immediate cure; discusses the possibility of Revolution if national leadership fails, and forecasts with vivid realism the future of national and international economy.

"Everything he writes is alive with a profound awareness."

"A magic touch that translates modern economics into drama."

—The Nation

—Survey Graphic

At all Book Stores $2.00

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
60 FIFTH AVENUE . . . NEW YORK CITY

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

PROGRESSIVE SCHOOL

Boys and Girls Ages 3-10
THE DURLACH SCHOOL
 ■ new departure in education
 Modern methods coordinate school and home care and aim to develop the integrated personality of the child. Limited groups in informal environment; play roof; afternoon activities. Recreation month (February) in the country. Folder upon request.
 Tel. BUt. 8-7226.
 875 Park Ave. NEW YORK CITY 210 E. 68th St.

TEACHER connected with progressive school in Santa Fe wants to take two children out with her for the winter. Experienced in home care of children. References. Box 744, c/o The Nation.

EDUCATIONAL

LANGUAGES Conversationally taught for immediate use.
 Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers.
UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
 Established Over 20 Years
 1265 Lexington Ave. ATwater 9-5123

FRENCH Spanish, Italian, German Russian, Conversational.
 Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c. Daily 9-9.
Fisher School of Languages, 1264 Lexington Av. (bet. 85-86 Sts.) Est. 1905. ATwater 9-6078

RUSSIAN by university man, instructor in Russian at Berlitz School.
 Private lessons or classes. Phonograph records used. Michael Jerlitzyn, 2018 Fifth Avenue. Tel. HARlem 7-8446.

How to WRITE

Why not be a writer? It's ■ fascinating, well-paid profession. My book, "How to Become a Writer of Little Blue Books," shows you how to make your start. Written so anyone can understand it; sent postpaid for 25c in stamps or coin. Order now!
 E. Haldeman-Julius, Desk 300, Girard, Kansas. COMPLETE 25c
 No More to Pay

FOR RENT

5-7-9 WEST 65TH STREET

Desirable, modern apartments, all improvements. Select tenancy. Convenient to transportation.

4 Rooms.....$85 | 2½ Rooms.....$75
 3 Rooms.....$80 | 1 Room.....$40

Representative ■ buildings or

L. J. PHILLIPS & CO., Agent
 134 W. 72nd Street TRafalgar 7-9300

TO LET, on club property adjacent to a large nudist park, a five-room stone bungalow, equipped with modern plumbing and all electrical appliances, including an electric cooking range. The bungalow is completely and attractively furnished. Tenant or lessee must be qualified for, and desire, membership in the nudist club which owns the large wooded, surrounding estate, distance two and one-half hours by train from New York City. Address Box 731, c/o The Nation.

FURNISHED APARTMENT

PARLOR FLOOR to let, 323 W. 22nd St.—2 large rooms 18x22, 12-ft. ceilings and real kitchen, wood-burning fireplace, old colonial furniture, piano, will redecorate to suit, $80 a month. Chelsea 3-7957.

TO SHARE

WILL share my attractive home, 70 acre farm, 60 miles from N. Y. C., with responsible people. $50 monthly. All year residence. Heat, modern plumbing, gas, electricity. Stan Brooke Farm, Farmingdale, N. J.

WOMAN with limited income, complete household equipment, wishes mature woman of culture to share expenses. Small apartment, New Haven, Conn. Answer fully. Box 743, c/o The Nation.

ROOM

BEAUTIFUL large front furnished room. Accommodate 1 or 2. All modern improvements. Quiet section. Convenient to transit lines. Call mornings 9-12 or evenings. Tel. Monument 2-4767.

MANUSCRIPTS

CHARLES PIENING, Roedingshof, Hamburg 11, Germany, receives manuscripts of stories, plays, song hits, etc., for translation and utilization, on commission or partnership basis.

POSITION WANTED

PERSONNEL Director, Superintendent or managing director desired by young woman. Background: 2 degrees; personnel research and supervision; director group of hotels and dormitories; university teaching; social and economic surveys and reorganization of large institutions; periodical contributions. Box 745, c/o The Nation.

DEAN of Women or Girls desired by cultured young woman of extensive experience and training. Background: 2 degrees; dean's diploma; personnel director and instructor in secondary school; dean Grade A College; personnel research; local and national committees; writings. Box 742, c/o The Nation.

PERSONAL

MODERN THINKERS reject most of the accumulated bunk of the ages parading as "Christian Civilization." Contacts connects you with independent, debunked thinkers. Rare books loaned. Send 3c stamp. Contacts, 211 East 11th Street, New York City.

RESORTS

PEARL RIVER FARM RESORT "MARTEROMO"

Open all year. Located on large private estate, 20 miles from New York. Romantic country place with modern accommodations. High elevation. Private lake; boating, bathing, fishing. Tennis court. Golf links near. Ideal place for recreation, relaxation, health. Convenient for weekends. Food chiefly own farm products.

Rates: $3.50 per day. Weekly rates $18. Free transportation to guests to and from R.R. and bus stations. Buses: Spring Valley Motor Coach, Hotel Astor, 44th St. & Bway. Silver Ball Auto Coach, terminal 505 W. 181st St. Also Erie R.R. at excursion rates.

PEARL RIVER INDUSTRIES, INC., Owners
 Pearl River, N. Y. Tel. Pearl River 973

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone: 100

Formerly a millionaire's estate. Most beautifully landscaped. A spot of rare beauty in the Ramapo hills. Finest accommodations.

Tennis, Basket and Hand Ball. Boating, Swimming ■ premises. Horses and Golf nearby.

1½ hours Erie R.R. Bus or route 17.

OPEN ALL YEAR

FOR delightful vacations — or week-ends TOPSTONE FARM, in the Connecticut hills, restful, secluded. We keep our own saddle horses, and provide instruction. Address: R. F. D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn. Phone Ridgefield 648.

OLD ORCHARD—Ridgefield, Conn. Sept., Oct., Nov. rates, $3 per day. Clientele—persons afflicted with good taste and small means. Vast orchard. Farm products. Modern equipment. Phone or write. Leah W. Leonard, Hostess.

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE

Pleasant Valley, N. Y. Tel. Pleasant Valley 39
 An ideal vacation place. Quiet, restful, Jewish home cooking. Bathing, boating, fishing. Tennis. Cheap fare by Hudson River. $15 per week. Louis Sakow, Prop.

COLONY HOUSE PEEKSKILL, N. Y.

(near Crompond Road) Phone Peekskill 2733
 Commuting distance. Vacation and week-end accommodations. Lake bathing. Reasonable rates. Directions: Mohegan Colony bus to premises.

Recreation CREATION at THE CRYSTAL VILLA Woodcliff Lake, N. J.

■ miles from N. Y. Fare 90c. Weekends—$1.00 return. Combines country pleasure with city ■ conveniences. Ideal for convalescents. Cater to diets. Bracing walks. Bathing on premises. Wholesome Jewish-American table. Refinement. Congeniality. Rates considerably reduced. Phone Park Ridge 404.

COME to the seashore for delightful weekends and vacations. The finest surf bathing on Long Island; beautiful beach and boardwalk. And at Reiber's Cottage you get most comfortable accommodations and choicest food. Reasonable rates. Belle Harbor 5-0089.

OPEN SHELF

Henry George's Books
 Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations of famous m. — sent for.
 None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.
ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
 15 Park Place, New York City
SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

PHYSICAL CULTURE

"THE AMERICAN LEAGUE FOR PHYSICAL CULTURE, oldest and largest nudist organization in the United States, with its own farm within easy commuting distance, city gymnasium with pool, and branches in various State invites to membership progressive men and women. For details address W. Lambrecht, 981 Sumner Avenue, New York.

RESORTS

RESORTS

COOKSFALLS LODGE

ROSCOE, N. Y.

On the beautiful Kodak trail

John Rosenfield, Prop. Tel. 2 F 13

Just what you have been looking for— a modern hotel in gorgeous country, with all camp activities. Facing Beaverkill River, famous for its trout fishing. Private lake. Tennis, handball, golf, fishing, swimming, etc. Also Egyptian card room and Bohemian Tea Room.

REDUCED RATES $22.50 to $30.00
 (Equally attractive rates for September)

RED OAKS

Atlantic Highlands New Jersey

A 150 acre country estate one hour from New York, with private lake for swimming and boating. Tennis. Old Gardens. Famous Cuisine. Beautifully appointed rooms. Intellectual and congenial group. Splendid opportunity for those wanting to finish a piece of work. Open all year. Reasonable rates.

Management—Masha and Hyman Strunsky

Phone Atlantic Highlands 264

THE FAYLAND, Hudson, N. Y.

ALL-YEAR TOURISTS' stop-over. Albany Post Road U. S. 9. Four miles south of Hudson. Garage, electricity, baths, radio, farm product home cooking. Swimming. Ping Pong. $1 weekly. B'klyn tel.: Dewey 9-1059 after 4 p.m.

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship, wholesome food. Tennis. THE HILBERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
 Hill Friedberg Prop. Tel. Mahopac ■

BERKSHIRE PINES

"In the lyric Berkshire Hills"

WEST COPAKE, NEW YORK

Splendid cuisine; tennis, all water sports. Transportation for golf nearby, gratis. Billiards, etc. Many ■ features for the season of 1932. Reduced rates September. Call COPAKE 46, or write PEARL CHEIFETZ.

ENGLISH Hospitality offered few discriminating guests. 100 lovely acres. Delightful hiking. Weekend rates $4 and $5 (Public Holiday daily. Return fare $2.00. Trains met. Arthur Morse, Erwhon, Monroe, N. Y.

VINEYAND LODGE, Ulster Park, N. Y.
 "Garden spot of Ulster County." Modern hotel amidst beautiful 200-acre fruit and grape farm, solariums, saddle horses, tennis courts, social activities; refinement; congeniality; American Jewish cuisine. Rates reduced to $18.00 weekly. Joseph Rosenthal. Phone, Kingston 3430.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1932

No. 3506

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	221
EDITORIALS:
Patriotic Liars .....	223
Three Letters .....	224
Threatening the Peace of Europe .....	225
THE SPANISH REPUBLIC MEETS THE TEST. By Bailey W. Dickey .....	226
THE SHOW BUSINESS. II. HOW IT WORKS. By Joseph Wood Krutch .....	227
THE POT AND THE KETTLE: Our Invisible Government and "Wasted" Votes. By Oswald Garrison Villard .....	229
INSULTING THE CATHOLICS. By Paul Y. Anderson .....	230
PRELUDE. By Conrad Aiken .....	231
GRAHAM WALLAS. By S. K. Ratcliffe .....	232
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .....	233
CORRESPONDENCE .....	233
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Stone Face. By Lola Ridge .....	235
Voltaire. By Henry Hazlitt .....	235
The Way of All Churches. By Benjamin Ginsburg .....	236
George Eliot at Home. By Horace Gregory .....	236
Myth, Fact, and Poetry of Soviet Russia. By Sidney Hook .....	237
Shorter Notices .....	238
Films: Three Premature Births. By Alexander Bakshy .....	239
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE .....	240

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
MARGARET MARSHALL

DRAMATIC EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN    H. L. MENCKEN    MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT    NORMAN THOMAS    CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON    ARTHUR WARNER

MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

JAMES JOSEPH WALKER, Mayor of New York City, has retired under fire. It was only a few months ago that Walker was boasting of the ease with which he would crush those persons who dared accuse him of improper conduct in office. But when it came time to answer their charges his usually ready wit floundered in a morass of hesitant, stuttering, confused replies. In brief, Mayor Walker, finding that he was convicting himself by his inability to meet squarely and frankly the accusations brought against him, did what a man convinced of his own innocence would not have done: he abruptly terminated the hearing before Governor Roosevelt by resigning from office. The hearing he called "a travesty, a mock trial." He declared he was "being outraged by the unlawful acts of the Governor." He even had the effrontery to assert that "I have met my accusers and disproved their charges." Finally, he suggested that he would seek vindication at the hands of the voters of New York. So far, Governor Roosevelt has seen fit not to reply to Walker's hysterical statement. Here he again displays the wisdom he exercised throughout the hearing of the charges against Walker. The record of that hearing is the only fitting or necessary reply to Walker's assertion that Roosevelt was not giving him a fair trial. Governor Roosevelt's handling of the case speaks for itself. Whether Walker's resignation will impair the Governor's chances of carrying New York State in the Presidential election is a question. This will certainly be true if Tammany Hall and the other Democratic machines in New York City support the former Mayor in seeking vindication at a special city election in November. The row within the Democratic Party would unquestionably help the Republican Presidential ticket. But it does not seem likely that the Walker case will have any measurable influence on the national election outside of New York State. The voters are not thinking of corruption in New York. The economic situation has given them more than enough other and more important things to think about. If Governor Roosevelt wins, it will not be because he favors or opposes municipal corruption, but because the voters are fed up on Republican misrule in Washington.

ALTHOUGH THE STRAW BALLOTS appear to be running heavily in his favor, Governor Roosevelt is probably finding no great comfort in the results of the various State primaries which have been held to date. In the Senatorial race in California, for example, 700,000 Republican votes were cast as against only 410,000 Democratic votes. This showing does not seem to portend a political upheaval in that normally Republican State. True, Senator Samuel M. Shortridge was defeated for renomination, which seems to indicate that the California voters are ready to turn out the men now holding office, but his defeat was probably due more to the breezy campaigning of his successful opponent, Tallant Tubbs, and to a factional row within the Republican Party than to any desire on the part of the California electorate to revolt against present office-holders. In the Texas primaries Governor R. S. Sterling appears to have been defeated by the irrepressible "Ma" Ferguson, but Mrs. Ferguson's margin was extremely narrow. Again, it may be noted, there was no landslide of protest votes. In South Carolina the present incumbent actually led the list of aspirants for the Democratic Senatorial nomination. Senator E. D. Smith ran ahead of Cole Blease, the picturesque former Senator from that State, although Blease has always been known as a good vote-getter, especially in hard times. Franklin Roosevelt may find a great deal of satisfaction in the victory of William Gibbs McAdoo, who won the Democratic Senatorial nomination in California, but McAdoo's action at the Chicago convention and his sharp fighting in the primary campaign have left some sores which may, unless healed in time, prove a hindrance rather than a help to Roosevelt in California on November 8.

ROSCOE POUND, Dean of the Harvard Law School and a member of the Wickersham Commission, has indorsed the latest attitude of President Hoover on prohibition.

It is admirable . . . for its rejection of the speciously simple but illusory remedy of complete repeal. . . . It is not evasion, it is rather straightforward recognition of the difficulties of a complete problem. . . . As things are, there are compelling reasons for retaining a measure of direct federal power of control, while making possible an adjustment to local conditions and local opinions.

We do not doubt the sincerity of Dean Pound's own position, but we marvel that he can believe in the sincerity of the President's corkscrew course on the subject. We beg to remind him of the letter which President Hoover sent to Congress on January 20, 1931, accompanying the Wickersham report. The President wrote:

The commission, by a large majority, does not favor the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment as a method of cure for the inherent abuses of the liquor traffic. I am in accord with this view. . . . I do, however, see serious objection to, and therefore must not be understood as recommending, the commission's proposed revision of the Eighteenth Amendment which is suggested by them for possible consideration at some future time if the continued effort at enforcement should not prove successful.

What the commission had recommended—Dean Pound concurring—was that the present Eighteenth Amendment compelling Congress to prohibit intoxicating liquors should be changed to one merely empowering Congress to "regulate or prohibit" them. What was the President's "serious objection" to this? Why did he not even deign to tell Congress what it was? Would not a sincere man have felt obliged at the very least to give his reason for rejecting the principal recommendation, after nearly two years of work, of the official commission appointed by himself? Did not that recommendation embody the most simple and direct, if not the only feasible way of achieving Mr. Hoover's present ostensible aims? And if this is what the President, with his eleventh-hour change of heart, now approves, can he not say so plainly, instead of hiding behind the dishonesty and self-contradictions of the Republican prohibition plank or the ambiguities of his own acceptance speech? Dean Pound may flatter himself that the President's prohibition views now sound vaguely like his own, but how he can bring himself to praise the President for his "straightforwardness" is beyond us.

THE WHITE HOUSE apparently can think of no one to turn to for help in this time of economic distress except the very industrialists and bankers whose blind leadership contributed so largely to the making of the depression. The latest Presidential appointment of this nature is that of Walter C. Teagle, head of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, who has been named to direct Mr. Hoover's job-sharing drive, which is simply another plan for saddling the costs of the depression on the workers. The Teagle committee will seek to "persuade" workers who have jobs to share their working time and wages with their unemployed colleagues. The independent retail gasoline dealers of New Jersey have another objection to the Teagle appointment. In an open letter to Mr. Hoover they declare that Teagle, "within the last three weeks, has sponsored a movement which will throw thousands of men out of work, and ruin the businesses of thousands of independent service-station retailers in New Jersey." This, they charge, the Standard Oil Company is doing by increasing the wholesale price of gasoline and oil sold to independent dealers, while at the same time holding down the retail price of motor fuels sold at its own stations. The margin of profit of the independent dealers, who cannot compete with the Standard Oil stations unless they keep their own retail prices down, is thus being converted into a loss. Why is it that Mr. Hoover must always pick such men as Walter Teagle to promote employment? Why, if he is really sincere in trying to help the workers, does he always turn to big business, to the discredited bankers and industrialists, instead of to social workers and honest labor leaders, when he needs help of this sort?

THE STATEMENTS OF THE COUNTRY'S monetary circulation are already beginning to reflect the effects of the unfortunate Glass-Borah amendment to the Home Loan Bank bill. The Federal Reserve report for the week ended August 31, although revealing an increase of $7,000,000 in the total volume of money in circulation, showed a falling off in outstanding Federal Reserve notes of $10,785,000. What this means is merely that the new national bank-note circulation, instead of increasing the total money supply of the country, is simply being issued to replace an equivalent volume of Federal Reserve notes. One of the great aims of the Federal Reserve Act was to get rid of the inelastic bond-secured national bank-note currency and substitute an elastic currency based on commercial paper, and varying with the needs of business. The recent Glass-Borah amendment was a retrograde step, a resumption of the old inelastic bond-secured currency; it is merely one more hysterical piece of "relief" legislation beginning to bear fruit.

AT THIS WRITING, 160,000 workers are on strike in the Lancashire cotton industry. The issue is not entirely one of wages. The employers, in making new wage agreements, demanded a cut of 10 per cent; the workers signified their willingness to take a cut of 6.8 per cent on condition that workers who had struck against local wage reductions made by employers before the old agreements were terminated be reinstated; but the employers refused to discharge the "scab" workers and promised to reinstate union workers only when and if vacancies occur. The government has already taken steps to end the dispute—a course which, in view of the intense feeling on both sides, seems to offer the only hope of settlement. The British press is divided in its sympathies; the Manchester Guardian, for instance, puts the blame upon "stiff-necked people on both sides who are bringing the name of Lancashire into contempt throughout the world." The fact is that the British cotton industry, like the coal industry, is in need of drastic reorganization, a remedy which, because it would mean more unemployment, even the workers do not care to face. Given the present chaotic state of the industry, it is not surprising that the employers are insisting that a cut in wages is essential, though there is no apparent justification for their refusal to reinstate employees who struck because of broken agreements. Yet whatever blame may attach to the workers in this dispute becomes academic in face of the fact that the average weekly wage in Lancashire, even without the cut proposed, is two pounds, or about seven dollars.

THE WORLD JEWISH CONFERENCE, which met recently in Geneva, voted to call a world congress during the summer of 1934. This congress will discuss such questions as anti-Semitism, Zionism, minority rights, and the economic status of Jewish life. To our mind this represents not only a courageous, but an extremely important step. There were many influential members of the race who opposed the idea of holding a world congress. Some apparently were afraid of their Jewishness—obscurantists who thought it would perhaps be wiser not to emphasize the differences between their people and other races. Some believed an international congress of Jews would simply serve to antagonize still further the anti-Semitic forces at work in many European countries. They feared that the meeting to be held in 1934 would be falsely interpreted as another Jewish conspiracy to dominate the world. A few of the opponents were merely defeatists. That all these objections were overcome at the Geneva conference shows with what good sense the majority of the leaders are facing the problems of their race. Surely obscurantism and defeatism will never solve those problems, nor will anti-Semitism abate merely because the Jews are afraid to be frank and honest with themselves. Only by discussing them in open and democratic fashion can the tasks before the Jewish race successfully be met.

WASHINGTON OFFICIALS are still at the business of throttling criticism by depriving newspaper correspondents of their jobs. Some months ago Robert S. Allen, chief of the Washington bureau of the Christian Science Monitor, was summarily dismissed when it was learned that he was one of the authors of "Washington Merry-Go-Round." It was reported at the time—and not denied—that Allen was removed at the suggestion of the White House. Now the sequel of that daring and highly informative book has been brought out, and another one of the authors has lost his newspaper position. The latest victim is Drew Pearson, State Department correspondent for the Baltimore Sun. The managing editor of the Sun, which has long been known for its liberalism, simply informed Mr. Pearson that "we have read the book and the verdict is against you. Your usefulness for us has terminated." But Secretary of War Hurley, who is dealt with unsparingly and at great length in "More Merry-Go-Round," plainly told Mr. Pearson, according to the latter's statement, that he would telephone Paul Patterson, publisher of the Sun, and demand Mr. Pearson's removal. Such action on the part of the Secretary of War is about what might have been expected from that official, but that a newspaper of the Sun's honorable standing should lend itself to this action seems to us wholly inexplicable.

EVEN A PUBLIC SOMEWHAT JADED by the marvels of mechanical progress whistled when it read that James Haizlip had flown from Los Angeles to New York in ten hours and twenty minutes, an average speed from coast to coast of 246 miles an hour, while his nearest rival was only about half an hour behind him; and, a few days later, that Major Doolittle had flown for a short stretch at a rate of more than five miles a minute. Well, there can surely be little objection to new speed records as long as there is no pretense that they are being achieved for any other purpose than "record-breaking" itself. The engineers who designed the planes, motors, and propellers that make such speeds possible can take justifiable pride in their own ingenuity, and so can the flyers in their own skill and daring, but let us not pretend that these new speeds increase human welfare or do anything, in fact, but make the necks of everybody less safe.

Patriotic Liars

NOT long ago a Boston editor made a defense of Mr. Hoover's policy that we do not believe has been so clearly made before, at least in print. He admitted that Mr. Hoover had not been telling the American people the full truth about conditions. He went further: he admitted that the President had been deliberately deceiving us. And he defended him on the ground that if he had taken ■ course of "forecasting calamity and predicted bankruptcy and urged drastic reduction of wages," the country would have collapsed entirely. It is refreshing to see such candor. It is not often that editors admit and defend official lying, but there are obviously hundreds of them who privately hold the belief of the candid Bostonian.

Let us begin by admitting that whatever plausibility it has is the result of a germ of truth. Without confidence there can be no prosperity. That is too obvious to need stating. But it does not follow that confidence can be restored by any direct and merely psychological or hypnotic means, or that, if it could, it would in itself restore prosperity. Can confidence really be restored by lying? Even to ask the question in this direct form is to answer it in the negative. The people, perhaps, can be deceived once, even twice, but they cannot be deceived indefinitely, with the same device and by the same person. When the President seeks to maintain confidence either negatively, by withholding important facts, or positively, by saying that the facts are different from what they are, he is obliged to maintain that course continuously. The result is that everything gained by the first lie—assuming anything really is gained—is subsequently more than lost. The President may have hoped to gain something when he remarked in March, 1930, that "the worst effects of the crash and unemployment will have passed during the next thirty days." He may even have hoped that by continuing to whistle in the dark in May, 1930, with his statement, "We have now passed the worst," something could still be made to happen. But when he had twice been made ridiculous by events, what could he have hoped to gain in December, 1930, by saying "We have already weathered the worst of the storm"? What can he hope to gain now with his new series of statements about having "overcome the major financial crisis"? What did he hope to accomplish with his series of statements about the cessation of hoarding when the official figures of the Federal Reserve System showed that hoarding was still increasing?

It would be unfair to imply that President Hoover has been alone in this policy. In the last few years it has become a more and more widespread game. It has sometimes seemed, indeed, as if each of us was engaged in trying to reassure and deceive all the rest of us. In a general conspiracy to deceive ourselves, we agree that banks shall no longer carry their securities at present market value, but at the market value of a past date when they were much higher. When the failure of the Bank of United States—the largest bank failure ever to occur in the United States—was announced, the news appeared almost everywhere under ■ single-column head, as if it were a routine news item. The Insull receivership—the largest corporation receivership, in terms of dollars involved, in our history—was thought worthy of newspaper announcement only on the back pages. Today well-known firms continue to tumble into receivership in the back pages while the stock market goes up, and everybody is very optimistic, on the front page.

Just where has this whole policy got us? It has not prevented the worst stock-market collapse or the most appalling volume of unemployment of which we have any definite record. So far from having made conditions any better than they would have been, it has probably made them much worse. For it has undermined the confidence of the public in its newspapers and almost completely removed any confidence in its business and political leaders. Thousands of persons, having discovered in the past that conditions were much worse than they were represented as being, assume that the same must be true of the present.

A great economic crisis cannot be cured or mitigated by lying and misrepresentation. A policy of this sort is fundamentally cynical and contemptuous, for it assumes that the American people are so hysterical and untrustworthy that they cannot be told the truth in an emergency. The defense of such a policy assumes that there are only two courses—either to lie, or to shriek calamity from the housetops. It overlooks a third course, honorable and simple, of telling the exact truth without Cassandra-like wailing or prophecies, or of saying nothing when there is nothing cheerful to be said.

Three Letters

WE print here excerpts from three letters which have recently come into our hands, three desperate appeals for help from mothers of families who have reached the end of their resources. The first is from a woman in a West Virginia mining town.

Could you please get me a few clothes for an unborn baby? The mines are not running here, as you know, and I am going to need clothes badly before many weeks. I am not able to buy any, so if I can't get a few together it will have to come and stay naked. If you can possibly do anything for me please let me know. I just want something for the baby, that is all.

The second letter, which comes from another mining town in West Virginia, is written, with amazing spirit, by the twenty-eight-year-old mother of six children.

My baby was born May 25. She has dark hair and dark blue eyes. She is extra good. She needs nothing but a cap, a coat, and a blanket. I hope I can get them soon.

School will soon start here and I dread it. Times are terrible. My husband only gets $2 a day and that doesn't go far. I have three children to start to school this fall. That means three coats, besides all their other clothes. Talking of hard times, I wonder what people will do this winter. My husband will have steady work only until fall.

The third appeal is from a woman in Marion, North Carolina. We have reason to know that she has given help to the other women of her community throughout the long period of distress. Now she must ask help for herself.

I love children and have often wanted to have children of my own. But to have one now, as I am going to, is almost more than I can stand. My husband has had about ten weeks work since 1929. I have four step-children, so there are six in my family. I have suffered so much in the past few years, and have seen my family suffer for even enough food. Why should I bring another baby here to suffer in this world as we are having to do?

I need fruit and milk and vegetables. I need rest. I need yards of material for sheets and gowns. I have no blankets. I need baby clothes. Most of all I need some medicine and a doctor's care. The doctor says that if everything goes all right, he will take care of me for $40, but that is the best he can do.

I am five feet, six inches tall, and have a step-daughter the same height, one girl thirteen, and a boy ten years. The oldest boy is sixteen. They have some clothes but I am sorry to say not enough for school wear.

I hate charity. I would rather earn what I can than beg, but my condition now forces me not only to take charity but even to ask for it. I've tried so hard to get along without it, and I've tried so hard to help others. Now I must ask for help for myself. My husband left this morning without food or money to go to another State to look for work. I am surely hoping he will get something.

As for things you may collect, I can sew, and if I get able will be glad to mend or remodel anything—and there are many here who are in the same boat with me. I could pass things on to others who need them if I can't use them.

The three cases so affectingly outlined here, while extreme, are not isolated. Throughout America thousands of people, young, old, and middle-aged, are living on the edge of starvation. In every American city and town, women, who feel a peculiar and terrible physical responsibility for their children, are having to witness day by day the suffering of workless, discouraged husbands and of children whose hunger is never satisfied. Meanwhile a senseless state, while it refuses to take responsibility for its citizens and their children, forbids them even the knowledge of birth control.

That the response to these individual appeals will be great there is no doubt.* But what of the thousands upon thousands whose need is never dramatized, whose hunger is made known to us only through the dead figures of a report on unemployment? Industrial mass production, when it breaks down, brings mass hunger, and mass hunger is invariably shut off, in the slums of the poor, from the sight of those from whom charity must come.

To defenders of the dignity of the human spirit charity is abhorrent because it falsely glorifies the giver and humiliates the recipient. What is even more relevant to the present situation is that charity is hopelessly outmoded as a means of insuring the daily bread of the eleven millions who today cannot find work in America.

We appeal to our readers to see to it that the three women whose letters we have published here are made secure for the coming winter. We appeal to the American people to insist, first, upon direct and adequate relief to the millions of families who will need help this winter; second, upon unemployment insurance, old-age pensions, and protection of the health of the nation's mothers and children; and finally, upon a reordering of our society to the end that an equitable and regulated distribution of work and wealth will make such suffering impossible.

* Contributions for destitute families in the mining towns of West Virginia may be sent to Tom Tippet, Chairman of Relief, Room 9, Old Kanawha Valley Bank Building, Charleston, West Virginia. Clothes or money for the woman in North Carolina as well as for her neighbors may be sent to the office of The Nation.

Threatening the Peace of Europe

GERMANY has finally requested that it be permitted to enlarge its military establishment. It wants that equality in armaments which the victorious Powers promised at the peace conference, but it is no longer pleased to wait until the other nations have established equality by reducing their armaments to the level of the German forces; instead the Von Papen-Von Schleicher regime is insisting that equality can only be attained by building up the German military machine. On June 16, 1919, the victors at the peace conference declared:

The Allied and Associated Powers wish to make it clear that their requirements in regard to German armaments were not made solely with the object of rendering it impossible for Germany to resume her policy of military aggression. They are also the first steps toward that general reduction and limitation of armaments which they seek to bring about as one of the most fruitful preventives of war, and which it will be one of the first duties of the League of Nations to promote.

Thirteen years is a long time to wait for a promise of this vital nature to be fulfilled, especially when those years are filled with anxieties and uncertainties. Yet Stresemann or Brüning, even in the face of the probable failure of the disarmament conference at Geneva, might have remained patient a while longer. But General von Schleicher, the militarist who has learned nothing since 1914, is made of different stuff. In the stricter sense, though we do not sympathize with it, his impatience is justified. How derelict the League has been in performing this one of its "first duties" is all too tragically apparent. At every turn, disarmament has been sabotaged by the Powers controlling the League, particularly by France. If the change in German policy now means the end of the world disarmament effort, as seems probable, these Powers must bear their full share of the blame. Moreover, if they now concede equality to Germany on the basis General von Schleicher has demanded, if they now retrace those "first steps" taken at the peace conference which were to lead to general disarmament, they will in effect be admitting that they never really intended to disarm, that they were simply using this pledge as a means of disguising their subjugation of Germany, and that they were finally giving in only because their hypocritical gesture at Versailles had been exposed.

But it appears highly unlikely that this concession will be made, not alone because the Powers do not care to expose their own hypocrisy, but for other and no less selfish reasons. The chief stumbling block, as in the past, will be France and its allies. French hegemony in Europe is based upon French military supremacy and nothing else. Geographically and economically, Poland and the countries of the Little Entente are closer to Berlin than to Paris. The greater part of their trade is with Germany, Austria, and Hungary rather than with France, which, indeed, enjoys less than 10 per cent of the total of the foreign commerce of its allies. Thus it can be seen that only the military predominance of France, plus a common desire to prevent any revision of the peace treaties, is holding this system of alliances together. By the same means France has been enabled to dictate to the rest of the Continent in the matter of reparations, treaty revision, the Austro-German Anschluss, and international finances. Therefore, if Germany should gain military equality, which because of its larger population and longer frontiers would really mean military supremacy, the positions of Paris and Berlin would be reversed. The latter would then be in a position to dictate. It should be clear that France and its allies will not readily allow Germany to regain its military supremacy.

In his radio speech of July 26, however, General von Schleicher pointedly suggested that if equality in armaments is not granted, Germany will be compelled to enlarge its military forces upon its own initiative. What will France do then? How will it meet such a deliberate challenge to the Versailles Treaty and the status quo of Europe? Upon the answer depends the peace of Europe. In 1924 French troops marched into the Ruhr when Germany balked at paying the reparations demanded by the peace agreement. It is not probable that France will attempt the same thing again. In the first place, French public opinion has undergone a radical change in the last few years. Secondly, the invasion of the Ruhr in 1924 found Germany exhausted, spiritually as well as financially; the invasion at worst could only have led to an internal collapse in Germany, and not to armed resistance; but today Germany's fighting spirit has been revived, perhaps out of sheer desperation, but nevertheless to a point which makes it almost certain that the militarists and Hitlerites would meet force with force. In our judgment France would think twice before attempting to inflict any penalty of that sort on Germany. Still, there is the warning which Robert Dell sounded in The Nation of September 7, and a careful reading of the French press shows that this warning must be taken seriously. Mr. Dell wrote:

The French general staff and the French nationalist politicians are not in the least afraid of Germany. They intend to make sure that German armaments shall never catch up with the French, and what they long for is an excuse for walking into Germany and finishing the war which, in their opinion, as M. Poincaré said not long ago, is not finished yet. General von Schleicher has given them a hope that they may sooner or later be provided with the necessary excuse, and also an opportunity of scaring the French people out of the desire for disarmament so emphatically expressed last May.

It is high time the statesmen of Europe awakened to this grave situation. There is no hope of reasoning with the stupid militarists in Berlin, nor yet with the nationalists of France. But other public leaders, such as Ramsay MacDonald in England and Edouard Herriot and Léon Blum in France, who have large followings in their own countries, must bestir themselves. In the last analysis it is upon them and their people that rests what small hope is left of actually bringing about disarmament in Europe. The chances that these men can accomplish anything are slim indeed, but if they fail, what is to prevent Europe from plunging into another mad armaments race and perhaps an early war?

The Spanish Republic Meets the Test

By BAILEY W. DIFFIE

IS the Spanish Republic gaining or losing favor? During the second year of its existence this question has been asked in vain. In spite of a wealth of work well done, one uncertainty has remained: has the new government pleased its supporters enough to make them fight for it as they were willing to do in April, 1931? Reports of discontent, accounts of strikes, rumors of the approaching fall of the government all increased this uncertainty, and the belief that a republican victory had been won by a minority at a time when the personal popularity of the king was temporarily low had begun to grow.

The events of the tenth and eleventh of August furnish an answer to the doubters. Quickly and decisively the forces of the government suppressed the attempted monarchical uprising. Far from being hostile, or even apathetic toward the Republic, the people demonstrated that they were overwhelmingly for the regime. Who then instituted an uprising in the face of such preponderant republican strength?

The new constitution, which contains clauses that hit at the church, the landed class, the old political chiefs, the army, and privilege in general, certainly created a host of enemies for the Republic. Military reform was a blow at one of the most highly privileged classes in Spain and it was not to be expected that it would pass without strong protest. Separation of church and state, subjugation of religious orders to the state, and subsequent expulsion of the Jesuits created new opponents. Labor laws have been passed designed to strengthen the position of the laborer in his contest with capital; more than two hundred laws have been enacted to curtail the privileges of landowners, and a land law now under consideration will practically expropriate private real-estate wealth. The Republic has been a harsh master for a great number of its citizens. Thousands of satellites of the old regime have found themselves supplanted in their functions by new employees; hundreds of priests and monks with their numerous following have risen to the cry of "the church is in danger"; some twelve thousand army officers have been forced into retirement and found themselves without a calling; and every property-holder in the country has felt that his accumulated wealth was threatened. Unlimited reasons for revolt, but why at this time?

"The monarchy is coming back," has been open talk among the king's supporters for some time, and several indications gave a semblance of truth to this claim. One of the real menaces to the Republic was the loss of many of its followers. In the first enthusiasm they expected the impossible. The poor thought that their rent would be reduced by 40 per cent; farm laborers expected the immediate repartition of all land, and naively gathered together to perform this pleasant task for themselves when they found the government slow; day laborers were confident that they would become owners of the factories in which they worked. When they found that these expectations were empty, a movement to bring them about by force resulted in thousands of revolutionary strikes. To the disappointment and mystification of the laborers, they found that their attempts at self-help were crushed by the shots of the hated Guardia Civil just as in the days of the monarchy. The first hopes of the people, exemplified by a cobbler who explained to me that in a republic people are "happy and contented, prosperous and free," were changed a year later to the disappointed wail that "the Republic has done nothing for me. I work as I always did, I pay the same rent, and my food costs more. It makes no difference to the poor who governs."

This disappointment of their followers was accompanied by the division of republicans into several factions. At no time were they all agreed on any one thing except the undesirability of the monarchy. The monarchy once out of the way, they settled down to the bickerings and quarrels so customary in political democracies. The Socialists, as the best organized party, demanded, and largely secured, a great measure of socialistic reform. They were opposed by the conservative republicans grouped around Alcalá Zamora and Miguel Maura. The church question forced these two men out of the cabinet, and the resultant reorganization was a frankly left cabinet, chiefly Socialist in strength. The cry soon arose that Spain was again under a dictatorship. New elections were demanded, and when these were refused a campaign was started to discredit the government. The principal leader of this movement was Alejandro Lerroux, who though a lifelong republican, recently made a speech at Saragossa which smacked strongly of regret for having instituted the regime. He undoubtedly adheres to his republican sentiments and has aimed only at ousting the Socialists from the government, but the most conspicuous result of his campaign has been to cause discontent with the system.

The first sign of serious trouble came at the end of June during a banquet held after the maneuvers of the cadets of the Carabanchel training ground. The leader of the cadets offered a toast which, if not monarchist, was at least not republican in sentiment. Other toasts of the same order followed. Finally the turn of General Goded, chief of the general staff of the army, came. He attacked fiercely the threatened dismemberment of Spain and the Cortes for permitting it. Raising his glass he cried: "Viva—," then paused long and dramatically while his hearers waited tensely for him to continue. If he gave the customary, obligatory, and courteous toast it must be to the Republic; but he did not. Instead he concluded simply, "Viva España!" Such a cry was equivalent to an insult to the Republic, but the applause was tremendous.

General Goded was immediately removed from his command. Within a few days General Cavalcanti was arrested and sentenced to one month's imprisonment for writing an article criticizing the policies of Minister of Justice Albornoz. Late in June General Barrera was arrested for conspiring, but was released. General Sanjurjo, who had been head of the Guardia Civil during the rule of Primo de Rivera and who had been continued in his position because of his quick adherence to the Republic, became piqued when he was removed from that position.

The approaching verdict of the Commission of Responsi-ilities gave reason for hastening the reaction. Numbers of army officers implicated in the De Rivera regime must answer to charges that will be placed against them. They undoubtedly felt that the time had come to strike.

The Catalan question was a possible cause for the revolt's being timed as it was. For several weeks the Cortes have debated acrimoniously the status of Catalonia. Wholesale protests against the terms of the proposed statute created belief that all Spain was one in opposing the government on this issue. To dismember Spain or not to dismember Spain was the question presented to the country by the conservatives and monarchists, and they believed they had the country behind them in opposition to dismemberment. The eve of the final vote on the statute seemed a good time to appeal to the country.

So with disappointed laborers, fearful landlords, timorous republicans, faithful church-goers, and disgruntled military cliques the stage was set. But the people refused to join the revolt. In its planning and execution it was purely military. The provinces did not rise, as was expected, to bring back the church, to restore the right of private property, to reconstitute the army as the ruler of Spain, or to recall the king from his exile. The people did not turn on the Republic as their mumblings had led the military faction to believe they would. Instead, even the enemies of the present government came to its aid. The Syndicalists called on their people to defend the Republic, the Communists gave their support, and the Republic stood. One swallow does not make a summer, but the doubt is answered for a time. Spain did not turn republican in a temporary fit of anger against her king. The Spanish Republic is the result of long years of careful education and propaganda. It came to answer the people's cry for social reform, and the people are determined that it shall stand.

The Show Business

II. How It Works*

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IDEALLY, of course, the work of the artist ought to be independent of everything except himself. No middle man should come between him and his public, and no financial or business considerations should compel him to modify his plans. No artist, however, actually enjoys ideal conditions, and the dramatist is particularly unfortunate in his respect.

In the first place, he requires the cooperation of a whole staff of interpretative artists and artisans through whose hands his conception must pass before it can reach an audience. In the second place, the production of any play is tremendously expensive and involves a commercial undertaking larger than that in which any other artist—except the architect—needs to be involved. Hence it is that the drama depends upon "the show business" to an extent infinitely greater than any novel can depend upon "the book business" or any painting upon "the art business." When a man has written a good novel he may be reasonably sure that it will reach the public rather soon, and very much as he wrote it, but when the manuscript of a play has been completed there is no telling what will happen next. It may be announced for production during three or four successive seasons by three or four different producers. God only knows how far it will be from what he intended by the time the manager, the director, the scene designer, and the star have had their way with it. And then, after all the agony, it is quite as likely as not to die forever either during rehearsal or somewhere out of town before anyone for whom the play was intended has had an opportunity to hear it at all.

No one can appreciate the unwieldy complexity of the show business without some knowledge of the various operations involved, and the present article will attempt to give a brief and necessarily simplified account of the process by which a play finally reaches Broadway. Before the curtain finally goes up on an opening night, a dozen different specialists may each have been directing a series of operations all converging toward the great event, and, to start with, we may consider the playwright, the producer, and the theater-owner as the three chief persons involved.

Let us suppose, then, that the first has found a play upon which he is willing to risk his money, or (what is equally likely) upon which he has persuaded one or more other persons to risk theirs. The chances are that he got the play originally from a play-broker and, as likely as not, he first took only an option which was repeatedly renewed by the paying of a very small sum. Finally, however, he has drawn up a definite contract with the dramatist or his agent, which includes an agreement upon royalties, and he is now ready to start actual production. That is so much the most complicated part of the whole business that it must be treated separately, but if we suppose that the play has actually been whipped into shape and probably tried out in some nearby city, the next step is to arrange for a theater.†

If the producer happens also to be a theater-owner or lessee the process is somewhat simplified, although, in his bookkeeping, the production and the theater will be considered as separate enterprises. If he is not the owner or lessee of a theater, then he must acquire a suitable house, the finding of which may involve a long wait before such a house is available, and, in any event, will involve a business operation of some complexity since there is no standard price for a theater and since the terms, both as to percentages, guaranties, and bonds are a matter of negotiation between the producer and the owner, who gets as much as he can in view of the prevailing state of the market and according to his judgment of the probable earning power of the production in question. In any event, the theater-owner will provide for the heating and cleaning of the theater, print the tickets, and furnish both ushers and a minimum stage crew of perhaps fifteen men for a dramatic production—including a head carpenter, a head electrician, and a head property man. If a larger crew is needed the producer will furnish the additional men as well as all special electrical equipment, costumes, and other properties. Ordinarily the lease will not be for a fixed time or for a fixed sum but from week to week and upon the basis of a percentage of the gross receipts, although there may also be a minimum guaranty.

† I am indebted to the business managers of several producing organizations for information used in the preparation of these articles. I am also very heavily indebted to the admirable study prepared for the Labor Bureau by Alfred Bernheim and Sara Harding. It has never been published in book form, but a few copies entitled "The Business of the Theater" were printed and distributed by the Actors' Equity Association.

* The second of a series on The Show Business. The third, What It Costs, will appear next week.—EDITOR THE NATION.

It is, however, between the buying of the play and the leasing of the theater that the producer is busiest, and that the largest number of specialists are at work. To begin with, a cast must be selected from among those suitable performers who are at the moment "at liberty" or (as is frequently the case) the production must be postponed until the particular star whom the producer has in mind has finished some engagement which will end—no one knows when. Probably the actors finally engaged are engaged through an agency, and if the producing organization is a large one they have been selected, not by the producer himself, but by a casting director who is employed by him because of special knowledge of the talents of various actors. The producer may now undertake to direct the rehearsals himself, but more probably he will elect merely to coordinate the various processes, and will turn the business of direction over to a specialist who may be either permanently attached to his staff or engaged for the particular job. More depends upon this gentleman than upon any other single person except the playwright, since the interpretation of the play is largely in his hands and since, as a matter of fact, he is often responsible for much that the actors get credit for.

Rehearsals may last any length of time but the actors must rehearse without pay for four weeks, provided that these four weeks are continuous. During the first week of rehearsal the producer may discharge any member of the cast without penalty but after that he cannot dismiss any performer without paying two weeks' salary.

Meanwhile, innumerable other arrangements are being made. A scenic designer has probably been employed to design plans and make scale models. A contract has been let to a company which builds these scenes and with another company which paints them. Next in importance come the costumes. If the play is modern in setting the men of the company must furnish any costume conventionally worn while the actresses are sent to some dressmaker whose bills the producer pays. If unusual costumes are required they must be designed by someone and executed by someone else, though in very special cases the costumes may be either rented or remade from the stock which a very active producer has accumulated. Nor is even this all. Various properties must be bought or rented, special electrical equipment must be arranged for, a press agent must be employed to keep news of the forthcoming production before the public, and countless other things—such, for example, as arrangements with the transfer companies for moving the scenery to the theater—must be seen to.

Moreover, all these things are made more complicated by the fact that in nearly every instance the arrangements are not made simply between a producer and various individuals by private agreement, but, instead, in accordance with the usually very complicated rules of the various unions or other organizations with one or another of which nearly every worker in the theater is affiliated. The playwright must be a member of the Dramatist Guild, most of the performers must be members of Actors' Equity, the stage hands must be members of the Theatrical Protective Union, et cetera. There are, as a matter of fact, some thirty-five different associations with whose rules the producer has to conform, and they range all the way from the Dramatist Guild already mentioned on down to the Doormen's Union and the Theatrical Transfer Union—which latter, merely by way of example, provides that the regular stage crew may not touch the scenery until it has been deposited on the sidewalk, that any production moved at night shall constitute an entire night's work, that no general transfer company shall handle theatrical effects, et cetera, et cetera. At one time the various workers of the theater, from actors on down, were pretty much at the mercy of the managers, and intolerable abuses prevailed. Today the manager is pretty much at the mercy of the humblest of his employees, and unless he watches his step he is more than likely to find himself helplessly embroiled with organizations which disrupt the whole process of production and make it absolutely impossible for him to get on with it.

Furthermore, it must be remembered that at any stage in the proceeding something may go wrong which involves great delay, vast expense, and wicked waste. At any time between the first assemblage of the cast and the all-important first night, changes of all sorts may seem to be necessary. Perhaps the play is rewritten either by the original author or by a "play doctor" hired for the purpose. Perhaps the cast is changed, perhaps the scenery is scrapped, perhaps a new director is engaged. Most of the plays written are never bought, many of the plays bought are never put into production, many of the plays put into production never open out of town, many that open out of town never reach Broadway, and finally, not more than one-fourth of those which do get to New York do anything except lose money for their sponsors. Even when a play does finally achieve a triumphant reception on its first night, the public has no way of knowing through how many changes it has passed or how far it is from being what it started out to be. And every change, every delay in one department which involves delay in the others, piles production costs up and up until certain of the elaborate musical shows open under the weight of production costs which only a most improbably long run could ever cover.

In fine, the production of a successful play requires—under the combined and harmonized artistic activities of author, director, players, and scene designers—the direction of a general whose business success will depend largely upon the success of his generalship. That many New York managers are capable and shrewd no one would deny. That the business of the theater would be infinitely more secure if they were more capable and more shrewd is obvious. Considering the difficulties, they do wonders, but the fact remains, as I shall attempt later to show, that, at best, the production of a play very often involves enormous wastes, some of which could probably be avoided by more efficient management.

THE POT AND THE KETTLE

A "preposterous campaign" Elmer Davis calls this one in the current Harpers, and winds up his article with the, for him, amazing admonition to vote for Norman Thomas. "If," he writes, "you can't swallow the name Socialist, if you prefer to vote for the kind of politicians we used to think we could afford in the fat years—well, God save the United States." Unfortunately multitudes will not swallow the name Socialist; still other multitudes will be stupid enough to say it is throwing away your vote to ballot for Thomas because he cannot win anyway; and still others will simply hold their noses or play golf.

It's all truly preposterous. But what strikes me as most preposterous of all is how few people realize that politically we are back where we were in 1900 and that so far as our domestic politics are concerned we have not progressed one genuine step since then and are still fighting the same old battle. I have just had this rubbed in by reading Claude Bowers's brilliant, if somewhat superficial, story of "Beveridge and the Progressive Era," just published by Houghton Mifflin Company. Beveridge used to go about declaring that, during Theodore Roosevelt's years in the White House, "more great reforms have been advanced than in any two Administrations in our history." One admirer of Woodrow Wilson has gone Beveridge several better; he says that as many reforms were achieved under Wilson as in any five previous Administrations! Yet the fact is that time has dealt hardly with those much-touted reforms, so that many of them are today worthless; at their best they never really went to the roots of any of our problems.

To read Bowers's story of how the Progressives fought against Aldrich, Cannon, Quay, Lodge, Fairbanks, and all the rest of the representatives of a militant selfish capitalism is thrilling, yet. But was the old guard routed either by the Progressives or Woodrow Wilson? They were not. Wilson turned the United States over to them when he put this country into the World War. They have been enthroned ever since, with far less challenge than in Rooseveltian days, under Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. Never in our history have the big-business interests had a more subservient President than Mr. Hoover. His every step is to call in the big-business crowd, whether it is in order to organize private doles, or to stimulate foreign trade, or to spread employment, or to "organize the constructive forces of the nation"—how many times have they been organized since October, 1929? It is always Owen D. Young and Thomas W. Lamont and Henry M. Robinson and Charley Dawes and all the rest. Good, useful men? Some, indubitably. But there are other groups and kinds of men far less biased by their occupations and status in life, who could do as good and much better work. Mr. Hoover does not know them, or if he knows them does not value them. So he rules for,

Our Invisible Government and "Wasted" Votes

by, and with big business almost as completely as if there were no others in American life—and for that reason big business has been in the saddle until its own folly, its own asinine blunders, its own incompetence, has helped in great degree to precipitate the economic disaster in which we are still floundering, out of which they cannot suggest the real way out—not if Mr. Hoover calls them into fifty conferences. For the reforms we need would go far toward eliminating them and their powers and their riches, once for all.

Cleaning the Augean Stables. So Mr. Bowers heads one of his chapters. How much did the Beveridges actually clean? And as for Mr. Wilson's "New Freedom," I quote from it constantly and never do I seem to find any one in my audiences who knows what it contained. Yet his entire description, written in 1912, of the "real rulers of America, the great capitalists," of the needed new birth of the nation "that the people may come into their own," "may receive back their heritage," applies exactly to the situation today. Does anyone maintain that Mr. Wilson emancipated us from the thralldom he so eloquently described. No. He may have started well, but the day he decided to go to war he ended all further drastic reforms. There have certainly been none since, and the old devices such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Tariff Commission, yes, the Federal Reserve Board have failed, in part or wholly, to safeguard the rights and welfare of the public. We have seen only such bills passed as would help to make other privileged persons rich and more powerful. We have tinkered here and there with the machine, but never rebuilt it, and we have witnessed under Mr. Hoover the crowning tariff infamy which did far more than people realize to precipitate the catastrophe.

Read the "New Freedom"; read Mr. Bowers; comparison with today is unavoidable, and these conclusions inevitable: We have gained not at all, but gone backward since the Progressive era. And there is no hope today in either the Progressive group in Washington or in the Democratic and Republican Parties. They may call each other names until the welkin rings. They may spread out their wares again and again. But neither pot nor kettle has anything worth while to offer. Neither has any real remedies to suggest. If their spokesmen know what these are they are careful to suppress them, for they know they cannot put them over with their parties—no more than Grover Cleveland or Woodrow Wilson could get Democratic Congresses to pass a genuine tariff revision. The same dry rot corrodes both parties; the same political corruption palsies them. An outworn political system hobbles and chains them even when the desire to reform exists. And the Constitution written for thirteen small colonies, whose knowledge did not even cover the country behind them, completes the difficulty of modernizing the government and of making it as responsible to the will of the people as the founders, and in our times the Progressives and Woodrow Wilson, have wished it to be. We have neither the recall of judicial decisions, which Theodore Roosevelt and Beveridge demanded, nor have we abolished child labor or achieved the safety of old age; we have not controlled the trusts; we have not put the tariff hogs in their proper pens; nor have we made "all business honest," as the Bull Moosers swore they would.

* The second of a series of weekly comments on the election which will appear during the campaign.

The truth is still what Beveridge said it was—and exactly identical with Woodrow Wilson's:

These special interests which suck the people's substance are bi-partisan. They are the invisible government behind our visible government. Democratic and Republican bosses alike are brother-officers of this hidden power. . . . The root of the wrongs which hurt the people is the fact that the people's government has been taken away from them—the invisible government has usurped the people's government. The government must be given back to the people.

Elmer Davis is right. If we are going on decade after decade voting back into office the same worthless politicians who get us nowhere, God save the United States. The President can get his troops to fire on his fellow-citizens a few times but not forever.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Insulting the Catholics

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, September 3

ONE month ago I reported in this place that Hoover's campaign strategy would include a whispering campaign designed to persuade Catholic voters in the East that Al Smith was the victim of anti-Catholic propaganda disseminated by Roosevelt workers in the South and East prior to the Chicago convention. That plan has now been set in operation. An insinuating letter, apparently the first of a series, has been sent to a list of "key Catholics" in various States. It is obvious that the Republican leaders, by harping constantly on the name of McAdoo, hope to convince Catholics that a Roosevelt Administration would be dominated by the same forces which prevented the nomination of Smith in 1924 and contributed to his defeat in 1928. Thus far, the noble enterprise has achieved a very doubtful success. Conspicuous among the responses is an editorial entitled, Are Catholics Boobs? which appeared in the influential Catholic review, America, under the name of the Reverend Wilfrid Parsons, S.J., one of the most brilliant Catholic journalists in this or any other country. After outlining the Republican plan briefly he commented:

In other words, that party which won in 1928 partly by capitalizing Protestant hatred for Catholics, hopes it can win in 1932 by creating and capitalizing Catholic hatred for Protestants. The insult to our intelligence and good sense could hardly be greater. Any Catholic who unwittingly allows himself to be inveigled into such a game does not deserve to have a vote.

Is it possible that Messrs. Hoover, Mills, Hurley, and Hyde have been guilty of a tactical error?

■ ■ ■ ■ ■

SINCE Hoover made his acceptance speech I have been amused by the number of inquiries about his pronunciation. Many radio listeners complained they could hardly understand him. The truth is, of course, that they were simply deceived in 1928 by the contrast between Hoover's speech and Al Smith's unfamiliar New Yorkese. The President's use of words always has been inexpert and careless. Some Washington wag has said that the history of the republic from Lincoln to Hoover might properly be entitled: "From the Rail Splitter to the Infinitive Splitter." Accordingly, in a modest desire to serve I have compiled a brief glossary from which future listeners may be able to ascertain what the President is talking about. In the column on the left appears the words as pronounced by him; in the corresponding column appears the dictionary spelling.

Uhmurycun	American mantain	maintain hunderd	hundred
redoose	reduce
cooppatuff	cooperative
uhmurguncy	emergency
alwuss	always
nacktudd	enacted
pursurves	preserves
govermunt	government
substys	subsidies
purvent	prevent
noggerated	inaugurated
divarred	devoured
purdoose	produce
vistige	vestige
inishytuff	initiative
constooshun	constitution
Ruppublacan	Republican
distructuff	destructive
uhfectuff	effective
spurt	spirit
murge	emerge
are	our tuv	that have

Let it be understood that I see no relation between President Hoover's pronunciation and his qualifications for office, and I hope that the former will excite no more attention during this campaign than ex-Governor Smith's rendering of "radio" excited during the last.

* * * ■ ■

HURRAH for F. Trubee Davison, our gallant Assistant Secretary of War and candidate for the Republican nomination for Governor of New York! Thanks to him we understand at last why the Administration was perfectly justified in using bayonets and tear gas to drive several thousand homeless men, women, and children out of Washington on the night of July 28. It was, he told the New York convention of the American Legion, because most of the men were merely "a polyglot mob of tramps and hoodlums, with a generous sprinkling of Communist agitators." The army secret service" had since learned that their discharge papers were fakes, and had traced them to "a printing press in a large Eastern city." Excellent, but Truthful Trubee might have done even better if he had really exerted himself. There remains the embarrassing fact that the two men actually killed were veterans. Now it probably is true that most Washington policemen are natives of Virginia and Maryland, and hence likely to be Democrats. How would it do to say that they singled two lone veterans out of "the polyglot mob of tramps, hoodlums, and Communists" and deliberately killed them in order to embarrass President Hoover? Trubee would still be confronted with the circumstance that the three indicted for violence were none fide veterans, all wounded overseas, and one decorated for heroism under fire, but ah—perhaps some enemy of the Administration tampered with the grand jury. The next one is simple. Trubee might have thrown out the hint that Bernard Myers, who died twelve days after being gassed in his father's arms, really was a Soviet spy who had disguised himself as a two-months-old baby. However, on second thought, it may be just as well that Trubee stopped where he did. There is no such thing as "the army secret service," and the intelligence service declined to be the goat. Its officers promptly and carefully explained that they have no authority "to conduct investigations of civil matters in peace time," and hence could not have made the "discovery" of the "printing press." The Department of Justice bluntly announced that it had never heard of such a thing. Warned by the boos and hisses which greeted Davison's fantastic yarn, the White House disclosed that when Pat Hurley goes to the national Legion convention in Portland, Oregon, this month it will be in the capacity of a legionnaire and not as Secretary of War. In other words, as a local paragrapher put it, the public is warned in advance that the convention "will be booing Pat Hurley, not Herbert Hoover." How amusing it would be if the valiant Pat decided at the last moment that pressing official duties would prevent him from attending in any capacity!

* * * * *

WASHINGTON is no place for a fat man during these blistering days, and the Great Coordinator and Readjuster has more than prickly heat to worry him. For example, there was the base and treacherous act of old Charley Curtis in coming out against repeal just when Hoover thought he had the wets pacified. But there is a sound excuse for old Charley. If he is beaten for Vice-President he will almost certainly run for the Senate, and Kansas is dry. In an effort to give the White House a Coolidge tinge for the campaign, Hoover enlisted the secretarial talents of Ted Clarke, who formerly served the Sage of Plymouth Notch in that capacity. Whereupon the newspapers—or some of them—promptly disclosed that Mr. Clarke had for three years been engaged as a Washington lobbyist for the Liggett interests, which had kindly "loaned" him to Mr. Hoover for the campaign without pay. Despite all the laborious pumping of the Administration press, the conference of business executives at which the grand offensive against the depression was to be launched, has been a dismal flop. All the speeches that were made might just as well have been whispered down a prairie doghole in the Navajo Desert. Ninety-nine per cent of the stuff was simply the old bunk which we have been hearing for more than two years. Only a mining-stock promoter could really believe that the economic sickness of this country can be cured by ballyhoo. I wonder if he does.

Prelude

By CONRAD AIKEN

As if god were a gipsy in a tent, the smeared mask in the smoky light, smiling with concealed intent pointing to the bag of fortunes from which you choose, the hand like a claw, a tiger's claw,
the claw with stripes—

(as if one thus, in the twilight, at the hour of the bat, the hour of the moth,
when night-eyes open and day-eyes close,
saw, in the flitting betwixt light and light, the half-knowledge which is more than knowledge—) saying, choose now—the time is come—put in your hand—take out the card that tells your future—five words or six in vast calligraphy spaced paused and pointed as they should be, printed in words of Alpha, in words of Omega, or in such words as are not words at all—thunder, harsh lightning, the fierce asterisk that stars the word, for footnote to dead worlds—choose now, be doomed, take out the phrase that calls you king, that calls you fool, brings the fat klondike to too greedy hands—

as if you saw the crass inevitable and stupid finger thrust then among the alien cards, alien phrases, your finger, injured by life, already willing to turn one way, rather than another—and saw it choose one phrase, one idiot round of idiot words (how can you say your scorn for this deception) one phrase, one sullen phrase, to be the symbol of all you are—to be the ambassador of all you are to all that is not you—if life were this, if soul were only this, as well it might be, should be, must be, is—god the proud gipsy in his tent at twilight, yourself the fool that darkling takes a card:

your life thus blindfold dedicate to folly, murder become a hand, hand become murder
by patient evolution—

Think of this,
and laugh, at moth's hour, bat's hour, or at wolf's hour—that moth be moth, bat be bat, wolf be wolf—or gipsy be a god,
shuffler of cards and cozenor of fools.

Graham Wallas

By S. K. RATCLIFFE

A WELL-KNOWN man of letters, writing to me a few days after the death of Graham Wallas, said that his passing had rung in many minds the knell of an epoch which for our younger contemporaries had never existed. He meant one thing in especial: that the distinguished work and personality of Graham Wallas had been, above everything else, associated with a time of inspiring debate and effort, when we believed in the not distant fulfilment of the democratic idea and the working out of the uncompleted program of democracy—by means of free discussion and scientific thinking, of realistic leadership, well-trained groups, and a working community becoming conscious and purposeful. Of that ideal there were two brilliantly endowed English exponents who stood above all others in intellectual gifts and graces, in the power of suggestion and persuasion, in disinterested public spirit and breadth of appeal to the English-speaking world. Graham Wallas and Lowes Dickinson were born respectively in 1858 and 1862. One was a product of Oxford, the other of Cambridge. They died within seven days of each other.

It is improbable that any university teacher of our age had a wider audience or a more devoted following than Graham Wallas. We have been reminded, by Professor Laski, that his lecture-room at the London School of Economics was an amazing sight. It contained representatives of almost every race and nationality, and all who frequented it had the joy of working with a professor who, so far from preaching dogma or trying to impose any notions of his own, was inculcating the virtue of serious thought, and inviting them to join with him in the finest game known among men. As a lecturer he was, until his closing years, unsurpassed. He was always thoroughly prepared, and if he had more notes than the European or American student is accustomed to, he used them easily, and they did not in any way impair the spontaneity of his utterance. He gave pains to the structure of his address, and his range and aptness of illustration were astonishing. There was nothing of academic remoteness about Graham Wallas. The news of the day was meat and drink to him. He made the thorough reading of the London Times the first duty of the morning, and hence you could never catch him out in any reference to current events. And let me not forget the cardinal matter of language. Graham Wallas spoke the English of the best Victorian tradition, with no affectation of either don or cleric, and with an athletic enunciation that was appreciated by every student from overseas.

All modern history was alive in his hands; and alive also were the political institutions with whose origins and development he was concerned. Professor Alfred Zimmern is the author of an oft-quoted saying which does something less than justice to an eminent partnership: "Sidney and Beatrice Webb are interested in county councils; Graham Wallas is interested in county councilors." A political or social institution was to Graham Wallas the collective expression of the traditions, the temperaments, the will, and instinct of the people making up the community. I often found cause to regret that he had never sat in Parliament. He alone of the original Fabian group, I think, should have known the House of Commons from within. It would have added a capital province to his world of knowledge and experience. As it was, his direct touch with administration, and the working of representative government, was limited to London and the sphere of education; but of that he made the very most. He was the first in England to lay emphasis upon the facts of social growth and economic expansion and proving, in the modern world an enlarging need of definite social and political invention. "Every spirit makes its house but afterwards the house confines the spirit." The truth thus neatly stated by Emerson was applied by Graham Wallas to the life of the nation, and of the Great Society, whose scope and implications he illuminated throughout his forty fruitful years of activity as teacher and author, counselor and public servant.

He wrote his books with the aid of his lectures, working over the material again and again after discussion in class and eager talk with his friends. His primary motive throughout was the one avowed in an early preface—to improve the thought processes of a working thinker. He was a man of overflowing expressiveness, in private and on the platform and yet we have to think of him as a frugal and, perhaps, an over-careful writer. His first book, the "Life of Francis Place," did not appear until he was forty years old. He was fifty when he delighted the general reader, and disturbed the political theorists, by publishing "Human Nature in Politics," which I take to be on the whole the most characteristic expression of his mind. He was proud of the world-wide recognition which had come to him on account of the "Life of Francis Place," a piece of work which did pioneer service in at least two directions. It revealed the career and methods of the first English democratic organizer, and it opened new roads in industrial and social history. Wallas himself, if I am not mistaken, looked upon "The Great Society" as his most important contribution. It was the most ambitious, and the most persuasive, exposition by an English working thinker (to use its author's own phrase) of the vast social process which, a quarter of a century ago, gave promise of an orderly and pacific shaping of Western civilization. It appeared on the eve of the war, and in more than one chapter the author disclosed his own deep sense of the impending European calamity.

So much, in this too brief summary, of the public man, concerning whom there is a great deal more to be said. But everyone who enjoyed the privilege of friendship with Graham Wallas would wish to pay special tribute to the man himself, to his unique character and ways. He was known to a remarkable number of people all over the world, and for any one of them to come within range of his voice was to be assured of a welcome. His days were carefully and intelligently ordered, so that he seemed to have time for everything, including the reading of the significant books of the year. His immediate circle included many persons of rare gifts and accomplishment; and his house on Highgate

Hill, and latterly in Chelsea, attracted a continuous stream of men and women, particularly young Americans, who often came for guidance in work to which they had been stimulated by a chance word in a lecture or by some page of his writing. And how richly were they repaid, no less by the lovely atmosphere of the home than by the wise and joyous talk of Graham Wallas! There is no one to fill his place. And as we think of him now we realize that there is no one among us who has ever known a finer citizen, a happier man, a more serene and enlightened spirit.

In the Driftway

HITCH-HIKING, like rugged individualism, gave scope in the beginning to rather admirable human qualities. Giving a man a lift is an experience that expands the human sympathies of both participants, so much so that a good Marxian would be justified in frowning a Marxian frown upon it and denouncing it as a sop to the walkers. But quite aside from the mutual faith it bespeaks, it has a cultural value well worth preserving. It gives continuity to the tradition of good-fellowship among travelers; and an automobile journey from San Francisco to New York or from Chicago to New Orleans, with a different hitch-hiker in every State, might be quite as rich in tales as Chaucer's classic journey from Southwark to Canterbury.

* * * *

IT is extremely regrettable that such an innocent pursuit has been so completely taken over as a device for burglary that States feel forced to pass laws against it and motorists speed up in terror, instead of slowing down in friendliness, whenever a hiker motions for a ride. A lonely pedestrian on a country road is no longer a weary ploughman who on being invited to ride will pay his way in homely country epigrams. He is, instead, a gangster from Chicago, who is expert himself at taking people for a ride.

* * * *

BUT if hitch-hiking has not given rise to tales as innocently amusing as those of the Friar and of the red-stockinged Wife of Bath, it has produced a brand of story less civilized but quite as amusing in its own sinister way. The Drifter has only recently heard a new one which concerns a man in a fine new Packard and two boy scouts. The boy scouts, packing camp equipment complete to the last detail, from leggings to a knife for cutting through underbrush in a hypothetical jungle, asked for a ride. The man in the Packard stopped graciously and invited them in. There followed enthusiastic conversation in which the boy scouts displayed a vast knowledge of wood's lore. They knew how to build a fire without matches. They were perfectly versed in what to do with a comrade who had almost drowned. They had been thoroughly coached in the procedure to be followed if on any occasion they should get lost in the Rocky, White, or Catskill Mountains. It was not until their host had carried them some thirty-five miles that they displayed another sort of knowledge. At a lonely point in the road one of them produced a gun and ordered the man out of his new car. And the two boy scouts drove off never to return.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

What Is a Wasted Vote?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Hicks, in your issue of August 24, says all of the energy expended on Mr. Thomas's behalf "will be wasted in so far as immediate practical results are concerned." Well, how about the energy expended to elect Roosevelt or reelect Hoover? If Mr. Hicks considers one of those results a fine thing, he does well to work for it. If those results are not worth while, then energy expended on them is wasted even if successful.

If 3,000,000 drys disgusted with the wetness of both parties should vote for Upshaw, and 3,000,000 radicals disgusted with the conservatism of both parties should vote for Thomas, they would begin to receive from the party managers such consideration as they will never get so long as the managers believe that a dry will support a wet party against another wet party, and a radical will support a conservative party against another conservative party. If all the disgusted drys (not counting the undisgusted) voted for Upshaw they might elect him this year against the split wets. If all the disgusted radicals voted for Thomas they might drive the conservatives at once to gather in one party against them.

The habit of thinking that one must vote either Republican or Democratic has given us the present state of American politics. That habit should be kept up by those who like the present state of politics—and by no others.

Ballard Vale, Mass., August 24 STEVEN T. BYINGTON

Lowes Dickinson

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The death of G. Lowes Dickinson is a terrible loss to all his friends. He was a man to whom one could talk du coeur sans hésitation, to whom one's thoughts always meant something—a soul of deep laughter and understanding, a most gallant pessimist whose pessimism sprang from a deep real faith. His qualities were exquisite, yet so simple in their realness—his angers so near to pity, his joys as full of giving as of taking. Friendship with him was a rich experience. His spirit will be sadly missed.

London, August 4

H. N.

Take the Profit out of Liquor

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The discussion of prohibition has been prolix and repetitious. The Atlanta Constitution uttered a generalization recently that is apropos: "We're fed up on reading about so many national questions. What we want now is some of the answers."

Everyone knows most of the arguments advanced by both sides in the discussion of the liquor traffic, and has long since ceased to be interested in restatements of obvious conditions and facts. Most people would like to read about a plan or method proposed to eliminate or, kurig, that, to ameliorate the evils of the traffic in alcoholic urivolo. That is the reason the Eighteenth Amendment was adopted. The traffic in alcoholic liquors is the problem that must be solved sometime. It could have been solved any time before national prohibition, so-called, went into effect by abrogating all liquor statutes and excises. It can be solved now but not in the same way. Congress has the power now to take the profit out of the traffic in alcoholic liquors, and narcotic drugs as well. The Eighteenth Amendment need not deter Congress if the members really want to put an end to the traffic that constitutes the overshadowing problem of our time.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Why spend reading space and valuable time discussing re-submission? Nearly everyone feels quite confident that the Eighteenth Amendment cannot be repealed now or in the near future. A much wiser plan and procedure would be to do the best possible with what we now have and stop reaching for the impossible.

Aberdeen, S. D., August 7

CHARLES J. LAVERY

Service Should Be Recognized

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: An editorial in your issue of June 20 cites the legal victory won in Maryland by the International Labor Defense in obtaining a new trial for Euel Lee, Negro, because Negroes were barred from the jury which tried him for murder.

In your comment you state that the International Labor Defense "fought the Lee case through without help from other organizations." This comment overlooks the service rendered by the Maryland Civil Liberties Committee which participated, not in the appeal, but in obtaining the change of venue from the east shore where Lee and his attorney were threatened with mob violence. Without minimizing the victory won by the I. L. D. in getting a reversal of the conviction, in fairness to our Maryland friends this service should be recognized.

New York, July 19

ROGER N. BALDWIN

Do you wish to keep WELL-INFORMED?

In the following lecture courses offered by the School of Adult Education, lies an excellent opportunity to keep abreast of modern thought, and continue one's education in the cultural aspects of life. The only academic admission requirement is an alert and open mind.

An Approach to Shakespeare
How to Read the New Books
What the Modern Writers are Doing
How to Enjoy the Theatre
A Survey of Modern Fiction
Psychology Today
Abnormal Psychology and Mental Hygiene
Social Problems
Philosophies of Life

Philosophies of Civilization and History
An Introduction to the Music Dramas of Richard Wagner
A Survey of Symphonic Music
India (yesterday, today, and tomorrow)
Oriental Literature
The Appreciation and History of Art
Fee for each $15

GENERAL CULTURAL COURSES, conducted along the same lines as the usual college courses, are also offered in these and other subjects:

Personality Study
Elementary Public Speaking
Radio Speaking
Speech Improvement
Woman's Law Class

Introduction to English and American Literature
Reading Course in French
Reading Course in German
Fee for each $20

COMMERCIAL COURSES are offered in:

Principles of Bookkeeping
Principles of Typewriting
Principles of Isaac Pitman Shorthand

Principles of Gregg Shorthand
Advanced Shorthand Dictation and Transcription
Fee for each $20

Registration from September 6 — 26 from 9 A. M. to 8 P. M. in the Main Building at 32 Waverly Place

For bulletin with full description of courses, address

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION DIVISION

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY
107 Washington Square, New York City

Who and Whom

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of August 17, the Drifter quotes the following sentence from Roger W. Babson: "Surely these things are not the fault of him whom [sic] you are hoping will employ you." Personally, I enjoy the grammar-mindedness of The Nation, and really take a sort of fiendish delight in reading your comments on Dr. Hoover's ungrammatical platitudes. But on this particular point of grammar there is some considerable difference of scholarly opinion as to the incorrectness of whom in this relative function.

Professor Otto Jespersen in the ninth chapter, Various Kinds of Nexus, of his fascinating book, "Philosophy of Grammar," presents a remarkably informing discussion of this language phenomenon. In the terminology of Professor Jespersen, to mention just one argument, Mr. Babson's "him whom you are hoping will employ you" offers a peculiar compound relative clause, in which we should not say that whom in itself is the object of "are hoping," but rather that the object is the whole nexus whose primary is whom (which we put in the accusative case because the nexus is independent) and whose adnex is the finite combination "will employ you." One uses whom because in who you are hoping the "speech instinct would be bewildered by the contiguity of two nominatives, as it were two subjects in the same clause." Professor Jespersen points out that, though this use of the accusative form is considered a gross error, it is well justified on the basis of reputable usage, any number of the best authors using, or having used, this form.

Savannah, Ga., August 18

MARC MARION MORELAND

Upton Sinclair and Prosperity

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Upton Sinclair, in replying to my article, Has the Crisis Run Its Course? has this to say:

We can produce as much or more of every metal; much or more electric power; we have as many railroads and car factories, automobile and truck factories, cement plants, cotton mills, coal mines—everything, all the way down the line as in 1929.

From this he concludes that "there is no possibility of running them at more than half time; so we are in for a long period of chronic depression."

This attitude represents the basic error which arises from a long period of depression and from a long period of prosperity: that something has fundamentally changed the world and that we are in a "new era." These same plants ran at full capacity from 1926 through 1929 and I know of no reason to accept the idea that consuming capacity of the world has been permanently cut in half. A more glaring misconception is the implication that the only measure of prosperity is the ability of producers to profiteer at the expense of consumers because of a possible shortage in supply of goods. That is the kind of boom we had in 1919, but it is not a true measure of prosperity. The true measure of prosperity is the ability of the average individual to command a better and more pleasant standard of living. If we should have Mr. Sinclair's method of gaining "prosperity"—that is, if we should in some way wipe out half of our productive capacity—the result would be fantastically speculative profits for the owners of the remaining instruments of production, but it would not be true prosperity.

New York, July 29

RAY VANCE

Books and Films

Stone Face

By LOLA RIDGE

They have carved you into ■ stone face, Tom Mooney,
You, there lifted high in California
Over the salt wash of the Pacific,
And your eyes . . . crying in many tongues,
Goaded, innumerable
Eyes of the multitudes,
Holding in them all hopes, fears, persecutions . . .
Forever straining one way.
Even in the Sunday papers,
In your face, tight-bitten, like a pierced fist,
The eyes have a transfixed gleam
As they had glimpsed some vision and there hung
Impaled as on ■ bright lance.

Too much lip-foam has dripped on you, too many
And disparate signatures are scrawled under your crag face that all

Have set some finger on, to say who made you for the years
To mouth ■ waves mouth rock—you, ■ fighting grain
Cast up out of the dark Mass, terribly
Gestating, swarming without feature,
And raised with torsion to identity.

Now they—who wrote you plain, with Sacco and the fishmonger and Ella

Wiggins, on the scroll of the Republic—
Look up with a muddled irritation ■ your ■ face—
It set up in full sight under the long
Gaze of the generations, to be there,
Haggard in the sunrise, when San Quentin
Prison shall be caved in and its steel ribs
Food for the ant rust . . . and Governor Rolph
A fleck of dust among the archives.

Voltaire

Voltaire. By André Maurois. Translated from the French by Hamish Miles. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

M. MAUROIS'S "Voltaire" is less than 30,000 words long. Ever since the appearance of Strachey's "Eminent Victorians," in which each of the four subjects chosen was assigned an average of about 26,000 words, this has seemed to me an excellent length for a biography. A work of this small scope, in reasonably competent hands, is unlikely to be stuffed and cluttered. In composing it the biographer is compelled to become selective. Great original research, the unearthing of new evidence and new documents, are hardly expected of him; he is forgiven if he has confined himself to secondary sources. Unlikely, in such a work, to be praised for his industry, he is obliged to seek praise for his art. If the writer of a long "standard" biography has after great effort uncovered ■ new fact about his subject, it is almost too much to expect of human nature that he shall omit any mention of it, even if it throws no fresh light on his subject's character, or even if the light it does throw is not commensurate with the space it occupies. The writer of the short biography, however, is privileged to draw upon the work of his predecessors; to confine himself to what is most interesting and most revelatory; to skim off the slag and keep only the refined gold, and to work it into a new and more attractive form. With other things equal, therefore, the short biography is likely to be much more readable than the long one.

All this is said not in disparagement of long biographies, which for first-rate figures are indispensable, but in defense of short ones. The short biography has been deplorably neglected, particularly the biography of the present intermediate scale. This is less the fault of writers than of publishers, so many of whom are addicted to the superstition of the "full-length book," i. e., the book of 60,000 words or more. The house of Appleton, therefore, is all the more to be congratulated upon its enterprise in initiating a series of short biographies by competent writers. Three of these have now made their appearance: "Julius Caesar," by John Buchan; "Lenin," by James Maxton; and M. Maurois's "Voltaire."

Given simple straightforwardness, it would seem impossible to write a really dull life of Voltaire. He was the most illustrious writer of an illustrious century. He wrote everything—couplets, epics, tragedies, histories, philosophy, science, satirical romances, diatribes, and blistering pamphlets. Not content with his enormous literary prestige, the greatest that has ever come in his own lifetime to any man of letters, he wished to be a man of action. He corresponded with kings and empresses, and finally dealt with them as equals. His complex and mercurial character was certain to make his life an eventful and ■ fascinating one: it is a series of comedies, farces, tragedies, as full of event, intrigue, and counter-intrigue, as rapid in its pace and as unexpected in its turns as one of his own romances. And over each event, turn, and encounter of his career he scattered a shower of sparkling epigrams. The task of Voltaire's biographers is almost too easy: they need merely walk behind, like street cleaners, and pick up at random: whatever they pass on to us is almost sure to be at least amusing.

M. Maurois, of course, is considerably more than competent, and he has composed the present volume with excellent sense. He has not made the slightest attempt to fictionize at any point: that would have been too obviously painting the lily. As a result this little work has an advantage over some of the author's earlier biographies on a more pretentious scale. Better still, perhaps, M. Maurois has not strained after cleverness: he had too much cleverness to record to make that attempt either necessary or desirable. He begins simply, therefore, almost prosaically—and one is tempted to say to oneself at first that this is all very well, but that it is too bad this little work could not have been written by the late Lytton Strachey. But gradually one finds M. Maurois's narrative taking on ■ quiet glow, which reaches its highest point in the penultimate chapter, with its account of his hero's final triumphal return to Paris. The final judgment of Voltaire's character is not particularly fresh or brilliant, but it is comprehensive and just:

He was complex. . . . He was generous and miserly, frank and untruthful, cowardly and brave. He had the fear of blows which is natural to human beings, but all his life long he flung himself into affairs where he could receive blows. . . . He had always great difficulty in resisting the bait of ■ profitable deal, but still more in abstaining from a dangerous act of beneficence. . . .

Why, amongst all the eighteenth-century philosophers, does this quite unphilosophical man stand out as the greatest? Perhaps it is because that century, at once bourgeois and gentlemanly, universal and frivolous, scientific and fashionable, European and dominantly French, was most fully reflected in the person of Voltaire, who was in himself all of these things.

HENRY HAZLITT

The Way of All Churches

The New Church in the New World: A Study of Swedenborgianism in America. By Marguerite Block. Henry Holt and Company. $3.75.

MISS Block's book is not the conventional history of a sect, written by and for the faithful. It is a scholarly though sympathetic account, composed with a certain detachment and addressed to the general cultured reader. It is doubtful, however, if the general reader will be specifically interested in the internal development of this small sect, whose cultural importance in American life, while indeed "out of all proportion to its size," is in an absolute sense slight. The real value of Miss Block's book is for any one who is interested in meditating the whole problem of institutional anthropomorphic religion in a modern secular and scientific age. For such a person the book provides an individual case study which is all the more clear-cut because the church is small, and which has other points of special interest owing to the peculiar doctrines of the founder.

The historical significance of Swedenborg's doctrines and of the church which was founded in his name can be grasped only by keeping in mind the two great forces unleashed in modern life—the trends emanating from the Protestant Reformation on the one hand and from the birth and growth of physical science on the other. The Protestant Reformation, by breaking up the spiritual imperialism of the Catholic Church and enhancing the power of the secular state, dealt a death blow to all ecclesiastical organization of the religious sentiment. On the other hand, the growth of science doomed on the intellectual and individual plane the particular form of religious sentiment which had made possible the institutional organization of religion in the form of a visible, political church. But deep-rooted institutions and sentiments die hard even when doomed. From the seventeenth century onward we witness a long succession of religious reform movements which sought to bring back the lost vitality of the church and revivify the flavor of the traditional faith—and which confirmed the evidences of decay by their very efforts. Every reformer mourned the decreasing power of the church in daily life, and ended up by bringing one more sect into existence, thereby making the power of organized religion still less. Every fundamentalist, dismayed by the progress of scientific rationalism, shouted "Credo quia absurdum," thereby confirming the intellectual untenability of the traditional beliefs.

Swedenborg, the son of a Swedish bishop, was brought up at the close of the seventeenth century on a mentality of Biblical times, communing with angels as a child and becoming an accomplished theologian before he was twelve. After a long and remarkable career in science, a career that only accentuated his passionate longing to justify his childhood faith to a skeptical age, he developed a theosophical system based on direct conversation with angels and personal journeys in the realm of the spirits. In this system he expounded among other things the "inner sense" of the various books of the Holy Scriptures, thus setting himself up in the characteristically Protestant position of individualistic ecclesiasticism, of a believer in the Christian church and revelation who regards all other believers as false believers. On the other hand he appealed to the starved religious sentiment of the semi-intellectual classes by giving them an erudite system of cosmology with a set of detailed correspondences between the things of the visible world and the things in which they wanted to believe in a world beyond. His description of the states of heaven and hell is truly naturalistic in its supernaturalism. He thus gave a pseudo-scientific and learned cachet for conceptions that anthropologists can now trace back to the superstitious lore of Babylonia and of Persia.

It is on such foundations that the American New Church developed. Despite the idiosyncracies and vagaries of Swedenborg's doctrine, its history is strikingly like that of other churches. For all of Swedenborg's emphasis on the "invisible church" and the "grand man," visible church majorities were required to decide which was the true interpretation of Swedenborg who gave the true interpretation of Scripture, and there are today two bitterly opposed sub-sects of the Swedenborgian sect. And while the men who had gathered in a church to reform the world spent their time on doctrinal controversies, the social issues passed them by. On these questions the church—like all other churches—either advertised a policy of neutrality or else rationalized on theological grounds the beliefs that particular groups of members had adopted on economic or political grounds. Thus one found Swedenborgian justifications of Negro slavery as one found Episcopalian or Presbyterian justifications. In recent times one of the branches of the New Church, following the trend of the times, came out for the "social gospel," disowning, however, socialism or any other concrete program of reform.

Miss Block sums up the New Church's "unique contribution" in its "technique for discovering hidden meanings." Doubtless this concentration on hidden meanings serves to keep its members from recognizing the plain handwriting on the wall, that the day of the churches is over.

BENJAMIN GINZBURG

George Eliot at Home

The Life of George Eliot. By Emilie and Georges Romieu. Translated from the French by Brian W. Downs. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.75.

PERHAPS the best portrait of George Eliot that has come down to us was sketched by Henry James. It pretended to be no more than a dim likeness; a faded daguerreotype of a great lady fished from a forgotten pocket of a frock coat worn in James's youth, a considerably mellowed and tarnished recollection. Yet the outlines remain extraordinarily clear; there is no mistaking her nor Mr. Lewes. One afternoon James called at the great lady's home and waited nervously in the large darkened parlor-drawing room. George Eliot entered, and one felt the heavy equine features of the huge face: it was not necessary to see them at all; the deep, evasive, non-committal voice was quite enough. Some time before the visit James had sent the great lady a packet of books (his own early work) to read, and he was waiting for a comment. Candles were brought, and the darkness seemed even more oppressive; minutes went by like years; possibly James felt his thin hair turning gray—and still nothing of any importance was said. It was an impossible meeting. The Eliots, or rather, the Leweses, were quite as uneasy as James himself; there was no breaking through the Chinese wall of shyness, Victorian dignity, and the sense of outraged interruption of a great masterpiece possibly in progress that very afternoon.

Finally James steered himself (one supposes that he walked slowly backward) out the front door, then halted timidly to inquire of Mr. Lewes whether George Eliot received the books, and did she read them? At this bold question Mr. Lewes became slightly hysterical and was suddenly galvanized into action. He tore back into the house and returned, books in hand, and thrust them at the trembling author. "Take them away," he said, "take them away."

Out of this slight incident the entire framework of George Eliot's personality may be reconstructed. The wounded ego, cloaked with dignity, the slow, cumulative mind, overworked and driven forward by superhuman energy, the yearning for social recognition that never came, the worship of middle-class respectability—are all suggested in James's sketch. At the time James met her she must have been well past middle age; she had won her fame and a comfortable fortune in the bank at the cost of thirty years' hard work: translation, reviews, and at last fiction—written at a pace that would have killed the average writer in a period of ten years at most.

And in one sense her novels reflect something of the pressure brought to bear upon her serious, heavy, unyielding mind. They are filled with bourgeois gloom and a Victorian fatalism that had become a substitute for established religion, for George Eliot had rejected what were to her the frivolous trappings of the church, and clung desperately to a vague yet terrifying concept of an Omnipotent Being. Fate and an almost indescribable weakness at the very core of humanity took care of the rest. It remained for Thomas Hardy to complete the picture, to give rural English society the final impress of tragedy, the aftermath of a long-drawn-out industrial revolution, a tragedy beyond the reach of George Eliot's pathos or imagination.

The present biography of George Eliot is a curiously entertaining book, a flagrantly novelized version of her life that follows a pattern already molded by André Maurois's "Ariel" and "Byron." The point of view concerning its subject seems to arise out of a vast misunderstanding of English character and English letters, yet this very misunderstanding does succeed in throwing new light upon the principal actors in the play, Marian Evans and her illegitimate husband, George Henry Lewes. The two figures are made to appear completely isolated from the rest of the world, which in a literal sense they were, but they are reconstructed in a wholly fantastic background. An example of the way the Romieus allow their imagination free rein is their explanation of Marian Evans's choice of a nom de plume:

"Eliot" is obviously derived from Evans—the same number of letters, the same initial, the same general look, but rather more youthful, more smart and alert. "Eliot" gives, somehow, the idea of wings, of lofty peaks and of sunlight.

No doubt the name "Eliot" is exotic to French ears, and in a full tide of rhapsody the Romieus take advantage of the occasion. The rapturous, incredible conversations between Marian Evans and her father, between Lewes and George Eliot, are a delight, a kind of eloquence seldom seen or heard outside the old ten-twenty-thirty melodrama theaters. Yet in the progress of this burlesque excitement, chatter, and enthusiasm, an interesting accident occurs, an accident, I believe, quite unforeseen by either of the intrepid authors. Suddenly they grow weary of their noble heroine who defied society by living with a married man, George Lewes. They find Lewes nervous, erratic, strained to the breaking-point, author of a monumental life of Goethe, husband of a wife abducted by Leigh Hunt's son, far more interesting than the great lady at his side. Lewes becomes the hero and a martyr, a victim of George Eliot's domestic selfishness. One feels that in this last stroke of intuition the Romieus have somehow divined an accurate picture of the relationship between the two strange figures who by great labor and well-directed strategy climbed from an underworld of hack-writing into literary prominence. Fully half the credit of George Eliot's success belongs to Lewes; it was his encouragement, his drive, his gift for gaining the attention of publishers and utilizing a genius for publicity, that gave George Eliot her initial position. Her marriage to Cross after Lewes's death was a last gesture toward the social recognition that had been her goal for thirty-five years. She was then an old woman, comparatively wealthy and secure, yet she needed further security, and could find peace only in the arms of a young man who represented the prestige of English upper-middle-class tradition.

HORACE GREGORY

Myth, Fact, and Poetry of Soviet Russia

Bolshevism: Theory and Practice. By Waldemar Gurian. Translated from the German by E. I. Watkin. The Macmillan Company. $3.

The Soviet Worker. By Joseph Freeman. Liveright. $2.50.

Dawn in Russia. By Waldo Frank. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.25.

Bolshevism, Fascism, and Capitalism. By George S. Counts, Luigi Villari, Malcolm C. Rorty, and Newton D. Baker. Yale University Press. $2.50.

FEW books on Russia have attempted to evaluate the theory and practice of bolshevism from the standpoint of Roman Catholicism. Hostile critics of communism profess to have found disturbing similarities in the organizational structure of the church and the Communist Party. They point not only to the emphasis in both ideologies upon the salvation of man as the goal of all activity, but to the common use of indoctrination as a means to that end. Yet the Roman Catholic church still regards bolshevism as its most dangerous enemy—so dangerous that, as Dr. Gurian's book shows, it has paid it the compliment of advancing from denunciation of its practices to an analysis of its theory. The trouble with Gurian's analysis is that it takes the Catholic position on the nature of man and the universe so completely for granted that his criticism of communism really proves no more than that Communists are not Catholics. "The church's sole concern in combating bolshevism," he writes, "is to secure for man the possibility of developing in accordance with his true nature." When we examine this ingratiatingly liberal sentence, we discover that for Gurian the "true nature" of man is such that "he can never produce a self-sufficient society." The fundamental defect, then, of communism is that it believes that human beings can control their own social and personal life without supernatural sanctions, and that, as a practical corollary, it is unnecessary to pay toll to a religious organization for the bad luck of being born and the privilege of being buried. Behind his theoretical discussion one senses Gurian's furious hatred of the Soviet attitude toward sex and church property. It is the concrete measures which communism threatens to adopt to drive organized religion from public life—and not concern with the soul of man—which leads the writer to admit that "the church is ranged on the side of the bourgeois society in the struggle against bolshevism."

The utterly illogical character of Gurian's criticism, even in his own terms, is revealed in the readiness with which he abandons his position to score against communism. His chief point against communism is the inadequate and unethical character of its end—social control of the productive process in the interest of man here and now. But he never misses an opportunity to criticize it for not succeeding in its end. It is like condemning a man for murder and then tacking on an additional charge that he was inefficient in carrying it out. So eager is Dr. Gurian to seize any stick to beat the dog that even his "objective" summaries of the accomplishments of the Soviet Union are extremely unreliable.

One point which demands consideration is suggested by Gurian's constant harping upon the suffering entailed by the Bolshevik attempt to revolutionize the social order. To be sure, one must judge a project by its costs. (How Gurian squares this principle with orthodox Catholicism is his own concern.) But to judge anything only by its costs is to condemn everything ever undertaken and carried to completion in this imperfect world. Hardly a single major good has come down from the past, from the discovery of fire and speech to the latest developments of scientific technique, for which human beings have not paid a price in suffering and death. Even the "blessings" of the church, Mr. Gurian would admit, have not been without their costs. Logic demands that before we reject a proposal because of its cost, we consider the cost of rejecting it for any of the available alternatives. Nowhere does the author meet the Communist contention that the costs of social revolution are far less than the chronic evils of poverty, unemployment, and war, which are immanent in capitalism. The only possible way to meet this argument would be either to assert, in the face of the twenty million dead and wounded in the last war, that social revolution is still more costly; or to demonstrate that poverty, war, and unemployment are not inherent in a capitalistic order, which no one so far has done with plausibility. Dr. Gurian refuses to join issue on the basic questions. He does not satisfy even as a Jesuit.

Joseph Freeman's "The Soviet Worker" is as candid in its sympathy for Russia as Gurian's book is artful in its antipathy. None the less it has a better right to be regarded as an "encyclopedia" of Russian theory and practice than Gurian's volume. For those who wish to have a critical solvent to test all reports, descriptions, and exposés of Russian life—especially on the status of the worker—Freeman's book is invaluable. Relying almost exclusively upon official documents and statistical tables, the author presents a striking picture of the economic and cultural achievements of the Russian worker since the revolution. He makes no exaggerated claims about the present level of the worker's material welfare, but the dramatic quality of Russia's advance emerges out of the matter-of-fact contrast drawn between the worker's lot in Czarist Russia and Russia today. For all its sober style and heavy documentation, it is really an exciting book. In chronicling the accomplishments of Russian industry, in interpreting the succession of annual objectives, and in describing both the structure of workers' organizations and the character of social legislation, Freeman has written, apparently without intending it, an excellent economic history of the Russian revolution. Judicious quotation enables him to weave into his account a considerable amount of theoretical exposition so that the reader always has a vantage point from which he can evaluate the significance of the facts and figures recorded. An impressive mastery of calendar detail is combined with a keen consciousness of long-time trends and tendencies. In one or two places, absolute figures should have been given along with the percentage rates of increase, because in starting from scratch—or near scratch—every country, up to a certain point, accelerates its rates of increase. Accelerations in rate of increase tell us of the past and the probable future, but only when the absolute figures are added can we form an adequate picture of the present.

It is often the case that those who are strongest in their denunciation of the Russian materialist philosophy are themselves peculiarly insensitive to the evidence of things unseen in Russian life today. Yet ultimately communism must be judged not merely by the material standard of life it is able to attain but by the character of the personalities it produces, the nature of its ideals and incentives, and the quality and spirit of its daily experience. Waldo Frank's strong intuitive vision renders him particularly qualified to recognize the promise of Russian life. His "Dawn in Russia" does not gloze over the difficulties and evils of the present but it sweeps them up in a poetic perspective of which Frank's own temperament is the most important axis. It is to be expected that such an impressionistic account should contain as much about Waldo Frank as about Soviet Russia. Nevertheless the objectification of Frank's own emotions is not experienced as a distortion of what he sees. Like Russia to Frank, the book itself invites an intuitive reaction on the part of the reader. Inaccuracies of statement and observation seem unimportant because Frank is not talking about what can be measured but about what he has felt. Although the mystical idealism which underlies his holiday descriptions are foreign to my temperament, I can testify, using my own Russian experience as a kind of control, to the power and fidelity with which he has communicated the qualities of the different Russian cities and groups—their ideas, feelings, and crowd behavior. Something, however, is lacking. At times false notes suggest that Frank is whipping up his own enthusiasm. He has more completely accepted the Russian Revolution with his heart than with his mind. His criticism of the theory of dialectical materialism is based on a misunderstanding, the crassest expression of which is the statement that materialism and dialectic are contradictory terms. All in all, however, this is a book which should be read by those who are interested in Russia or in Waldo Frank.

The symposium on "Bolshevism, Fascism and Capitalism," contains a competent article by Counts on communism and an interesting description of the fascist economic theory and practice by Villari. A close reading of both is recommended to those who, on the basis of some similarity in external political form, lump both systems together.

SIDNEY HOOK

Shorter Notices

Boyhood and Youth. By Hans Carossa. Translated from the German by Agnes Neill Scott. Brewer, Warren and Putnam. $2.

Every autobiographer apologizes in some manner for the effrontery of writing about himself. Carossa's apology is a subtle one. His reactions are pitched upon so rarefied a plane of sensibility that the reader is expected to feel that a man so exquisitely sensitive owes it to the world as a duty to record himself. This sensitiveness, however, has too many slips into affectation and sentimentality. The boyhood is too neat and polished a reconstruction to be plausible. The book is full of pretty writing and, in spite of occasional flashes, second-rate.

The Sea Tyrant. By Peter Freuchen. Translated from the Danish by Edwin Bjorkman. Horace Liveright. $2.

The by-products of this novel are more interesting than the main product. As in Freuchen's previous and better book, "Eskimo," the accounts of the life of the Eskimos and of their relations with the crews of whaling vessels are excellent and convincing. The sea tyrant himself, Captain Danco Kellar who is driven to insane lengths of cruelty by the heartlessness of his trivial-minded wife, is not made credible in the over-robust characterization; and the ending becomes, by its excess of tragedy, absurd.

Poems of Francis Thompson. Edited by Reverend Terence L. Connolly. The Century Company. $3.

Francis Thompson's poems afford some difficulty for two reasons: their mysticism is Catholic and springs from a profound knowledge of Catholic ritualism; their imagery is complex and springs, for the most part, from the highly romantic and sensuous feeling which characterized the poet's approach to all that he saw and felt. Had he been entirely Catholic, his poetry would have been more austere, more thoughtful. But he arrived at every conclusion through his emotions; he was passionately aware of the senses and their luster; he could not deny the flesh; it was the source, much of the time, of his deepest impressions. The Dread of the Heights, in some ways the keynote poem of his volume, indicates how constantly he knew that once he had touched the center of the mystic experience, he must drop from that moment of conviction to the depth of despair at losing it. He was a "spoiled priest" and he never lost his heart-break over his failure. But that very heart-break and his own sensuousness are what make his poetry great. He had nothing of Blake's "terrifying simplicity" of vision, nothing of the intellectual certainty of certain other Catholic mystics. He was as intensely aware of the physical world as Shelley or Keats, but the physical world gave him no confirmation, no sense of an Ultimate by which he could live. From it he drew his abundant, sometimes almost over-ripe imagery, but his God was no Pantheistic deity, or sense of deity, but the God taught by the church. And his greatest poems are those in which somehow he arrived at the certainty of this idea of God.

As It Looks to Young China. Edited by William Hung. New York: Friendship Press. $1.

This book is divided into seven chapters: Setting Confucius Aside by the editor who is a professor of history at Yenching University, Peiping; The Family by Timothy Tingfang Lew, professor of psychology; The School by K. Ma, professor of literature; The Vocation by James S. Chuan, manager of a Peiping bank; The Nation by J. F. Li, professor of religion; The World by Y. Y. Tsu, a director of social work; and The Church by T. C. Chao, dean of a school of religion. All are Chinese Christians, but had that information not been given by the editor it would not have been given away in the text, so admirably objective is the treatment throughout. It is a valuable little book, in good, clear English. It is heartily recommended to all who are interested in the situation that faces young men living in a civilization that is completely transforming itself and in which, whether they choose it or not, they must play a major role.

Weep No More. By Ward Greene. Harrison Smith. $2.50.

Although Mr. Greene attempts to give this novel about life in a Southern city all the airs of a social document, its ranking will not be high as a picture of social or moral conditions under the shifting economic structure of the new South. The novel is nothing more than another chronicle of the drinking and sexual habits of the rich, dotted with comments from another goateed Colonel which tend to prove, if anything, that dissolute and aimless people were as tiresome in the old South as in the new. As a matter of fact, there is nothing particularly Southern about the characters, except that they call each other "Honey" and drink corn liquor instead of gin.

Recollections of the Past Ten Years. By Timothy Flint. Edited with an introduction by C. Hartley Grattan. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

This is the sixth volume in a series of reprints called "Americana Deserta," and very welcome it is, since Timothy Flint's honest and charming account of Middle America a century or more ago has been difficult to obtain. It should be read by anyone who wants to know what it felt like to float down the Ohio in a flatboat shortly after the year 1800; or who is interested in a veracious report of American frontier manners. Mr. Grattan has contributed a sketch of Flint's life as well as an appraisal of him as missionary and social critic.

Israel. By Adolphe Lods. Translated from the French by S. H. Hooke. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

The book begins long before the appearance of the Israelites, with a detailed study of the historical and topographical setting upon which the nation was soon to project itself; then gives an account of the people and civilization of Canaan, before its conquest by Israel, to indicate the racial and cultural merger that was to be effected; then takes up the history of the tribes before the settlement in Canaan; following with its historical career and the development of its religion and culture up to the eighth century when the Assyrian invasions began. The treatment is scholarly throughout. Literary values, like narrative continuity, are readily sacrificed in intertextual discussions of documents, interpretation, archaeological evidence. The writer's style, however, is clear and concise, and manages in spite of the long scholarly ritual that precedes admissions of each fact, to present a great amount of information. It is one of the more readable volumes in The History of Civilization Series.

Films

Three Premature Births

IF the young ladies who go to the movies do not know yet all about the glory of romance and its frequent aftermath of disillusionment and misery in one week recently they had an opportunity for completing their education in the space of a few hours. Starting at the Rivoli Theater where a blissful prelude was being played out under the eloquent title of "Love Me Tonight," they might have gone next to the Hollywood Theater to learn of the painful consequences that follow such reckless conduct, as demonstrated in "Life Begins," which begins, of course, in a maternity hospital. Finally, they should have retraced their steps to visit the Mayfair Theater and let "Back Street" open their eyes to the miserable lot of a woman who chooses to be the mistress of a married man. If after taking this short course in the joys and sorrows of womanhood they found it not too absorbing. I should probably agree with them. But then this is the best that Hollywood

Learn RUSSIAN Class
now forming

Take up Russian under personal tutorship of Dr. G. Bronsky of Moscow University. Limited group, 2 evenings a week.

75c per Lesson

The Linguaphone Method is endorsed by leading educators as the most rapid and easiest way to master French, Spanish, German, Russian, Polish, and other languages—without a teacher in your own home.

Send for Complete Information

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
10 East 43rd Street, N. Y. MURRAY HILL 2-3072

DINNER

Thomas for President Committee

invites you to a dinner for

NORMAN THOMAS

Monday, September 19th at 6:45 P.M.

MECCA TEMPLE

130 West 56th Street,

New York City

Speakers: Norman Thomas, Heywood Brown, B. Charney
Valdeck, Louis Waldman, Paul Douglas

Make reservations now

Thomas for President Committee
112 East 19th St., N. Y. C.

Tickets: $1.50

can do for them in a single day, and as the French say, even the most beautiful girl cannot give more than she has.

As a mere male I must admit that I find but little in any of the three pictures mentioned that is not either flat and dull, or so overloaded with mawkish sentiment that it makes me feel distinctly uncomfortable. The dulness and flatness, I regret to say, are to be found in particularly irritating doses in "Love Me Tonight." Maurice Chevalier, who used to charm us with the roguishness of a young boy and the knowledgeable understanding of a man of the world that made him such a delightful screen lover, is revealed in this latest picture of his as a tired man who is trying his hardest to appear sprightly and irresistible. The lack of his usual verve and spontaneity is made particularly obvious in his songs, one and all of which seem painfully forced. Even more disappointing to me, because of the expectations aroused by his earlier work, is Rouben Mamoulian's performance as the director of the picture. In his first picture, "Applause," made when the talkies were still in their infancy, Mr. Mamoulian was daring and original. Above all, he showed a quality of imagination that knew how to bring the unfamiliar and the significant out of the welter of photographic impressions. In "Love Me Tonight," a musical comedy romance with a touch of wilful extravaganza, he either failed to find a subject after his own heart, or failed to discover in himself the power of imagination that would have made its hackneyed story pointed and interesting. Only once, and then merely by repeating himself, does he succeed in striking a note of convincing inventiveness. This is in the opening scene, showing the sleepy Paris awakening to its daily labors in a swelling symphony of miscellaneous noises. In the rest of the picture he either attempts comedy in the style of Lubitsch, without the latter's flair for the bizarre, or follows the treatment of music in "Sous les Toits de Paris" by laborious repetition of the same song by various characters quite regardless of its dramatic relevance to the story. After hearing about a dozen versions of The Son of a Gun Is Nothing But a Tailor, at least one of the spectators was on the point of using a less printable language.

Of the two other pictures, "Life Begins" has interesting material in so far as it describes the trials and tribulations of expectant mothers. It also has frequent flashes of genuine humor. But its dramatic theme is theatrically conceived, and its general sentiment is unbearably cloying. Flat, unconvincing and mawkish is all that can be said of "Back Street."

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Contributors to This Issue

BAILEY W. DIFFIE is an instructor in history at the College of the City of New York.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

CONRAD AIKEN was awarded the Pulitzer prize in 1930 for his "Selected Poems."

S. K. RATCLIFFE is the well-known British publicist and lecturer.

LOLA RIDGE is the author of "Firehead."

BENJAMIN GINZBURG is the author of "The Adventure of Science."

HORACE GREGORY, author of "Chelsea Rooming House," will have a new volume of verse published in the fall by Harcourt, Brace and Company.

SIDNEY HOOK is a member of the department of philosophy of Washington Square College, New York University.

A Questionnaire for Consumers

What humidifiers are effective, and reasonably priced?

What fire extinguishers are dangerous because they engender a false sense of security?

What highly advertised wall board is not recommended because of its low quality?

Are electric lamp bulbs at the 5-and-10 stores a good buy?

Are there any oil burners on the market which are really past the experimental stage?

These are a few of the questions about lighting, heating and ventilating problems which Consumers' Research answers in the current section of the Handbook of Buying, which, in addition, contains information on fire extinguishers and building materials and supplies.

Consumers' Research was organized to give ultimate consumers the answers to these and many other questions about the commodities which they buy. Some of the subjects dealt with in past bulletins and handbooks have been: automobiles of 1932, gasoline and oil, vacuum cleaners, electric refrigerators, and toasters, various household appliances, radio sets, and canned goods. The information is given as a confidential service to individual subscribers in Handbooks of Buying and periodic bulletins—expert tests and judgments from impartial technical experts—NOT from manufacturers, merchants, salesmen, or advertising men. CR is a critical service, not a "household institute." A yearly subscription is $2 (Canadian and Foreign $3). Send for a circular containing an application blank, and further information to:

CONSUMER'S RESEARCH, Inc.

A Non-Profit Advisory Service for Consumers

24 West 25th Street

New York City

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN With GLENN ANDERS
MARGARET WYCHERLY, LAURA STRAUBE, JOHN BEAL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."
—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

BOOTH THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2.40

The Nation's Radio Hour

Oswald Garrison Villard will speak on Wednesday evening, September 14, over

Station WEVD

September 14

8:15 p. m.

□ WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT □

PLAYS TO SEE

Another Language—Booth—45 St., W. of B'way.

Best Years—Bijou—W. 45 St.

Bridal Wise—Cort—W. 48 St.

Here Today—Barrymore—W. 47 St.

Of Thee I Sing—Music Box—W. 45 St.

Show Boat—Casino—7 Ave. at 50 St.

DINNER

Campaign Dinner for Norman Thomas—Mecca Temple—Mon. Eve. Sept. 19.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1932

No. 3507

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	241
EDITORIALS:
Bonds That Bind Haiti	243
Jimmy Walker—and After	244
How Real Is "Recovery"?	245
Orchestras and Public	245
Unto Caesar	246
THE POT AND THE KETTLE: The Bipartisan Hypocrisy of Politicians. By Oswald Garrison Villard	247
A WEEK IN A SOVIET FACTORY. By Louis Fischer	248
PEOPLES AND WARS. By Romain Rolland	251
THE SHOW BUSINESS. III. WHAT IT COSTS. By Joseph Wood Krutch	252
THE POLITICAL FRONT:
I. Dr. Brinkley of Kansas. By Richard Hughes Bailey	254
II. "Ma" Ferguson Wins Again. By Harold Preece	255
WHAT REALLY HAPPENED. By Morrie Ryskind	256
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	258
CORRESPONDENCE	258
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	259
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
High City. By Leonora Speyer	260
Spanish Katzenjammer. By H. L. Mencken	260
Inquiry Into Life. By Dorothy Van Doren	261
Senator Beveridge. By William MacDonald	261
Prices Versus Planning. By Henry Raymond Mussey	262
Distinguished Tedium. By Robert Cantwell	263
Shorter Notices	264
Drama: They're Off. By Joseph Wood Krutch	265

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
MARGARET MARSHALL

DRAMATIC EDITOR

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LITERARY EDITOR

HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN H. L. MENCKEN MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON ARTHUR WARNER

MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

WE ARE NOT ONE BIT IMPRESSED with the Attorney-General's obviously made-to-order indictment of the men in the bonus army, by which he undertakes to prove that 1,069 had more or less serious police records. This investigation was started after the dispersal of the army, when the men were scattered. And if there were that number of rapists, burglars, embezzlers, and violators of the narcotic law, why were these facts not known prior to the dispersal of the army? What were the Washington police and the government doing to allow these men to stay there as long as they did? Ordinarily the police do not permit 1,069 disreputable characters to come together within the confines of a municipality and stay there for weeks and weeks. And why, if this was known before the eviction of the army, were the facts not given out at once? Why did Mr. Hoover first tell us that the men had to be evicted from wrecks of buildings because new construction was to go up, when no new construction has been started or is to be started? We hope the reply of General Pelham D. Glassford, which is being prepared as we go to press, will cover these points. We have seen too much framing of the innocent by the Department of Justice since 1917 to accept any such ex parte statement at the order of a President seeking reelection, who is frightened to death because the American Legion conventions have one after another criticized or denounced him and Secretary Hurley for their indefensible handling of the bonus-army difficulty. Curiously, the Attorney-General reported just before the Legion's national convention.

PRESIDENT HOOVER might as well begin to pack his trunks if it is true that "as Maine goes, so goes the nation." The vote there on September 12 is a disaster for Republican hopes, whether the Democrats finally carry the State and two of the three Congress seats or not—the issue is not quite settled as we write. To reduce the Hoover majority of 98,744 to the vanishing point is victory enough for the Democrats. If they have really carried the State the indications are clear that the voters of this country have made up their minds to turn the faithless and incompetent officials out of office and to give the Democrats not only the Presidency but the Congress as well. This is the answer to Secretary Mills's appeal on the eve of election not to turn the government over to Roosevelt the kindergartner! Beyond doubt the apologists for the Hoover Administration will point out that a normal Maine Republican majority is 15,000 or 20,000 and that therefore the showing is not so very bad. But it is in line with every straw ballot which has been taken; it is in line, moreover, with the historic precedents that whoever is in power during a panic shall pay with his political head whether he be responsible or not. In this case Mr. Hoover has so clearly shown his ineptitude and inefficiency, his complete failure to rise to the crisis, his crass and cruel indifference to the sufferings of the individual that any other result in Maine would have reflected upon the intelligence of the electorate. The Democrats may well feel heartened—if not the advocates of real progress.

OUR READERS WILL REMEMBER the terrific fight in the early part of this year to have Congress balance the budget. They will recall the immense satisfaction that swept through the country when Congress finally "balanced" it. The newspaper editorial writers, the chambers of commerce, nearly all the Congressmen themselves, and President Hoover, all heaved a mighty sigh of relief. Unfortunately, the daily Treasury figures have not cooperated in the general rejoicing. The statement of August 31, covering the first forty days in which the rates under the new revenue act have been in effect, showed revenue collections so far of $185,000,000 compared with $230,000,000 in the same period last year, and expenditures of $585,000,000 compared with $627,000,000 last year. The deficit so far this year, therefore, is $400,000,000 compared with $396,000,000 last year. But we must believe the President rather than our eyes. In his speech of August 26 he listed "the balancing of the budget" as one of the great achievements that enabled us—note the past tense—to "overcome the major financial crisis."

THE FEDERAL FARM BOARD has another new policy. It still holds 3,000,000 of the 250,000,000 bushels of wheat that it held last July. This remainder seems comparatively negligible; nevertheless the Farm Board is quite worried about it, and now announces that it will not sell any of its remaining wheat before January, 1933. By an interesting coincidence this will keep the wheat off the market at least until after election day, so that no incipient boom which might possibly help Republican chances will be discouraged. A similar policy is announced in regard to cotton. On May 2 the Farm Board stated that it would sell 650,000 bales of its cotton during the twelve months beginning August 1. Now, four months later, it announces that it has sold more than 300,000 of those bales, but that it will not sell any more before next July. It has obtained a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which will enable it to hold the rest of its cotton off the market. Thus we still have not seen the end of the gigantic gamble in which hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money has been thrown away in a futile effort to peg the prices of agricultural products. The farmer has not only received no help from all this expenditure, but has actually been harmed by it; for the two organizations—named, with glaring irony, the Cotton Stabilization Corporation and the Grain Stabilization Corporation—by buying at the top and selling at the bottom, have performed exactly the opposite function from the one for which they were designed.

THE DEEP AND ANCIENT POVERTY of the Spanish peasant bids fair to be alleviated by the drastic agrarian reforms which have just been approved by the predominantly Socialist Cortes. The new law provides for the expropriation, with very limited indemnity, of all estates owned by the nobility or by the former king; and the breaking up and distribution of these estates particularly among poor and large families. Settlers on the divided lands, comprising nearly 52,000,000 acres, will be subsidized during the period of development. It is expressly stipulated that proprietors affected must begin registration of their land within thirty days on penalty of a fine. According to the Associated Press, "cooperative associations for cultivation, machinery, marketing, and other operations are provided, and it will be optional whether land is cultivated in communities or individually." At the same session at which the land reforms were voted, Catalonia was granted autonomy in matters of language, education, police protection, and social organization, while questions of foreign relations, and of naval and military protection were left to the national government—an intelligent disposition of the Catalonian question which has agitated Spain immemorially. And while we are recording the achievements of the Cortes we should like to include its approval on September 6 of penal reforms designed to abolish the death penalty.

NEW YORK CITY has opened a new and much-needed subway. What makes this news so interesting is that this particular subway is municipally built; what is much worse, it is municipally operated; yet the heavens have not fallen, nor has Herbert Hoover sent a telegram to Mayor McKee protesting in the name of his own beloved and outraged rugged individualism. Not even in Wall Street were there any protests. Yet when the first subway was opened in 1904 there was general rejoicing that, if it was in part built by the use of city funds, that impossible and horrid municipal ownership and operation had been successfully avoided. Here, today, is government once more usurping a great opportunity for private capital, getting in the way of private initiative and enterprise, again invading a field that properly belongs to our capitalist leaders, upon whom, as we all know, depends the prosperity and future development of the United States. It is a direct flouting of that noble doctrine of Warren Harding and Calvin Coolidge—"More business in government and less government in business"—yet there have been no screams of pain from those who so vigorously applauded this truly American sentiment. The truth is, first, that the world has moved so fast that no one is really outraged by municipal operation; and second, that the existing private lines in New York City are so nearly bankrupt (the Interborough Rapid Transit is in the hands of receivers), that rugged individualism and private initiative in New York have now no thought but to unload the whole business upon the city. It is only a question of a few years before there will be one unified rapid transit system in New York, owned and operated by the people of the metropolis.

"LAWYERS WHO DEFEND THE RIGHTS of political minorities have no place on the teaching staff of Southwestern University," said Dean Rollin McNitt of the law school of that institution in defending the forcing of Leo Gallagher, a brilliant and successful teacher on his staff, to take a long leave of absence which foreshadows his dismissal. These words the dean subsequently denied, but the paper which printed them refused to retract. The president of this remarkable Los Angeles university, one J. J. Schumacher, dissented. "McNitt," said he, "doesn't know what he is talking about; he is impetuous and says things without any authority. I am president of this school." He then went on to add that "Mr. Gallagher is probably the most learned and most popular man on the staff"; that he would "trust my entire personal welfare [to him] without the slightest hesitation." But this noble president agreed that Mr. Gallagher would not be asked to return to the position which he has held for the last ten years until he has "vindicated himself with the legal profession, which objects to his vigorous defense of so-called radicals." Finally, the president said: "I don't know how we are going to explain his absence to our students this fall when they fail to find his name on the curriculum," as at least 90 per cent of the six hundred students have already protested against Mr. Gallagher's rumored dismissal. We confess that we are stumped. We do not know which is the most contemptible, the impetuous, loose-tongued dean, or the president, who is too cowardly to defend the sacred right of academic freedom, or that section of the Los Angeles legal profession which would deny to men avowing unpopular faiths the right to a proper defense in the courts.

MAYOR JOSEPH V. McKEE, when he was visited by 5,000 Communists at City Hall, met their representatives with a politeness and suavity to which Communists are not accustomed. It was an intelligent move on the part of the man who wishes to succeed Jimmy Walker permanently. But on examining the evidence we cannot agree that Mayor McKee won as complete a victory in the argument over relief as the Times and the Herald Tribune made out. After an attempt to force Carl Winter, the Communist spokesman, into an irrelevant declaration in favor of direct action on the part of the unemployed if adequate relief is not forthcoming, Mayor McKee with all his suavity was not able to avoid admitting that the Mayor's office does not know, even approximately, after three years of depression, how many people are in need of help in New York City. If it is pointed out that he has only just taken over the office, the reply might be that even as president of the Board of Aldermen he might have interested himself in that burning question. Moreover, when Mr. Winter pressed questions on the city's intentions with regard to relief Mr. McKee replied with more petulance than relevance, "I'm not here to be heckled by you." The Communists, as usual, stated their case and their demands in exaggerated and unrealistic terms. Yet it seems to us that Mr. Winter was not unjustified in holding that it was up to the city government to find means for relief. And as for his contention that no city official outside the civil service is worth more than $3,500 a year, it is difficult to refrain from pointing out that with regard to a few of them, at least, he was indulging in a little politeness himself.

THE DEATH OF SIR GILBERT PARKER is another reminder of the transitoriness of most literary fame. Sir Gilbert, who was born in Canada sixty-nine years ago, was the author of some thirty volumes of prose and verse, and his best-known novel, "The Seats of the Mighty," was a nine days' wonder which sold over a hundred thousand copies. Many of his other books were also extremely popular, but it is doubtful if any of them are now often read by either students or casual readers. His stories were reputed to be conspicuously "healthy" in tone but we like to think that his relative eclipse is due in part to a change in the public attitude toward certain of the ideas which both his fiction and his other writings attempted to popularize. Sir Gilbert was an imperialist of the old romantic school, and during the war he was very active in the dubious business of propaganda. Certain of the obituaries published in the daily press mention that fact as his chief claim to grateful remembrance. To us it seems a more than doubtful one at best.

Bonds That Bind Haiti

NEWSPAPER headlines generally announce, as did the New York Times, Haitian Treaty to End Intervention in 1934; the Republican press editorializes fulsomely on Mr. Hoover's achievement. But the facts about the supposedly imminent "ending of the Occupation" are at variance with the impression derived from the daily press.

It is true that following the recommendations of the Forbes Commission, the marines are being withdrawn, and various of the so-called "treaty services"—education, hygiene, public works—have been turned over to Haitians. But the really important part of the American control—the financial—endures. It is, under the terms of the proposed treaty, to continue, not merely, as provided in the 1915 treaty imposed "by military pressure," until 1936, but until interest and principal of Haitian bonds are paid in full. The new treaty provides for complete control of Haitian finances, customs, and internal revenue, by Americans—control which is now indefinitely prolonged and for the first time apparently accepted by the Haitians themselves. Americans will hold the purse-strings. They will remain the real rulers of Haiti. The major part of the text of the new treaty, which occupies three and a half columns of newspaper type, is devoted to specifying the many things which the Haitians must not do. They are free to swim but they may not go near the water!

The objectionable character of this new treaty stands out only when viewed in the light of history. It should not be unfamiliar to Nation readers that the essential motive behind the assault on Haiti was economic. Intrigues had been in progress with the State Department for years preceding the naval intervention—ever since the entry of the National City Bank into Haitian affairs and the securing of the notorious McDonald railroad concession. To recover the full face value of their worthless securities was the concessionaires' objective. To the imposition of the loan on Haiti, the other illegal and violent acts—seizure of the Haitian custom houses and funds, the imposition of a treaty and a constitution concocted in our Navy or State Departments, the imposition of a protocol compelling Haiti to settle all "claims" against her—were but preliminary. The $16,000,000 National City Bank loan of 1922, imposed over the protest of every articulate Haitian, carried the extraordinary and unprecedented provision that the United States should retain control in Haiti during the life of the loan. It was treaty-making without "the advice and consent of the Senate." The loan secured, the railroad bondholders' claims were adjusted favorably to them in wholly ex parte proceedings: they received the new government bonds, guaranteed by Uncle Sam, for their defaulted railroad securities! The new treaty further protects the National City Bank loan, although Secretary Stimson denied, in a letter to Senator Smoot on February 15 of this year, that the American Government has guaranteed this loan in any way whatsoever.

In view of the dominating element of force and chicanery which has characterized United States dealings with Haiti, equity and common decency required, and still require, abrogation of all previous pacts, and, if the Haitians desire, the free negotiation of an entirely new arrangement. It is highly ironical that when so large a proportion of financial commitments throughout the world are undergoing revision, when fixed charges are being scaled down, when moratoria are the order of the day, when debts are being "funded"—to use the financial euphemism—when virtually every independent Latin American country has defaulted on its obligations, the poverty-stricken Haitians are forced to continue to pay one hundred cents on the dollar on a debt which conferred virtually no material benefit on them. The whole transaction was fraud in legalized form. Under the appearance of virtue, kindness, and amity, this fraud is to be perpetuated. If the Haitians accept the treaty it is only because their bitter experience leads them to the hope and belief that they may be able to buy their freedom within the next ten years, and that it is worth the price. Without minimizing the credit devolving on Mr. Hoover for doing what neither of his Republican predecessors did—namely, withdrawing from Haiti—it is important to note that the imperialist cycle is to be completed as originally scheduled by the interested financiers and their responsive servants in the Capitol.

Jimmy Walker—and After

AS we write, it is not clear whether Tammany will take the risk of giving ex-Mayor Walker the chance to be "vindicated" at the polls in November or not. Every day that the Tammany boss hesitates weakens Mr. Walker. If you are going to come to the rescue of a "martyr" to "dirty politics," you must strike while the iron is hot and public sentiment aroused. Unfortunately the memory of the American people in such matters is notoriously brief; particularly now, when so many people are struggling for a livelihood, will it be difficult to keep poor Jimmy Walker's wrongs before the public. More than that, his successor, Mayor McKee, has been dealing some terrific blows to the genial Jimmy by the way he is conducting the Mayor's office. Thus, he has discarded the $18,000 automobile which alone was good enough to transport Jimmy (most millionaires, we believe, are content with $5,000 or $6,000 cars), and continues to ride in the subway to and from his work. Again, he is on the job every day. He has actually cut $15,000 a year from his own salary, and has made savings in other directions to aggregate $2,000,000. He has already called one meeting to put an end to a duplication of effort by several departments, and he bids fair really to put his high office on a business basis. That is such good politics that already Mr. McKee's own stock is booming, even though he has been heretofore little better than the conventional conforming office-holder.

As for the Tammany opposition, there is the usual talk about uniting on some good Democrat, preferably Alfred E. Smith at the coming election—providing the court action on behalf of Mr. McKee to prevent such an election is not successful. That Mr. Smith will run we do not believe. Mr. Seabury has declined, and quite rightly, to be a candidate. The list of other distinguished Democrats that could be drafted in this emergency is pitifully small. More than that, the fact that the mayoralty election will coincide with the Presidential election will make it almost impossible to focus the city's attention upon local issues. Altogether, therefore, the possibility of turning Tammany out upon the basis of the revelations of the Seabury investigation is very slight.

But even if this were not the case, we ourselves should be very dubious of the lasting value of any sudden victory over Tammany by some good man swept into office, as has happened several times before, because of an outburst of popular indignation. When such a mayor gets in he is immediately hampered by the variegated character of his own following, and especially by the Republican organization, which is not one whit better than the Tammany crowd, and is always ready and eager to share plums with them. After a brief rule such a mayor goes out of office and Tammany comes in again triumphant. That is not the way to bring about permanent reform. The only hope of really rescuing the government of the greatest city in America, as well as most of the other governments in the land, is by radical changes in the procedure of elections and in the composition of city governments. By this we do not mean that the democratic idea should be abandoned. We do mean that there are devices to be resorted to such as the city manager—who in some cases, as in Cincinnati, performs most useful functions by the side of the elected mayor. There is the possibility of extending the civil service to cover every possible office, even the technical ones of the present mayoralty cabinets. Then there is the remedy of proportional representation. For years the political minorities in the City of New York have been represented by only one member of the Board of Aldermen, although the Republicans polled 367,675 votes in the last mayoralty campaign and the Socialists 175,697. That single representative, in this case an entirely worthy one, has been unable to block or adequately to expose some of the pilfering or mistaken ordinances which have been jammed through the board. The idea that so great a body of voters should not have a representation proportionate to the number of votes it casts is ridiculous. An efficient and critical minority in the city legislature would be of enormous benefit.

The main objective, of course, is a reorganization of the government by which it will be made impossible for the sheriff, for example, to bank $360,660 in six and one-quarter years, during which time his salary ranged from $6,500 to $15,000; and put it beyond the powers of the registrar to bank $547,000 above his salary, also in a period of six years, while the chief clerk of the city was enriched by $135,061. A good deal of this was undoubtedly legalized graft. As long as the opportunity is there thus to mulct the taxpayer, through fees, et cetera, it will be used both by Republicans and Democrats.

Last January we made an appeal to Mr. Seabury not to wind up his labors without making definite and concrete recommendations for a complete making over of the city government if only for the reason that, as long as the present system endured, city government in America is disgraced by what goes on in the metropolis. In Cincinnati, the city manager, C. E. Dykstra, has taken politics out of the police system and many other departments, with the result that graft has about disappeared, and crime steadily decreases. Is there any reason why the City of New York cannot do the same?

We believe that it can be accomplished despite the fact that one must appeal to the same electorate which elected Jimmy Walker for authority to alter the governmental system and to change the charter. We may be wrong, but we cannot believe that the City of New York is indefinitely condemned to present conditions until, perhaps, the Socialist Party becomes strong enough to take over the government and basically alter it. But even if we are wrong, there lies the objective, the modernizing of the government in a way to make possible sound business management and to concentrate responsibility as never before, the giving to the minority of full and free opportunity to be heard and to make its influence felt. It is to the credit of the leaders of the Socialist Party in New York that they have seen this and are working to this end. They have clearly recognized that not even if Norman Thomas were elected mayor could there be a wholly satisfactory government of the city.

How Real is the "Recovery"?

WITH so many more people becoming so much more confident every day that the economic crisis has at last been surmounted, and the famous "corner" finally turned, it may be well to glance at exactly what changes have taken place in the last two months. By far the most remarkable change has been in the tone of the security markets. The average price of fifty representative stocks, as compiled by the New York Times, rose from 33.98 on July 8 to 72.38 on September 8. Here is an advance in two months of 113 per cent, probably the greatest advance in such a period, in terms, certainly, of percentages, in the history of the Stock Exchange. There was no such percentage advance even in the whole period from 1921 to 1925. The recovery of railroad stocks, taken alone, has been even more striking. From an average price of 10.34 on July 8, they had risen by September 8 to 33.48, or 224 per cent. Even the prices of forty representative bonds have advanced since the beginning of June by nearly 40 per cent.

So remarkable a rise cannot be dismissed as unimportant. The New York Stock Exchange has calculated that the increase in the market price of all the shares listed there in July and August amounted to more than $12,000,000,000. If one adds to this the increase in bond values, and in values of securities listed on all other American exchanges, the total increase in potential purchasing power becomes impressive. Of even more importance has been the psychological effect of this advance. The trustworthiness of the stock market as a barometer of general conditions has been brought into serious doubt in the last decade, but the present rise has meant a widespread better feeling.

To what extent has this better feeling translated itself into actual improvement in agriculture and industry? There have been advances in wheat, cotton, hogs, and other agricultural products, in some instances only slightly less remarkable than the advance in stocks. But in discussing these price advances it is important to remember the point from which the advance has been made, not to speak of the point from which the original decline took place. Thus, even the stock-market rise, sensational in some respects as it has been, represents the recovery only of the losses suffered since the beginning of the present year. Thus, if we again take as our measuring rod the Times's average figures, on July 8 of this year stocks had lost 90 per cent of their quoted value in September, 1929, and even after their present recovery they still show a loss of nearly 80 per cent of that fantastic value.

When we turn from price considerations to the actual physical volume of trade, and to the crucial question of employment, the present "recovery" has been negligible—indeed, almost infinitesimal. A good rough index is that compiled weekly by the New York Times. It is an average of five items—freight-car loadings, steel-mill activity, electric power, automobile, and carded cotton-cloth production—and it is adjusted to allow for seasonal variations and "long-time trends." This index steadily declined during July and early August, and in the week ended August 13 showed business activity at 52.2 per cent of "normal," the lowest point on record. The figure for the week ended September 3 still showed business activity at only 53.3 per cent of normal. The latest official employment figures at this writing are still those for July, which of course show unemployment at the highest point ever recorded in this country—45 per cent of the entire body of factory workers, as that body existed in 1926. It is by no means certain that even a slightly better figure will be shown for August. The price of United States Steel common has doubled since its low point in July, but the activity of its mills has not increased. In the week ended September 5, steel-ingot production, according to the estimates of the Wall Street Journal, was at the appallingly low point of 12 per cent of capacity, compared with 13 per cent in the preceding week, and 86 per cent of theoretic capacity in the corresponding week of 1929.

Mr. Hoover and his satellites are working on the assumption that if a tiny improvement in business can be demonstrated, the steady continuance of that improvement, until "normality" is reached once more, may be taken for granted. Such an inference, of course, would have not the slightest justification. Since the depression began, there has been only one real improvement in the world political situation. That occurred with the drastic reduction at Lausanne of the Allied demands on Germany for reparations, and even that reduction was conditional on action by the United States which the United States has so far shown not the slightest evidence of taking. Mr. Hoover is still hoping to get along without correcting a single one of the world maladjustments, or a single one of the domestic maladjustments, responsible for the crisis. With such a policy, no genuine and lasting recovery is possible.

Orchestras and Public

FOR fourteen years an experiment has been in progress in New York City to determine the popular appeal of fine orchestral music. The experiment has been so successful as to warrant the attention of music lovers everywhere, for it is an affirmative demonstration, more convincing every year, of the power of good music, well-performed, to draw an audience. Moreover, the immediate setting has been an art museum and not a concert hall, and the experiment has been carried on during years which have seen the enormous growth of radio broadcasting of both good and bad music.

The concerts are given annually at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, in New York City. They are eight in number, and they are free. In 1919, 39,000 persons attended; in 1932, the audiences totaled more than 76,000 persons, who stood wedged closely together in the great hall of the building, or huddled together on the shallow stairs, enduring actual discomfort. Of these thousands only a few are drawn from the customary New York audiences. The rest are music lovers who are barred from most concerts by box-office prices, who await only the opportunity to hear fine orchestral music. Every segment of New York's kaleidoscopic pattern of nationalities is represented.

Does all this mean merely that the crowd is drawn together by the opportunity to get something for nothing? As to this, we have the word of the conductor, that public-spirited artist, David Mannes. "The comment has often been made," he says, in speaking of the size of the audiences, "that any free attraction will draw a large crowd. Yet it seems to me that the people who come to the museum concerts give more for the privilege of hearing music than do the audiences of our large concert halls and our opera house. Some of them come at four or five o'clock in the afternoon or send their children to hold places on the wooden benches, camp chairs, or staircase. Those who arrive later in the day stand or sit on the floor, so encumbered with hats and coats and so tightly crowded together that even applauding is often a physical impossibility. I have seen a young mother and father bring their baby in a clothes-basket, place the basket in a corner on the floor, and stand beside it throughout the concert. A day laborer from Paterson, New Jersey, once told me that he has never missed a concert, despite the distance he must travel to and from his home."

Inasmuch as advertising of the concerts is limited almost entirely to placards on the Fifth Avenue buses, the enormous growth of the audience can be attributed only to that surest of all popularizing media—word-of-mouth recommendation. The concerts are, in a sense, an outgrowth of the war. In February, 1918, the trustees of the museum invited soldiers and sailors to the building for several hours of quiet recreation and to hear an orchestra directed by Mr. Mannes. He knew from the experiments of an English friend, who had supplied records to the boys in the trenches, that they preferred the lighter classical music to ragtime and jazz. His programs, therefore, were composed of short, dramatic episodes from the works of Wagner, Brahms, Handel, Verdi, Tchaikovsky, Grieg,—all good music, yet nothing heavy or long enough to make listening an effort.

The success of the 1918 concerts prompted the museum trustees to arrange for a series for the following year—four concerts on Saturday evenings in January and four in March, all to be open to the public and entirely free of charge. Throughout the succeeding years this schedule has been made possible and maintained by the generosity of individual donors such as John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and Clarence H. Mackay, among the museum's trustees, and by a gift from the Juilliard Foundation. As the concerts have become less an experiment and more an established custom, marked changes have occurred in the program. The trend has been away from the light dramatic episodes to programs of great harmonic richness and subtlety. At the early concerts the audience moved about quietly while the orchestra played. In 1932, seventy-six thousand persons stood still and listened with undivided attention to complete symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms. The present audiences are not only willing to give whole-hearted attention to the performance of the music, but are eager to be taught something about it beforehand. Descriptive lectures upon each program, which are given by Thomas Whitney Surette, before each concert, are very well attended.

The audience is self-governed. The listeners will not permit noise or unnecessary movement. Those who happen to come late unquestioningly accept the less favorable places. They have come to hear the music, not to see or be seen. Plainly these concerts, successful though they are, are not the final answer to the problem of providing good music for all who want to hear it, but have not the means. But they are a tremendous stride in the right direction.

Unto Caesar

BISHOP MANNING is not the only priest of the Episcopal Church who knows how to discover sound theological reasons for keeping religion comfortably on the side of those who can pay for stained glass and lawn sleeves. He has, we have just discovered, an able ally in the Reverend Harrison Rockwell of the Little Church Around the Corner in New York City, who has recently protested against the Labor Sunday message sent out by the Federal Council of Churches, and discovers that to denounce an economic order "which has reduced thousands to poverty and attendant suffering" is to prepare a document not to be signed by "the sacred name" of Christ.

Mere laymen like ourselves had always supposed that the New Testament differed from the Old in its greater concern with suffering humanity. Jesus, we thought, was conspicuously novel in his emphasis upon the guilt of the rich and in his scorn for those who thought they could serve God while allowing their brothers to starve at their door. But the Reverend Mr. Rockwell sets us right. It was the prophets of the Old Testament who, according to the report of his sermon provided by the Herald Tribune, indulged in "severe denunciation of the rich and powerful who oppressed the poor." "There is," on the other hand, "a vastly different tone in the New Testament records," and "the sayings of Christ are notably silent as to the denunciation of wealth and power wrongly used." The church, he concludes therefore, should "speak out"—but only in regard to men's souls, for "when it gets off that one great subject and offers opinions on politics, economics, and other matters really beyond its province, the church's influence is weakened."

We are, of course, far from suggesting that the Reverend Mr. Rockwell is in any degree influenced by the convenience of this doctrine. It is certainly one likely to make the pews of his church more comfortable for a considerable number of his congregation to whom talk about souls is more soothing than talk about more material things. But that is, of course, merely a happy accident, and the priest in question doubtless deeply regrets the fact that he can find no satisfactory scriptural authority for the more immediately relevant things he would like to say. "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's" is there in black and white.

Merely as a layman, we would, however, like humbly to suggest that neither that nor certain other related texts need to be interpreted exactly as they usually are. Christ was not talking to Caesar, and it is not certain that he would have used the same words if, by any chance, he had been talking to the rich rather than to the poor. Saint Paul said, "Slaves, obey your masters," but he did not say, "Masters, command your slaves," and the one does not imply the other. If Christ had happened, like certain priests of today, to have an audience composed of rich men and masters instead of poor men and slaves, would he have chosen the texts so popular in the best churches, or would he, perhaps, have chosen something like "Sell all your goods and give to the poor," or even "It is easier for a camel . . ." In any event, we wish that the Reverend Mr. Rockwell would ponder this possibility before he declares too positively what sort of document his Master would or would not sign today.

THE POT AND THE KETTLE

COMMEND me the ways of politicians! Especially of the American breed. I really doubt whether ours can be surpassed anywhere else in the world for deceit and hypocrisy. Thirty-five years of writing on political events in this country have about forced me to the conclusion that to these qualities of the political animal we owe a major part of our troubles. I am moved to express this opinion just now by the article of Calvin Coolidge in the Saturday Evening Post praising Herbert Hoover. There is no greater hardship upon an honest journalist than keeping faith with people who tell you things—when you could render a public service by letting those facts be known. When I read excerpts from that Coolidge article my mind flashed back to a confidence given to me last spring in which I was told exactly what Calvin Coolidge thought of Herbert Hoover, and had just said to a distinguished Republican. But, of course, party loyalty would have compelled that article even if there had not been a big check from Mr. Lorimer in the offing which the irrepressible Will Rogers says covers "the biggest paid advertisement (in favor of any purely commercial product) since Amos and Andy sold themselves down the river to toothpaste." As it is, I do not believe that Mr. Coolidge will be heard from again—unless somebody offers him another big check before election. The Coolidge article will undoubtedly help Mr. Hoover with the unthinking who read it. They will not remember when they peruse it, for example, that this Calvin Coolidge, who asserts that as far back as 1928 he was bewailing the orgy of speculation, is the same Calvin Coolidge who on January 6, 1928, boosted the stock market with the most disgraceful statement ever issued from the White House which was reported as follows:

Commenting on the fact that loans to brokers and dealers made by Federal Reserve banks in New York had reached the unprecedented height of $3,810,023,000, "the President, it was said at the White House today, believes that the increase represents a natural expansion of business in the securities market, and sees nothing unfavorable in it."

* * * * *

BUT if Calvin, to his own pecuniary profit, has helped Mr. Hoover, what are we to think of that eminent statesman from New Hampshire, George H. Moses, chairman of the Republican Senate Campaign Committee? Mr. Hoover must have writhed, indeed, when he read George Moses's bold and confident assertion that there was going to be "a hard fight" and that Mr. Hoover would win with a majority of only twenty-two votes in the Electoral College. This was a stab in the back quite characteristic of Mr. Moses, for from time immemorial it has been the duty of campaign managers of both parties to claim a majority of at least one hundred; anything less than fifty votes is a confession of

The Bipartisan Hypocrisy of Politicians

defeat. But that wasn't all of Mr. Moses's performance.

* A few days later he went on the stump and showed the paucity of Republican ideas by devoting himself to commiserating with Alfred E. Smith for the shameful way he has been treated by Franklin D. Roosevelt. Talk about crocodile tears! Did anyone ever shed more obvious ones? The truth is that there is hardly a single one of the Republican politicians who are now praising Mr. Hoover on the stump who does not cordially dislike or hate the man in the White House.

* * * * *

STILL, Mr. Hoover is not the only one who may well pray to be saved from his friends. To have Bernard Baruch praising Franklin D. Roosevelt as safe and sound and entirely to be trusted by Wall Street men like himself, is certainly hard luck for the Democratic candidate. If a few more magnates like Mr. Baruch certify to his soundness, the Middle West will begin to see that Mr. Roosevelt is not the great reformer, or radical, that he has been sedulously cracked up to be. But even if he were a reformer, what could he accomplish at Washington as long as the party behind him is what it is? It is half imperialist, half Hamiltonian, half Jeffersonian, half militarist, half protectionist, and 90 per cent as selfishly devoted to local advantage as are the Republicans. This is possibly one reason why Mr. Roosevelt is still keeping us in ignorance of where he stands on a lot of subjects. Where does he stand on the debts and reparations? Where does he stand on disarmament? Is he in favor of bringing any pressure to bear on Germany if it proceeds to disregard the Versailles Treaty and to arm? Does he, or does he not, think that that treaty, of which Mr. Wilson was a coauthor, put upon us a moral obligation to disarm at once? Does he favor prompt revision of the tariff?

* * * * *

IF the Republicans really want campaign material the list of speakers issued by the Democratic National Committee surely gives it to them. What a list of has-beens and broken-down politicians! Poor old Josephus Daniels, dragged out of his North Carolina obscurity; Carter Glass, Jim Reed, Governor Harry Moore of New Jersey, and Gene Tunney and not one of the liberal Democrats now in Congress! The list shows how thoroughly the Democratic Party has run down since Wilson's day, how it has failed to produce a single outstanding leader. That is not at all surprising, since the party has no principles and no program. The pot in this case stands exactly where the kettle does. I repeat what I have said before, that only the Socialist Party has a program, and its candidate, Norman Thomas, is just about the only sincere and politically honest, and unselfish and outspoken political leader on the horizon.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

* The third of a series of weekly comments on the election which will appear during the campaign.

A Week in a Soviet Factory

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, August 17

DURING the last ten years, I have visited a large number of Soviet industrial enterprises. You meet the director. You question him for an hour. He leads you through the works for two, three, or four hours. Then a final little interview—and farewell. This usual kind of hasty survey gives one a good deal. But it obviously allows no time for serious investigation. I therefore seized avidly upon an invitation to spend a week at the Red Putilov plant in Leningrad, one of the largest in the country. It employs 34,000 men. It presents in miniature all the problems of Soviet industry, and all the drawbacks and advantages of the Bolshevik factory.

Red Putilov has a treasure which is rare in the Soviet Union: a cadre of trained mechanics. "Why should Leningrad be an industrial city?" I asked Otz, the director of Putilov's. Leningrad has no minerals and no coal or oil of its own. Why should tractors be made at Putilov's when the iron has to be brought from the Urals and the Ukraine, the fuel from places several thousand miles away, and when the product has to be shipped several thousand more miles, back to the Volga, Siberia, and the Ukraine. The answer is simple: "Leningrad has a skilled proletariat."

The shortage of trained mechanics will plague Soviet industry for some time. Just now, millions of peasants, women, and youths are operating expensive complicated machines, and operating them badly. Foreigners often ask why Soviet tractors break down in such large numbers, and content themselves with the easy deduction that the quality of the tractors is deficient. This, however, is a very secondary reason. The tractors are spoiled by inexperienced, quickly taught drivers. The same difficulty exists in every branch of Soviet endeavor. "We have no people," is the most frequent complaint of the Russian office and factory manager. It is much more important, therefore, to locate a manufacturing process where you can find men than where you have metal and fuel.

In view of its skilled working force, the Putilov factory is the laboratory, so to speak, of Soviet metallurgy. When the Bolsheviks first decided to produce tractors, they gave the task to Putilov's. After it had mastered their manufacture, newer plants—Stalingrad, Kharkov, and Cheliabinsk—took over the work, and Putilov's was relieved, only to be faced with other pioneering assignments. Putilov's was the first Soviet plant to make large steam turbines, and now it is planning to turn out an eight-cylinder automobile. Why the U. S. S. R. needs such a car is a mystery to me, and no one in Leningrad could give me a satisfactory explanation. Russia can get along on Fords for a few years. In case of war, of course, the Bolsheviks would be able to use a few thousand good staff machines and a better motor for big tanks. But no anti-Soviet war is imminent. Stalin's fear of foreign invasion in March, 1930, during the disturbances arising out of mismanaged collectivization, reflects the truism that a capitalist state would today venture to attack Russia only if her internal situation became unsatisfactory. That situation will be better served if the millions of dollars that must be spent in America to reequip Putilov's for the eight-cylinder car were applied to other branches which yield goods for popular consumption. Moreover, the manufacture of an eight-cylinder automobile will force Putilov's to stop the production of a very useful and simple rubber-tire hauling tractor possessing greater efficiency than a motor truck—a tractor which gives excellent service on city streets and would be a boon to the over-burdened Soviet transport system. Yet because some one has a freak notion that the country requires a more powerful automobile, the tractor foundry will be closed for eight months and remodeled for a new experiment.

Putilov's likewise produces gold dredges weighing 900 tons and costing about 1,200,000 rubles each, trolleys, combine motors, cotton presses, fifteen-ton railroad cranes, and a host of other items. It is, in fact, an industrial "department store." If the government wants a machine which no other plant can make, Putilov's gets the order. In the midst, therefore, of a planned economy, Putilov's is the worst-planned economic unit imaginable. Much of its machinery stands idle a large part of the time, and the workers, who are paid at piece-rates, suffer. They occasionally complain violently. They protest, too, because their food supply is inadequate. If anybody thinks the Soviet worker is docile he ought to visit Putilov's where the men have not hesitated to strike in order to obtain redress of their grievances.

Yet I have never encountered a more enthusiastic and devoted body of Soviet workers. Despite the shortage of food, clothing, and apartments (the factory has built far too few homes for its men) they remain staunch supporters of the government. The spirit of the Soviet proletariat, and of the majority of the population for that matter, is "dialectic"—to use a word the Russians love (and frequently misuse); it consists of thesis and antithesis. On the one hand, the workers at Putilov's grumble. It is no joke to work for seven hours in a hot dusty foundry on a sizzling summer day, and then wait in a queue in the sun for an hour to buy a box of bad cigarettes. No worker pardons the authorities who are responsible for such a condition. On the other hand, however, the workers stand by their leaders, worry about their factory, try to improve its operation, and glory in its achievements. I spent two evenings at a party conference of the Putilov plant attended by some seven hundred delegates, and now no one can shake my conviction that the plain workingmen, for that is what the majority of party members now are, really identify themselves with the plant and with the government which owns it.

This party conference was a revelation in many ways. At Putilov's one realizes how devoid of real significance is the statement that Communists constitute only 1 or 2 or even 4 per cent of the population of the Soviet Union. The point is that the party has its members when it needs them, in the front ranks of the working class, in the first line of defense. There are 14,000 Communists at Putilov's out of 34,000 workers—41 per cent.

In the converted church which now serves as Putilov's conference hall hangs a photograph of the Putilov party committee in 1927. Not one of its forty members is left at the factory now. The men and women in the picture were between thirty and forty-five years old—the average must have been thirty-eight. Today it is nearer thirty, probably below thirty. Most of the people in the former party committee have moved up a rung or two in the party leadership. Anybody with experience and ability in Russia is immediately advanced to higher positions. The youth comes in to fill the gap. But these younger men, eager and keen though they are, bear a tremendous responsibility, for they dominate the situation at Putilov's, just as their comrades do in every industrial unit throughout the country.

This party committee of young men is the central organization of all the Communists employed at Putilov's. It is the supreme authority at the factory. The Soviet Government takes orders from the Communist Party of the Soviet Union; so, too, Director Otz accepts dictation from the party committee. Otz, to be sure, receives his official appointment and instructions from the Commissariat of Heavy Industries which is a branch of the government. The commissariat expects him to be the commander-in-chief at the plant. But as a Communist, Otz is subordinate to the party committee. There can, of course, be no conflict of general interests or purposes between a Soviet Government and a Communist Party. Yet such a conflict may easily arise at a given factory between the representatives of these two units. Despite all the Bolsheviks' insistence on unified command in factory managements, the director at least shares his authority with the party committee, and frequently he submits completely to its control.

In case of dispute at Putilov's, the appeal goes to the party committee of all Leningrad, but Otz has recourse to his commissariat, the head of which is Ordjenikidze, a member of the Politburo of the party. Ordjenikidze thus combines in his person government and party leadership. In the same way, when the director of a plant is an old, respected Communist, he runs the factory and also the party committee. This is the ultimate solution of the problem of divided command which now makes for much inefficiency and friction in Russian industry, and which must continue until a class of experienced Communist organizers and engineers is developed.

This adverse side of party "control from below," however, is balanced by another very bright aspect. Putilov's has many big and beautiful automatic machines imported from America. On each of these the management has painted a reminder to the man who handles it: "This machine," one reads, "costs 17,400 gold rubles. Take care of it." "Well," the worker might reply, "what difference does it make to me how much the Soviet Government spent?" Yet this is not his reaction. He may spoil that expensive bit of equipment because he knows no better; he lacks training and adequate skill. But his attitude is not cynical. I saw that at the party conference where the workingmen who spoke showed by their manner and words how pained and grieved they were by the shortcomings from which the factory suffers. Outside the conference, too, one encountered innumerable instances of the workers' will to help the management. He swore at it on the platform of the conference; at the same time, he tried by suggestions and in practice to ease and improve the work of the director. "Proletarian inventors" are one of many illustrations. . . .

The fourth day of my sojourn at Red Putilov was the twenty-fourth of the month. It was therefore the "free day" or sabbath. Almost all Soviet institutions now work five days and rest on the sixth. We went out to Strelna by car. Strelna is an inlet of the Gulf of Finland where the Putilov factory has a rest home for its workers, and a boat station. The Inventors' Club of the transport department had arranged a picnic, and I received an invitation. Most of the people came out in Soviet-made Amo trucks belonging to the plant. They were in their "Sunday" best; nice blue, ill-fitting suits on the men, clean blouses on the boys, women in neat prints, all wearing fairly good shoes.

When I arrived, a meeting was in progress. "Meetings," I exclaimed bitterly to my Communist companion. "You meet even on your holidays?" He assured me it would last only forty minutes. It lasted ninety. I sat down on one of the tree-shaded benches that faced the crude platform. Prizes were being distributed. Every department of the factory has an inventors' society which consists not of engineers with training—they have their own organization—but of resourceful semi-skilled workingmen who invent ways of raising output. One man had contrived a simple but clever device to simplify the unloading of coal cars. He was granted a hundred-ruble premium. He looked about fifty years of age, and I take it he never before had been as happy and proud. When he returned to his family's seats they fingered each crisp bill. Comrades walked up and congratulated him. . . . An illiterate woman had operated one machine at Putilov's for thirteen years. Suddenly, it occurred to her that the chief operation could be rationalized so as to save labor. She told the engineer. He applied her idea. She got a sixty-ruble bonus. She made a little speech. "I want now to learn to read and write," she said. "Perhaps I could become an engineer." Russians often behave like naive children. Her naivete was somewhat pathetic. She was past fifty.

The chairman announced that the inventions of their society had saved the factory 120,000 rubles. Loud applause. But they had planned to do more. They must do better next year. He perorated. He closed the meeting. We ran to the salt water. For a ruble, which covers maintenance and repairs, one can borrow a rowboat for the day. Boats bobbed like corks over the waves far into the gulf. Happy people dived from them into the water. Everybody wore a bathing suit: men in brief trunks, women in one-piece suits or in panties and brassieres. The Putilov proletariat was taking its holiday.

Unfortunately, however, every day is not a holiday. Everyday life for the Putilov worker and his family is hard. The mere business of feeding himself consumes an inordinate amount of time and energy. Even then his table is inadequately supplied. The management of the Putilov consumers' cooperative society went to a vast amount of trouble and furnished me with a complete list of all the goods it received and sold between February 1, 1931, and January 1, 1932. Such a tabulation, I think, has never been published anywhere, and is of historic value. In those eleven months, if one takes the average for the 34,000 employees of the factory, each employee received 31.7 kilograms of meat, two kilograms of tea, 67 kilograms of potatoes, 10.9 kilograms of cereal meal, 2.5 kilograms of wheat flour, 330 kilograms of baked bread, 80.4 kilograms of various vegetables, mostly cabbage, 3 kilograms of berries, half a kilogram of nuts, 2.7 kilograms of apples and pears, slightly less than half a kilogram of citrous fruits, just over half a kilogram of poultry, 5.5 kilograms of fresh fish, 13 kilograms of salt-fish and herring, 2.6 kilograms of butter, 1.2 kilograms of margarine, 1.8 kilograms of vegetable oil, 10.7 liters of milk, one-third of a kilogram of cream, one-third of a kilogram of cheese, 71 eggs, a few grams of honey, 19.1 kilograms of sugar, 5.8 kilograms of candy, 6.2 kilograms of cake, one kilogram of jam, 7 kilograms of macaroni, 3.7 kilograms of salt, 1.3 cans of canned fish, 5.1 kilograms of sausage, one can of meat conserves, one-third of a kilogram of smoked meat, 5.6 liters of vodka, one-sixth of a liter of wines, 1.5 liters of beer and cider, 5.1 liters of non-alcoholic beverages, and 3 kilograms of other groceries.

The worker bought these articles from the cooperative at cheap non-inflation prices. It must be remembered, too, that his wife is probably employed in another factory and may have bought an equal amount of food at her store. The Putilov force, moreover, gets at least one low-priced meal a day in the dirty, unappetizing factory restaurants which, however, serve meat irregularly (twice a week, perhaps), exceedingly little fruit, hardly any butter, and few green vegetables. Each working-class family, according to a rough estimate, covers 25 per cent of its kitchen requirements with supplies purchased at high inflation, or "commercial" prices on the free market.

In addition to foodstuffs, the worker at Putilov's bought from his cooperative during these eleven months 600 cigarettes, 2.8 kilograms of matches, 3.6 kilograms of laundry soap, three cakes of toilet soap, three meters of cotton goods, one meter of woollens, one meter of linen, 2.6 meters of silk, 3.4 spools of thread, 0.1 kilograms of cotton padding for warm coat-linings, 1.1 pair of rubber galoshes, 0.8 pair of shoes, 1.5 overcoats (at an average of 100 rubles per coat), 0.5 suits, 0.9 pairs of trousers, 0.7 suits of underwear, 0.7 hats, and 2.3 pair of socks.

The Putilov cooperatives further sold 2,000 rain coats in those eleven months, 3,200 rubles in furs, 10,000 shirts, 300 pairs of drawers, kitchen utensils, books, musical instruments, radios, writing material, toys, 500 clocks, electric lamps, 500 beds, 5,000 chairs, 300 tables, 100 divans, 100 wardrobe closets, perfumes and cosmetics costing 43,519 rubles, sanitary goods costing 14,515 rubles (such objects are purchased in larger quantities at the apothecary's), and other details of little importance.

The entire turnover of the Putilov cooperatives in the eleven months was 13,178,193 rubles. In that same period, taking the average wage of 162 rubles per month, the 34,000 Putilov employees earned 60,580,000 rubles. From these most illuminating figures one understands what has been happening in the U.S.S.R. during the last few years: (1) the workingman cannot buy enough goods; (2) he is left with a great deal of money in his pocket which he cannot spend to advantage. The 1931 "evil" of a low cost of living which created a surplus of unneeded cash in the population's purse has, for the most part, been "cured" by the rise in prices, even in the prices on many cooperative articles. The shortage of goods, however, remains. Indeed, it has grown much worse in recent months. And now the Bolsheviks have adopted a very radical expedient which constitutes a departure in principle as well as in practice. Hitherto, the Putilov cooperatives, and all other Soviet cooperatives, received their stocks from a central government supply organization which acquired them from the peasants and from state factories. The cooperatives merely engaged in distribution. This was the "ration" system. Now, Moscow has decided on decentralization. Each factory must shift for itself. It will still obtain manufactured commodities, bread, sugar, and some other items from cooperative and governmental wholesale agencies, but to an increasing extent it will procure its food, clothing, and house furnishings from its own, independent sources.

Putilov's is making considerable progress along this new line. Efremov, an assistant director of the factory, has been put in charge of workers' supplies. He has already signed several contracts with nearby village collectives to deliver food to him in return for simple tools, pots, horseshoes, et cetera, which Putilov's will make from its scrap iron. He will also sell odd bits of metal and old machines to those kolhozi. He proposes likewise to give raw material to artisan artels which will work for his workingmen. Efremov recently received this offer from a kolhoz: if the factory would supply it with spare tractor parts and give it a store on the territory of the plant, the kolhoz would keep that store filled with food and sell to Putilov's employees.

Apart from what the plant will obtain directly from kolhozi and from central agencies, it will create its own sovhozi or state farms. The factory already has two rabbit farms, one with 475 head, and the other with 3,000 which, according to plan, will grow to 90,000 animals in 1933, a piggery, and a 600-acre vegetable farm. Preparations are now under way for the establishment of a dairy farm to yield milk, butter, and cheese for the factory buffets. Eight thousand of Putilov's workers live outside the city limits where they have little houses surrounded by small gardens. The factory will give each workingman a rabbit for breeding purposes, and will encourage him to plant vegetables.

None of these measures will yield their full effect until next spring. This winter promises to be a difficult season. I do not wish in any wise to minimize the hardships it may bring. And yet, in judging the situation, one must not forget two things: the worker knows that the shortage is a by-product of the progress under the Five-Year Plan; he complains yet understands; he sees that the present crisis carries its solution with it; he hopes that the new May decrees and his factory's self-supply measures will bring relief. It is important to note, in the second place, that Russian standards are low. Everybody objects to a scanty, monotonous diet, yet the Russian is more easily reconciled to it than the American intellectual who observes his life. I visited the homes of some Putilov proletarian families. A workingman had received a fine three-room apartment. He could have kept it for himself. The rent was moderate. But he sub-let one room to one brother and another to a second brother. The second brother, who occupied the room with his wife, later took in his nephew of eighteen as a boarder. I asked him why he did it. "Well," he said, "he had to live somewhere." Now they are all crowded, but they didn't seem to mind it in the least. They did not seem to understand why one and the same room could not serve as dining-room and study by day and as bedroom at night.

Peoples and Wars*

By ROMAIN ROLLAND

Amsterdam, August 27

ON this first day of our assemblage we wish to avoid all controversial speech, to put aside all grievances, and to regret nothing except the errors of those who have tried in advance to emasculate the powerful, just, and healthy tendency of this mass which has risen from the universal populace and has come from all the nations to lay the foundations of a universal confederation against war. In certain quarters this great wave which is rising from the bottom of the ocean of humanity has caused disquiet. Among the governments, those whose interest it is to divide in order to reign have attempted to use the press to poison opinion against our congress. On the other hand, more than one of those department heads who rule the great social parties have taken fright at what seems to them a threat to their administrative routine. They have seen our efforts to construct "a unified front" against war as a sinister machination. Even the term "unified front," through an aberration characteristic of an epoch which has lost the vital urge of the great revolutionary days, has become a scarecrow.

Let us dare to take it up again! And permit a man who, during the war, was disparagingly labeled as "above the battle" to unfurl the great flag inscribed "above all parties; a united front" and to make it float over the threshold of this congress while giving it its true and its loyal meaning!

We have come, under this banner—an army of men and women from all parts of the earth—to proclaim and to impose peace for the world. This army is composed of very different elements. We have, one with another, our doctrines and our tactics belonging to this party or to no party. We shall not discuss them here. Our campaign today has a well-defined end: "War against war!" The uniforms of our confederates are not important. We take nothing into consideration except their frankness, their courage, and their absolute devotion to the great cause which unites us. Those who show themselves the most energetic in the combat, those who are ready for the most ardent sacrifices for the sake of destroying the common enemy—those are the ones, whoever they may be, whom we follow. We reject no one except the cowards, except the pusillanimous sleepers who satisfy themselves with declamations never translated into action or contradicted by action; except, in a word, all those who seek, without confessing it, to find a pretext for not acting at all.

Since the end of the last war the peoples, worn out by the blood-letting of four murderous years, have surrendered their powers into the hands of their tutors. It is necessary that they resume them again and that they remind those who have too readily forgotten, those who speak in their name without taxing the trouble to consult them, that these powers still exist. Our congress is the conscience of the peoples of the world, represented here by their most experienced and most active elements, by those who have felt and who have affirmed the unity of their aspirations and their desire for co-operation against all those who put forth every effort to separate them and to take advantage of them in order to make them destroy one another in the battles of capital or in the bloody games of politics. They are against war and against those who make of war a business—they are against all imperialisms. This awakening of conscience is a call to arms. War against war! May it result in action!

Each one of us, each one of our parties, has its own arms and its own strategy. Let us bring them together! Let us endeavor to coordinate all of sincere determination! In general action there is a place for a great many specific actions, provided only that all of them converge toward the same point. Conscientious objection to military service is a breach in the fortress of that same enemy to which the proletarian armies are going to give pitched battle. Mass combat does not exclude the parallel utilization of individual energies. An army whose battle fronts extend over the whole earth should, while coordinating its general movements, permit to each front the liberty of its own action. The forms of the action may vary in accordance with that which the adversary opposes on each front.

Among the Germans, on the eve of the Hitlerian coup d'état, and among the fascist peoples, it is evident that the dangers are greater. But so much the greater is the merit in raising oneself against the force of obscure nationalistic suggestions, born of misery and of despair, and cynically exploited by the reaction. As for us French, we have above all to control and to bridle, while we await the opportunity to break them, our money and business powers, our great barons of industry, who are the secret or confessed masters of our politics. We must oppose ourselves to their crooked imperialistic endeavor to subjugate Europe with mercenary armies and to exploit the colonial races. The Anglo-Saxons must liquidate the heavy heritage of their conqueror empire which has been accustomed to live on the tributes of its annexed universe. The social crisis takes, and will take, particularly brutal forms in the United States where the European chaos and its antagonisms have found a milieu monstrously favorable to the multiplication of its germs. The double compression of exploited masses and of the soul which suffocates under a sky whose air has never been purified by the free criticism of our Erasmuses and our Voltaires must inevitably lead to an explosion—as must also the awakening of the other great races of the two Americas over which the British and the Yankee imperialisms dispute.

Asia is an immense powder magazine ready to explode. With its own weapons of silence and non-resistance India carries on its invincible struggle for liberation. And at the same time China's gigantic body, torn by imperialists from without and by their accomplices within, stirs heroically and will rise from the sea of its suffering. In the midst of all these combats a single people—more than one people, twenty peoples, a world—has constructed and constructs from day to day the proletarian state: namely, that U. S. S. R. whose very existence constitutes a defiance to the old exploiting world, a hope and an example to all exploited peoples, which it becomes our common duty to preserve against all the threats of the correlated imperialisms. From amidst the melee of these particular combats we should endeavor to disengage the general lines to be followed in a common and coordinated action, and we should not be satisfied to realize in the course of these three or four days of reunion merely an accord of sentiments and ideas—however important and difficult this first result may be. We should not separate before we have initiated a permanent international movement against the risks of that war which is smoldering everywhere under the ashes. This movement should be founded upon a close union between the two great groups of confederated workers: those who are called the intellectuals and those who are called the hand-workers.

* An address prepared for the first session of the World Congress of All Parties Against War at Amsterdam, August 27, 1932.—EDITOR THE NATION.

In my quality of intellectual, I hold it essential to denounce and castigate here the stupid and evil pride which the heads of the great controlling bourgeoisie know only too well even at this hour how to exploit, and which tends to oppose, like castes, the so-called elite and the masses. As if the elite could exist without the masses, as if without them the intellectuals could maintain their existence, as if they were capable, in these conflicts where the fate of humanity is at stake, to carry on the least action without the support of the army of laborers and of workmen which is the lever of all action! Let us say it: Action is the end of thought. All thought which does not look towards action is an abortion and a treachery. If then we are the servants of thought we must be the servants of action. And we should seal here the union of those intellectuals worthy of the name with those who are the very substance of living action: the working people.

The Show Business

III. What It Costs*

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN the last previous article I described the steps through which a play passes before it finally achieves a Broadway first night. Nothing was said of the cost of the various processes and procedures, but in the present article I shall try to give some idea of where the huge sums of money sometimes spent on a production go, and how the profits (if any) are divided. Incidentally, it should be noticed that though the playwright risks his time, the money risks are borne entirely by the producer or his backers and (sometimes) by the theater-owner, who may rent his theater on a speculative basis. Scenery, properties, costumes, et cetera, are paid for, whether or no. Actors, directors, stagehands, and musicians work on a strictly salary basis. Except for the director all these others are, however, hired only from week to week, and of course the actor who gives four weeks free rehearsal and then finds himself in a failure actually gets very little for his time.

When a producer has decided to put on a play upon which he probably previously bought an option at a sum ranging from about two hundred and fifty dollars up, the first of the contractual obligations into which he enters is probably with the author, to whom he agrees to pay a percentage, not of the profits but of the gross receipts. The general nature of the contract is fixed by the Dramatists' Guild, but the exact percentage is left to the individual contracting parties. Shaw, said to be the highest paid dramatist, gets 15 per cent, and Barrie is said to demand 12½ per cent. A more usual arrangement would be, however, for the author to get 5 per cent of the first five thousand gross, 7½ per cent of the next two thousand, and 10 per cent of all receipts above that. A play with any chance of success will probably gross at least ten thousand during the second week, and so 10 per cent may be considered the author's normal share. Of this, however, he will probably pay 10 per cent to his agent.

Probably the producer will not be able to arrange for a theater until the production is about ready to come to New York, but when he does make such an arrangement its conditions are much less firmly fixed and depend upon many things. If there happens to be a shortage of theaters at the moment, he may be kept waiting a long time before he can secure one at all. When he does get it he may be compelled to guarantee the owner four thousand dollars a week, and, unless he is an established man known to be solvent, to post a bond besides. If, on the other hand, many theaters are vacant he may persuade an owner who thinks well of the play's chances to let him have the house on a purely speculative basis.

Just now, when so many houses are not only vacant but in the hands of receivers who are not always familiar with the show business, it would be rash even to guess what a typical arrangement would be, but before the depression hit the show business a typical contract would probably provide—in addition to the possible guaranteed minimum—that the owner should receive 50 per cent of the first five thousand dollars gross, 40 per cent of the next five thousand, and, possibly, a slightly smaller per cent above that. Probably, also, there is a clause providing that if the gross receipts fall below a certain amount either party may terminate his agreement on two weeks' notice. It is evident from this that the producer who has a moderate success in hand will expect to pay to the author and theater-owner about 50 per cent of the gross receipts, and to pay initial production costs and current expenses out of the remaining 50 per cent. From this, again, it is evident that the present level of real-estate prices is one of the largest factors in the enormous cost of a play.

To what do the initial production costs amount? It is impossible to give a satisfactory answer to this question because the costs vary enormously, not only in accordance with the elaborateness of the production, but in accordance with the smoothness with which it has passed through the various stages from script to Broadway. Even in the case of two equally elaborate productions, one may cost many times as much as the other if it so happens that the first has passed quickly along while the second has undergone the process of rewriting, recasting, repeated try-outs, et cetera, and has, besides, perhaps had either to suspend or to play an unprofitable out-of-town engagement while waiting for a suitable theater. Some idea can, however, be given of the prices paid for services and materials and a table of costs can, finally, be given for one or two more or less typical productions.

* The third of a series of articles on The Show Business. The fourth and last, Can Anything be Done About It? will appear next week.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Unless the producer intends to stage the play himself, or unless he has a permanent staff, his first step is probably to engage a director to whom he may pay a flat salary of from three hundred and fifty dollars a week up; pay a flat sum of, say, fifteen hundred or more dollars; or, perhaps, give a small percentage of the gross in addition to other compensation. Next, he will hire a designer to design scenery and costumes for possibly one to five thousand dollars and arrange for the building and painting of the scenery, the purchase of the necessary electrical effects, the transport of the scenery and properties, et cetera. Perhaps not until later will he hire a press representative, but meanwhile actors have been engaged and rehearsals started—possibly in a hall rented for that purpose. When a certain stage in these proceedings has been reached, an out-of-town try-out will probably be in order. Transportation costs, not only for the actors and the scenic equipment, but also for the director, special stage crew, and other assistants, must be paid, and, since the try-out will probably not pay for itself, much of this must be charged to production expenses. Finally, however, and likely enough after extensive changes in various departments, the play is ready to open on Broadway.

In the case of musical comedies and reviews all the percentages would probably be different from those given, and the production costs may run up to several hundred thousand dollars, though the grand total of $134,500 published by Laurence Schwab as the cost of his "Good News" is probably more or less typical. To illustrate more or less typical outlays for spoken drama, two detailed sets of figures may be given. One is quite unusually high, the other rather low.

1. A drama in modern clothes. Nine male and five female characters; four sets; no specially constructed sets. Opened out of town and played one week and one day. Ran twelve and one-half weeks in New York. A convention which does not mean very much classifies as a success any play which runs ten weeks.

	Cost	Per Cent of Total
Scenery
Construction . . . .	$6,500
Painting . . . . .	3,500
	<hr/>
	$10,000.00	32.2
Properties . . . . .	7,500.00	24.2
Lights . . . . .	4,200.00	13.6
Costumes . . . . .	1,431.50	4.6
Rehearsal labor . . . . .	1,000.00	3.3
Hauling . . . . .	500.00	1.6
Railroad . . . . .	530.14	1.7
Director's fees . . . . .	1,500.00	4.8
Decorator's fees . . . . .	500.00	1.6
Miscellaneous . . . . .	3,850.53	12.4
	<hr/>
	$31,012.17	100.0

2. Modern drama in civilian clothes. Produced by Arthur Hopkins. Twelve male and seventeen female characters. Three sets. No specially constructed props. Opened out of town and played one week. Ran four weeks in New York.†

	Cost	Per Cent of Total
Scenery
Construction . . . .	$4,101.07
Painting . . . . .	1,900.00
	<hr/>
	$ 6,001.07	37.2
Props . . . . .	1,456.54	9.0
Lights . . . . .	1,495.10	9.2
Costumes . . . . .	1,742.50	10.8
Rehearsal labor . . . . .	2,601.99	16.1
Rehearsal rental . . . . .	490.63	3.0
Hauling . . . . .	220.75	1.4
Director's fee . . . . .	1,500.00	9.3
To stage manager . . . . .	500.00	3.1
Miscellaneous . . . . .	139.71	.9
	<hr/>
	$16,148.29	100.0
Loss on try-out . . . . .	3,374.90
	<hr/>
Total . . . . .	$19,523.19

Once the opening has occurred, the running expenses are relatively light except for the rent of the theater which, together with the author's royalties, will probably take 50 per cent of the gross. The manager will have to pay his press agent, his extra stage hands (if any), and will have begun to pay his actors at the try-out—provided of course that the rehearsals have not occupied more than four weeks. The sum required for the actors' salaries will depend upon the number of performers and their popularity. Salaries have been considerably reduced since the depression began, and probably fluctuate now more than usual, but formerly a star would receive from eight hundred a week up, leads from four hundred to eight hundred, others from as low as fifty for mere "bits" to as high as four hundred for more important parts. Purely by way of illustration the operating costs for the two plays whose production costs were tabulated above may be given—operating being understood to include authors' royalties but not the percentage of gross paid to the theater-owner. The first of the two plays cited cost $4,110.57 per week to run, of which $3,287.00 was for salaries of actors and stage manager. Yet in spite of the fact that the play ran twelve weeks it averaged only $6,000 a week gross, and since 50 per cent of this went to the theater-owner, the twelve-week run lost $13,882 which, added to the production costs, made a total loss of $44,894. The second play referred to cost $6,022.42 per week to run and lost a total of $26,747.

The chief fact to be noted is that, production costs being as high as they are and running costs being, relatively, as low as they are, the difference between a tremendous loss and a tremendous profit is the difference between a short run and a relatively long one. Since no one can really gauge the potential popularity of a play, this is what the statement that the theatrical business is in reality a gambler's business comes down to.

† Both of these tables as well as most of the other economic data given are drawn from the study made by Alfred Bernheim and Sara Harding referred to in the last article. It was made through the Labor Bureau.

The Political Front

I

Dr. Brinkley of Kansas

By RICHARD HUGHES BAILEY

Emporia, Kansas, August 24

ALL signs in Kansas point to the election this year as governor of Dr. John R. Brinkley, upon whom the Kansas City Star first bestowed the opprobrious name of "goat-gland quack," a title which hundreds of newspapers have repeated since. Who is Dr. Brinkley?

At Milford, Kansas, several years ago, Dr. Brinkley established a hospital where he soon built up a large practice with a gland operation for men. He was "exposed" by a reporter, A. B. MacDonald, in an article which was printed in the Kansas City Star. There followed other articles. His medical education was discussed, and it was alleged that his diploma had come from a diploma mill; his "ethics" were attacked and the merit of his operations questioned. As a result of these articles the Kansas medical board became aroused and Dr. Brinkley's license to practice was taken away from him.

That was two years ago. Dr. Brinkley, incensed, announced his intention of running for governor, apparently on the theory that his election as governor would vindicate his standing as a physician. When those in charge of the State election, good Republicans all, pointed out that it was too late to get his name on the ballot, Dr. Brinkley was not discouraged. He opened a campaign over his radio station at Milford, and for three months urged the electorate of Kansas to write his name in on their ballots. When the votes were counted it was found that 180,000 citizens of Kansas had voted for Dr. John R. Brinkley. His total was only a few thousand votes behind that of Harry H. Woodring, the Democratic candidate who was elected; and Governor Woodring won over his Republican rival by only a few hundred votes.

This year the race will again be three-cornered. Dr. Brinkley announced early in the year that he would make the race a second time. The Democrats renominated Governor Woodring, and the Republicans put up Alfred Landon, an oil man from Independence. This year Dr. Brinkley's name is on the ballot, and he has been waging a strenuous campaign. While he no longer owns the radio station at Milford—he was forced to sell it under pressure from the Federal Radio Commission—he has been speaking over that station daily and over other stations as well. Some of the largest crowds ever gathered in Kansas for political rallies have heard his speeches from the end-gate of his "Ammunition Train No. 1," a big truck garishly painted. Roy Faulkner, "the singing cowboy," is a featured attraction at his open-air talks. He has run big advertisements in the newspapers. He has used, in fact, every electioneering trick except torchlight processions, and those may yet appear.

The "goat-gland quack" of Milford, as even the careful Associated Press calls him, is making a deep impression on the voters of Kansas, though it is hard to see how they can reconcile all of his promises. He has promised "when I am elected" to pave hundreds of miles of roads in every county in Kansas—the newspapers say sarcastically that he will even pave the cowpaths. He has promised free textbooks in the school, artificial lakes in every county created by State money, and scores of other expensive improvements. Yet he winds up every speech with a promise to reduce taxes. Another question which remains unanswered is how he plans to put his grandiose program into effect with an antagonistic legislature. Nevertheless, thousands of persons, anxious for "a change," intend to vote for him.

The Brinkley movement is said to be "all talk" by both Democrats and Republicans, who believe, publicly at least, that Brinkley will not roll up nearly as many votes as he did two years ago. On the other hand, there are many more people who are openly for Brinkley than there were two years ago when no one was quite willing to admit having voted for him. Brinkley stickers, tire-covers, and banners adorn many a Kansas automobile. The farmers seem to be almost solidly behind him, especially in the great wheat-raising belt in the central and western part of the State, where the low price of wheat has turned the farmers against everyone now in office.

Two years ago Dr. Brinkley polled 30,000 more votes than were given to William Allen White, one of the State's best-loved citizens, when he ran for governor in 1924. Mr. White at that time ran in protest against the stand taken by Benjamin Paulen, the Republican candidate, on the issue of the Ku Klux Klan. White was bitterly opposed to the Klan, and although he was not elected governor, the Republicans were so impressed with the size of his vote that they, too, turned against the Klan. Yet Brinkley in 1930 polled more votes than White in 1924. If Brinkley is elected, he will immediately be the target of his enemies. There are indications that the Republicans feel that his election is probable and his im-

Dr. J. R. Brinkley

WILL SPEAK AT

Sodens' Grove

EMPORIA, KANSAS, AT 8 P. M.,

FRIDAY, AUGUST 26TH

Dr. Brinkley will be accompanied by AMMUNITION TRAIN NO. 1, equipped with loud speakers, and Roy Faulkner, the Singing Cow Boy from Radio Stations KFKB and XER, who will entertain. Dr. Brinkley will positively appear in person and the speaking will begin promptly at 8 P. M.

A BRINKLEY HANDBILL

peachment possible—the August primaries were distinguished by the largest list of candidates for lieutenant-governor in the State's history. The lieutenant-governor would replace the governor in case of impeachment.

II

"Ma" Ferguson Wins Again

By HAROLD PREECE

Austin, Texas, September 6

IN Texas, our throats are still hoarse from cheering because "Ma" Ferguson has apparently won, after days of uncertainty, with a majority of more than three thousand votes. We crank up our dilapidated Fords with a bit more verve as we start to town to make our scanty purchases. As we drive down the main street, Bill, the garage man, yells a passing greeting to us. "Howdy, folks. Things are goin' to be different, now that Ma's goin' back to office." The Fergusons, Jim and "Ma," though present in the flesh as the records of their gubernatorial terms graphically attest, are a benevolent myth to thousands of Texas tenant farmers and workers. Jim may have compromised himself with the breweries and the road contractors; "Ma" may have prostituted the pardoning power of the chief executive; but those are minor failings. "They know how to talk with common folks, and there ain't nothin' high-hat about them."

The impeachment and removal of James E. Ferguson from the governor's office in 1917 has proved a boomerang to his political enemies. The ordinary politician, after conviction for gross malfeasance, would have departed into obscurity; Jim simply changed costumes and became a martyr. In every campaign but one since 1914, he has been a candidate for some office. In 1920 he organized his own party and ran for President of the United States, the party evaporating into thin air after the November election. I say that Jim has been a candidate each time. True, the Ferguson banners have been carried by Mrs. Ferguson the last four times, but everybody knows that "Ma" is simply a proxy for her disqualified husband. It has become impossible to hold a primary campaign, based upon a constructive issue, in the State of Texas. Unemployment relief, economy in governmental expenditures, improvement of the sadly deficient public-school system—all these pressing questions are swept aside as we battle over the perennial issue of Fergusonism. Young Texans are growing up under the shadow of a feud as intense as any of the early cattle wars. Because of the Ferguson personal following, numbering over a hundred thousand devoted souls, one of the Fergusons is always one of the two highest candidates in the first Democratic primary. Under the Texas law, if no candidate in a multiple race receives a majority, the two contenders polling the most votes enter a second primary. As in 1930, the gubernatorial race this year resolved itself into a contest between Ross S. Sterling and Miriam A. Ferguson.

The political barometer was unusually favorable to the self-styled champions of the forgotten man. Mortgages have been foreclosed right and left; people hitherto in comfortable circumstances have been reduced almost to the level of paupers; the cost of State government has increased by a third, while tax receipts have declined correspondingly. Viewing the glaring incompetence of Governor Ross S. Sterling during his single term of office, Texas voters forgot the equal incompetence of Mrs. Ferguson during a like tenure of office, and have now exchanged a present evil for a former one.

The ineffectual administration of Mr. Sterling has forever dispelled the fetish of putting successful business men in office. The Governor had been an eminent success in his way as a salesman of oil and gas, emerging from the obscurity of a small-town merchant to the eminence of a millionaire petroleum operator. But a mind conditioned to mere acquisition of property could not, perhaps, be expected to manifest any deep sympathy for the economically submerged. The minor petroleum operators even assert that he took advantage of the depression to convert East Texas into a satrapy of the Humble Oil Company. Martial law was declared in East Texas, ostensibly to enforce the oil-proration laws. But it is an indisputable fact that the troops sent by Governor Sterling, founder of the Humble Oil Company, were commanded by General Jacob Wolters, attorney for the Humble Oil Company. Many lower-ranking officers of the national gubernatorial guardsmen, stationed in the territory, were either connected with the Humble or other major oil companies. Governor Sterling has denied that he has had any connection with the Humble Oil Company since 1925, but in 1930, according to the record of a legislative investigating committee, he received an advance royalty of $400,000 from that concern. The Humble Oil Company is a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. Theoretically, the Standard is outlawed in the State of Texas. But in 1918, Sterling, then president of the Humble, sold 50 per cent of its stock to the Standard interests. The Standard has since increased its holdings to 65 per cent of the Humble stock, while the anti-trust laws of the State have been nullified by the passage of a bill giving foreign corporations the right to vote stock held in Texas concerns.

Sterling's second great error was the advocacy of a three-hundred million dollar bond issue for the building of highways. During the period of prosperity, Texas counties saddled themselves with bonds for every conceivable purpose, and the total indebtedness will probably not be liquidated in a century. The Ferguson Forum made such political capital out of the proposed highway issue that Governor Sterling ignominiously reversed his position on the matter. Adroitly, Ferguson called upon the voters to dismiss Sterling and thereby get "two governors for the price of one," a clever catch-phrase for a people struggling to pay taxes out of reduced incomes. If history repeats itself, the two-for-one combination will prove expensive in the long run, after the fashion of most bargains.

Ferguson, himself, is not averse to feasting with the Pharisees and taking their cash. As an attorney, he has represented corporations almost as imposing as the Humble Oil Company; his connections with the American Book Company and American Road Company, during his wife's term of office, constituted a public scandal. The American Road Company was subsequently outlawed from the State, and forced to return $600,000 excess profit to the State treasury. Simultaneously, Ferguson was drawing a retainer of $20,000 per year from a railroad. Not even his most ardent supporters deny these facts. But as I have intimated, Ferguson is friendly and approachable where Sterling is cold and aloof. The successful demagogue knows how to fool the people and make them like it. Governor Sterling can neither fool them nor make them like it.

To some extent, the Ferguson victory denotes an awakening class-consciousness, since "Ma" was commonly regarded as the candidate of the people against the corporations. I use the term class-consciousness advisedly, but so long as the Ferguson organization serves as a stop-gap, no party with a genuine program of social readjustment is going to make any headway in Texas. The Fergusons have never held office during a period of depression. Will they institute some adequate measures of reform and relief, or will they follow their usual policy of converting the gubernatorial position into a lucrative dispensary of pardons and political favors? The voters of Texas have had an opportunity to become disillusioned with the successful business man. Will this resentment at the established order of things be wreaked in a year or two on the "friends of the people?" The developments of the next two years will afford an answer to these questions. The most significant feature, at present, is the moral bankruptcy of the Democratic Party of Texas. In a State where the Democratic nomination is generally equivalent to election, the members of that party were forced to choose between two persons, both of whom have figured in what may well be termed genuine public scandals.

What Really Happened

By MORRIE RYSKIND

[Editor's Note: The following is an alleged transcript of the notes, taken by an alleged stenographer in alleged shorthand, of an alleged conversation alleged to have taken place at an alleged meeting between two alleged statesmen who shall be nameless. How it came into my hands would make an interesting story in itself, if I could only think of it. Suffice to say that after considerable difficulty—due to the fact that I do not know shorthand—I succeeded in decoding the message, and hereby offer it for what it is worth. No reasonable offer refused.]

The scene is the office of Mr.—let us say—Smith. A secretary announces a Mr.—let us say—Garner.

MR. SMITH

Who?

SECRETARY

Garner. John Nance Garner.

MR. SMITH

Oh, yes. Show him up! Show him up! . . . No, I did that . . . Show him in.

[The Secretary does so, and Mr. Garner enters, his hat in his hand. It is the same hat that was formerly in the ring. He seems embarrassed, and you can hardly blame him.]

MR. GARNER

[a little doubtfully—say about as doubtful as New York State]

Hello.

MR. SMITH

[Believe it or not, he's cordial. I, for one, don't believe it.]

Hello! Glad to see you! How have you been?

MR. GARNER

Pretty good, thanks. And you?

MR. SMITH

Great! Never felt grouchier. What's on your mind?

MR. GARNER

Oh, nothing, nothing.

MR. SMITH

Well, that's progress. Have a cigar?

[Garner takes it—and he certainly can take it. He tries to light it with a lighter given to him by Congress but, like that body, it doesn't work; it just sputters. Smith strikes a match for him.]

MR. GARNER

Thanks. . . . Nice office you have here.

MR. SMITH

Not bad. Of course, it's not the office I had in mind when I made that Chicago trip.

MR. GARNER

I know, but when you come right down to it, there's only one Empire State.

MR. SMITH

Yeah, and it's got forty-seven electoral votes.

[For some reason, this reply disconcerts Garner, and he chokes on the cigar. Smith waits hopefully but, seeing that Garner will recover anyway, pours him a drink.]

MR. GARNER

Thanks. . . . How's business?

MR. SMITH

Great! Subscriptions are rolling in. . . . How are subscriptions with you?

MR. GARNER

Not so good.

MR. SMITH

You could learn something from us. You get our magazine?

MR. GARNER

No.

MR. SMITH

You can't afford to miss it. I'm going to run some swell stuff this year.

MR. GARNER

Gosh, I'd like to, but I don't get time to read much, and I already subscribe to one magazine, Better Babies.

MR. SMITH

Never heard of it. Who's the editor?

MR. GARNER

Mrs.—er—

[He is at a loss, and who isn't these days?]

MR. SMITH

[He's either puzzled or he has a grand poker face. You pays your money and you takes your choice.]

Yes?

MR. GARNER

I'd rather not tell you. You wouldn't want me to be a cad, and bandy a woman's name about?

MR. SMITH

Certainly not. But I still think you ought to subscribe.

MR. GARNER

I don't think I can afford it right now. Later on, maybe, when business picks up—say November.

MR. SMITH

That reminds me. What business are you in now?

MR. GARNER

Why, I'm running for Vice-President.

MR. SMITH

[You never saw a more surprised man in your life.]

No! On what ticket?

MR. GARNER

Democratic.

MR. SMITH

Is that so? Mind if I make a note of that? Might mention it in the magazine. Publicity never hurts.

MR. GARNER

I'm not so sure about that. . . . Tell me, what issue would you run that in?

MR. SMITH

I wouldn't know at this minute. Why don't you subscribe and then you'd be sure to see it?

MR. GARNER

Well, now—

MR. SMITH

Sure!

[To Secretary]

Mrs. Moscovitz! Give Mr. Garner a subscription blank.

[Mrs. Moscovitz does so after a conference with her husband.]

MR. GARNER

[still trying to get out of it]

I really oughtn't do this till I balance my budget.

MR. SMITH

Go on—you're only young once.

[Garner puts his X on the dotted line. Smith looks it over to make sure it's not the double X.]

MR. GARNER

Take a check or do you want cash?

MR. SMITH

Is the check any good?

MR. GARNER

Take my word for it.

[So Garner pays cash.]

MR. SMITH

Thank you very much. Drop in any time.

MR. GARNER

I'll do that. Call me up some time.

MR. SMITH

I did once, but they said you were out.

MR. GARNER

No!

MR. SMITH

I know—but that's what they told me.

MR. GARNER

Well, better luck next time.

MR. SMITH

Same to you. Well, glad to have seen you. Another cigar before you go?

[As Garner reaches for the second cigar, the one he is puffing explodes and blows him right out of the building. Mr. Smith takes the departure very philosophically. Then he has an idea.]

MR. SMITH

[to himself]

SAY! I wonder if McAdoo smokes!

CURTAIN

In the Driftway

FISHING, like every other form of the good life, has been thoroughly exploited by politicians, sportsmen, and various other people with ulterior motives. In the movies there is a continuous succession of business-like men, in speed-boats elaborately equipped, dragging giant tunny or dangerous swordfish out of the ocean; or of pudgy puzzled politicians trying to pass themselves off as honest fishermen. Not long ago the Drifter saw a film in which a professor of fishing in one of our universities (believe it or not) was shown demonstrating his skill. As a result, the true nature of fishing is in danger of being overlooked, especially by the younger generation. It is in the interest of the youngsters particularly that the Drifter would like to point out what every true fisherman knows: that catching a fish does not constitute fishing; that fishing is neither a profession nor a sport. It is, rather, a state of mind, an attitude toward life, which can best be cultivated beside a quiet stream of a sunny afternoon.

* * * * *

YOUR authentic fisherman is not the sportily dressed, energetic extrovert who wades in hip boots in a rushing stream and keeps his line curling through the air in the constant and strenuous casting of fly-fishing. He is, instead, the unambitious man in old clothes with simple pole and line who sits on the bank of a deep pool for hours at a stretch in a silence that is broken only by the occasional splash of a sleek muskrat going about his business or the soft plop of a fish which may or may not be caught. The fisherman is an introvert, but not a neurotic. His mind is like his pool, tranquil, full of lights and shadows and muted reflections. What non-fishermen contemptuously call his patience is not patience at all but a profound absorption in water and light and swift-swimming fish under the surface. The Drifter knows of no silence so intense as that which surrounds a fisherman at his calling. Approach him, and he looks up out of a startling depth, whether he is fishing a lonely stream in the mountains or the populous Seine in the middle of Paris. It is along the Paris Seine, in fact, that the perfect fisherman is probably to be found. The Drifter has never seen a Seine fisherman catch a fish. He has never heard of anyone who ever saw one caught. Obviously the men who fish there fish for fishing's sake, which is the true test. For them, fishing has become in fact a way of life.

* * * * *

THE Drifter speaks knowingly of fishing because he once fancied it as a career for himself. For weeks, one summer, he sat as an apprentice on quiet banks with a veteran fisherman. He felt the fascination of water and light and fish and of the silence which is so profound that the catching of one trout is a dramatic and disturbing event that often makes it necessary to move to another, quieter pool. But the Drifter's trouble was an insatiable curiosity to investigate the country beyond the other bank of the stream—a sure indication that he was not at heart a fisherman but a drifter.

MARCEL Proust, in his "Remembrance of Things Past," describes the course of a walk he took regularly with his parents in Combray, along the river Vivonne. On the way they passed a hazelnut tree "under which a fisherman in a straw hat had taken root."

At Combray [writes Proust] where I knew what individuality of blacksmith or grocer's boy was hidden under the uniform of the church guard or the surplice of the choir boy, this fisherman was the only person whose identity I never discovered.

M. Proust would probably have found that the fisherman under his straw hat was a fisherman and nothing else. He is never anything else if he can help it. For fishermen are, above all, contented. A President often fancies himself as a fisherman. But the Drifter has never met a fisherman who cared about being President.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Elect Them Both

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your own political comment and the articles of Paul Y. Anderson are realistic and honest; but Sherwood Anderson's suggestion that we elect both Hoover and Roosevelt as copresidents is the stroke of genius.

Many reasons come to mind why this would be the best possible solution of the impending election. First, it will please from 95 to 98 per cent of the electorate. Second, it will enable us to compare Democrats and Republicans under approximately similar conditions. And finally, in this year of all years, when we so need to economize, we can dispense with the election altogether, and let the consuls begin functioning at once.

Galesburg, Ill., August 31

SAMUEL M. BERG

Max Nomad Interprets Himself

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is remarkable how some people manage to read into a text interpretations which are the very opposite of what the author intends to convey. Thus H. Kendall, according to his letter in your issue of August 31 found that "almost every page" of my "Rebels and Renegades" "carries ridicule of the radical proletariat and its ultimate aspirations," while in fact my attacks were directed solely against the ingenious devices used for taming and deceiving the laboring masses. Moreover, that same reader thought it necessary to "defend" the originality of my point of view against V. F. Calverton who, in Mr. Kendall's opinion, unjustly denied me the deserved credit. Now, whatever sins Mr. Calverton may have committed in reviewing my book, he certainly made no mistake in attributing its philosophy to my late friend, Wacław Machajski. Mr. Kendall's conception—which I am supposed to share—involves the perpetuation of the rule of "brains" over "brawn" as a "biological" matter, so to speak. Machajski's fundamental idea was that while the various schools of socialist thought have, consciously or unconsciously, shaped their policies for the purpose of establishing and maintaining the rule of the intelligentsia as an economically privileged class, the revolutionary economic struggle of the manual workers, aiming at the equalization of incomes, will eventually do away with the intelligentsia as an economic category, by making higher education accessible to all alike, thus removing the division of the human race into educated masters and ignorant robots. In the last two pages of my final chapter the reader will find that there is a complete identity of my conclusions with Machajski's opinions which I presented in my chapter on Trotzky.

Mr. Kendall, like so many other defenders of an intellectual aristocracy after Plato's model, seems to think that higher education can be acquired only by biologically superior minds, and that such superiority is hereditary. A refutation of this long-exploded fallacy which is only a modernized version of the "divine-right" theory, was not within the scope of my book.

New York City, September 1

MAX NOMAD

The Baltimore Sun and Mr. Pearson

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

SIR: I note with regret your comment on the Baltimore Sun and the dismissal of Drew Pearson, and believe that you would not have written as you did had you been fully conversant with the Sun's side of the case, instead of basing your comment on the somewhat misleading press reports. As a friend both of Mr. Pearson and the Baltimore Sun, may I say that the case is not one which is just a matter of black and white, and that, in the eyes of the Sun, Mr. Pearson's relation to the new volume of "Washington Merry-Go-Round" is but one phase of the situation. It appears, also, that it was not Mr. Pearson's connection with the book, as such, that caused the trouble, but his handling of certain personalities therein. That it would, perhaps, have been wiser for the Sun to have been more patient if only in order to avoid being misunderstood, is probably true. It is my belief, however, that the Baltimore Sun has not yielded either in its liberalism, or its readiness to allow liberty of action to its staff representatives.

New York, September 9

JUSTICE

[The editors of The Nation would greatly regret doing any injustice whatever to the Baltimore Sun for which they continue to have a very high regard, and are therefore happy to print the above letter.]

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, is the author of "Machines and Men in Russia."

ROMAIN ROLLAND, famous French author, is an outstanding exponent of pacifism.

RICHARD HUGHES BAILEY is on the staff of the Emporia Gazette.

MORRIE RYSKIND is coauthor with George S. Kaufman of the Pulitzer prize play, "Of Thee I Sing."

LEONORA SPEYER is the author of "Naked Heel" and other books of verse.

H. L. MENCKEN is editor of the American Mercury and a contributing editor of The Nation.

WILLIAM MAC DONALD contributes historical and political reviews to The Nation and other periodicals.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, formerly managing editor of The Nation, is professor of economics at Wellesley College.

ROBERT CANTWELL is author of "Laugh and Lie Down."

A First Novel of Literary Importance

By PAUL GREEN

Pulitzer Prize Playwright

Author of "In Abraham's Bosom," etc.

THE LAUGHING PIONEER

A STIRRING novel of the New South which tells of young Danny Lawton, a penniless poor white, who laughs and sings his way into the mansion of Judge Long, and into the heart of the Judge's aristocratic daughter. Humor and pathos mingle in this clash, and a tense emotional drama emerges from the conflict. In The Laughing Pioneer Paul Green has written a remarkable first novel with the true stamp of genius.

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & CO.
$2.00 New York

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

Another Language. Booth Theater. Relatives at their worst realistically and hilariously described in one of the very few plays to survive the summer.

Ballyhoo of 1932. 44th Street Theater. A better than average musical review with some good tunes. (H. H.)

Best Years. Bijou Theater. A competently written but none too original drama about a selfish mother and a self-sacrificing daughter.

Bridal Wise. Cort Theater. Very light but funny comedy concerned with love and horses. With Madge Kennedy.

Counsellor-at-Law. Plymouth Theater. Resumed run of Elmer Rice's racy account of a self-made lawyer.

Here Today. Ethel Barrymore Theater. The most talked about of the new comedies. Reviewed in this issue.

Of Thee I Sing. Music Box Theater. The one inescapable "must" now on exhibition. Politics done up brown in the Ryskind-Kaufman-Gershwin Pulitzer prize winner.

Show Boat. Ziegfeld Theater. Revival of one of the most successful musical shows of recent years.

Smiling Faces. Shubert Theater. An uninspired musical show starring the Stones. Some good dancing. (H. H.)

The Cat and the Fiddle. Cohan Theater. A tuneful operetta held over from last season.

Books and Drama

High City

By LEONORA SPEYER

*The mountains look on Marathon,
And Marathon looks on the sea.*

All day the singing in my ear,
The lordly words, all day the face
Of him who loved this Broken Place—
Imperious face, full, scornful eye—
And where the splintered marbles lie,
And where the capital still heaves
Its stone acanthus toward the sky,
Unfolding lush those carven leaves,
He limps, he leaps the tumbled stair,
Up to the gods no longer there.

This is the hill he made his hill,
By right of song and by love's right,
That English town that scattered him
Grew unimportant overnight—
Save when he sang of it, and then Nightingales screamed, to scorch and spill
Sweet lava on its roofs again,
And London ran and women ran
To read his words—and read them still.

The mountains look on Marathon!
The mountains . . .

where the light snow lies

Sifted along this Grecian south,
Beneath these too-blue Grecian skies—
And cold; and bare; no grappling root Climbs as he climbed (mis-shapen foot
He called his little hoof), proud mouth
So cruel-curved, yet tender grown
For each high, adamant stone, for this
The City that he made his own:
Acropolis . . . Acropolis . . .

All day the voice—Byronic sound
Where no sound is, unless this Pile
Cluttered along the god-like ground
Be sound indeed. All day the smile
That London loved a little while,
A sister over-loved, and she
The weeping wife whose narrow heart
Was like these stones—without their art—
Broken as they, its stilted gods
Scattered as theirs—a crumb of clay!

In Athen's street his image stands,
And pale as life, the bold head bent,
His lofty brow and insolent
Receives its laurel from the hands
Of the Muse leaning . . .

London town

Still hoards its sooty towers and walls,

Looks down its nose—the smug, the long—
But here where Marathon looks down,
Through year that crumbles into year,
Echoes a step that is his step,
Resounds his opulent, aching song;
Beneath Erechtheum's porticos,
Intent and tall, the Maidens peer,
Dreaming he comes and goes.

"There will be many write of me—"
(Defiant boast and prophecy),
What need to write?

Acropolis

Looks down from its bleak precipice,
And mountains looks, and Marathon,
Forever on the sea.

Spanish Katzenjammer

The Revolt of the Masses. By José Ortega y Gasset. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.

THE anonymous translator of this work says that "in the Spanish histories of the future Don José Ortega y Gasset will probably be spoken of as one of the Fathers of the Republic." If so, then the definition of republic will have to be changed, at all events in Spain. For what Professor Ortega denounces most violently in his book is precisely the idea upon which the whole science and art of republicanism has always been based, to wit, the idea that there is some mystical virtue, and what is more, some mystical wisdom, in men in the mass—that what everyone believes is somehow likely to be true. Upon this doctrine he flings himself with great enthusiasm, and, save at moments when he loses the thread of his discourse and argues against himself, with considerable effect.

The liberation of the masses, he believes, has done Europe a lot of harm. It has upset the old scale of values, especially in the field of government, and substituted a kind of moony indifference, grounded upon simple and even childish desires. The mob is impatient of all ideas, and hence refuses to consider and discuss them. The one thing it esteems is a comfortable conformity, and that conformity is naturally pitched upon a low level. Moreover, it is quite irrational, for there is no coherent concept behind it, but only a yearning to be "undifferentiated from other men," to pass unmarked and unmolested in a vague crowd. Thus mere quantity is substituted for quality, and all the high aspirations and enterprises of superior men sink into desuetude.

Señor Ortega's thesis is here clear enough, but it cannot be said that he maintains it with unfailing consistency. It is hard to follow an argument which begins with an eloquent plea for aristocracy (page 22), and ends with the conclusion that "liberal democracy based on technical knowledge is the highest type of public life hitherto known" (page 56). Nor is it easy to agree, on the one hand, that the stupidities of the mob now engulf and smother homo sapiens, and on the other hand that his "vital tone," which "consists in his feeling himself possessed of greater potentiality than ever before," is now at its historic maximum.

But such confusions, of course, are apt to occur in a book which covers so wide a field, especially if it comes from the studio of a metaphysician. When Señor Ortega turns into by-paths he often writes with great clarity, and is pleasantly persuasive. In one of his later chapters, for example, he has an excellent short treatise on the nature of the state, along with a hearty denunciation of the current tendency to regard it as a stupendous Peruna bottle, with a cure in it for every ill. And he pleads with fine eloquence for some of the standards that democracy has tended to destroy. From his main contention few will dissent—that it is bad government which particularly afflicts the world, and especially Europe, today. But most readers will regret that he did not state it more simply, and argue for it with a more concentrated assiduity.

Señor Ortega is professor of metaphysics at the University of Madrid, and a busy controversialist. He edits a review and has printed a number of books, but this one, I believe, is the first to be done into English. The translation is very smooth.

H. L. MENCKEN

Inquiry into Life

The Sheltered Life. By Ellen Glasgow. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

WHATEVER her place among them, Ellen Glasgow writes in the style of the best novelists. She belongs in the great tradition, and the difference between her and the rawer, bolder, keener spirits who are concerned with the contemporary scene is that they believe they know what life should be, and Miss Glasgow is merely trying to find out what it is.

That is what makes of "The Sheltered Life," which is the story of yesterday in the South, something more than another "Age of Innocence." Ending her tale with the first reverberations of the World War in August, 1914, Miss Glasgow has placed it in time far beyond wars or the insecurity of governments. She has described a lost world, the world of sheltered women and sheltering, if unfaithful, men; her Queenborough which may be only another name for the Richmond she knows so well, is as remote as the moon from the Europe of 1914-18, and the world of 1932. Her Mrs. Birdsong, whose whole career was to be a beauty, may exist no more. A set of manners which would make a man ask a woman to marry him simply because he had inadvertently spent half the night with her in a broken-down sleigh, although neither loved the other, and which would make her accept him and live with him as his wife for thirty years, may have vanished. But if this code of behavior is no longer observed, Miss Glasgow is by no means dependent on its existence for the wisdom and penetration of her observations about men and women. She holds this vanishing day in her hands and turns it around as carefully as if it were a ball of glass in which she could see the human heart. Who were these people, she asks? What did they think when they acted as they did? Out of what clay did they spring, and in what mold may they, with their inheritance and their traditions, eventually be cast?

This particular form of inquiry would, I believe, lift Miss Glasgow above the run of her contemporaries, even if she were not also gifted with wit and irony and with the ability to tell a well-ordered and moving story. Those furious young Don Quixotes who find in Willa Cather, for example, merely gentle piety about a lost age, would, if they were as honest as they are brave, be compelled to acknowledge more substance in Miss Glasgow. She it is who can say: "For one confirmed habit had not changed with the ages. Mankind was still calling human nature a system and trying vainly to put something else in its place." Or: "To be sure, as Jenny Blair was too apt to retort, we were living in the twentieth century, and ideas were modern. Modern, yes, but there had been modern ideas in every age, not excepting the long ages that were probably arboreal." Or: "First love is simply between two persons, you and your lover, and it changes as everything must that exists merely between two human beings. But last love has courage in it also; it has courage and finality, and facing the end and all the emptiness that is life." Courage to face the emptiness of life is a quality that only years can bring. The young scorn it, probably rightly. The old cannot explain or define it, nor do they always own it; but I should imagine that when they met this particular courage they would salute it with the highest honors.

It remains only to say that the men and women in "The Sheltered Life" are warm and living. Mrs. Birdsong, of the radiant eyes and the queenly carriage, who could finally not endure having been an ideal for forty years; George, her husband, who loved her, who knew he was not worthy of her little finger, and who was not able, therefore, to be faithful to her; General Archbald, who after eighty years had discovered that happiness was to be free from the tyranny of chance, to be released from wanting; Jenny Blair, a child, a young woman, whom the sheltered life did not quite cover, and yet who remained in it for first love which would be restrained neither for loyalty nor kindness—these and the other persons in her book Miss Glasgow has drawn fully and credibly. In creating them, she has contributed something to human experience, merely by saying, dispassionately and completely, what their experience was. That perhaps is all that should be asked of a novelist. And while novelists remain who can do it, to whatever degree, we need not be concerned about the future of this particular form of literary endeavor.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Senator Beveridge

Beveridge and the Progressive Era. By Claude G. Bowers. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

ONE does not often find so admirable a piece of political biography as Mr. Bowers has given us in his life of Beveridge. The high quality of the work is the more notable because Mr. Bowers himself is far from sympathetic with some of the things for which Beveridge stood, but while he does not wholly conceal his own divergence, he holds a steady hand in controversial matters and refrains from pressing criticism where it would be essentially partisan. Only an elaborate review could take account of all the new light which he has drawn from the voluminous Beveridge manuscripts and other sources, and it must suffice to say here that he has swept the field with thoroughness and scrupulous care and utilized his material without being at any time inundated by it.

The outstanding characteristics of Beveridge were his oratorical brilliance, his passionate devotion to the causes he took up, and his prodigious capacity for work. It was as an orator that he made his way into public life and widened his political fame, and his speeches, whether in the Senate, or at party conventions, or on his whirlwind campaign tours, are memorable examples of the gorgeous rhetoric and effective manner which move audiences to enthusiasm even though they fail to convert. His oratorical gift, joined to unusual powers of observation, was reflected in the long succession of magazine articles in which he discussed current political issues, and notably in the remarkable series of articles, viewed with suspicion by editors and branded as pro-German by a deluded and distracted public, in which he described what he saw and heard behind the lines in Europe in the winter of 1914-15. He dug deeply into the political questions which he discussed in the Senate, and once his interest was aroused he went into the fight with his whole heart.

The climax of his career came with the Progressive movement. Mr. Bowers has not undertaken to write a history of that episode, although his account of Beveridge's connection with it inevitably includes a good deal of general narrative and comment. Seen in the perspective in which Mr. Bowers places it, much of Beveridge's public life seems to have been a preparation for the Progressive role which he played. Distrustful of Jefferson and an admirer of Hamilton, he went over without reserve to imperialism in the war with Spain, hurried off to the Philippines to study the problem there, longed to see Cuba a part of the United States, and sneered at the evidence of Philippine outrages by American army officers and men. He fought the Payne-Aldrich tariff and locked horns with the Old Guard over the admission of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma. Then, with suspicions that all was not holy with big business, he led the demand for an investigation of the packing industry, and called for tariff revision with the condition that it should be the work of the tariff's friends.

His devotion to the Progressive movement was due only in part, although in considerable part, to his liking for Roosevelt. "For the moment," as Mr. Bowers points out, "he had utterly lost faith in the Republican Party," but he also realized that a new party must rest upon principles and not upon devotion to a leader. As long as there was hope of achieving "a vital program of political and social reforms" he labored arduously for the cause, but when the movement, defeated at the polls, foundered on the rock of Roosevelt's ambition, he returned sadly to the Republican fold. He had already lost his seat in the Senate, and his political career was practically at an end. It is hard to resist the impression that, as far as progressivism was concerned, he was an opportunist, anxious for reforms and willing to take a chance, but careful not to break completely with his Republican past.

There is a good deal besides politics in Mr. Bowers's book, and the accounts of Beveridge's travels, his wide friendships, and his personal traits and habits are well done. A series of sketches of Aldrich, La Follette, Dolliver, Cummins, and Bristow are models of literary portraiture. One would gladly have had more about the preparation of the monumental life of John Marshall and the unfinished life of Lincoln, for it is through these works that Beveridge's memory is most certain to be honored.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Prices Versus Planning

Recovery. The Second Effort. By Sir Arthur Salter. The Century Company. $3.

The World's Economic Crisis and the Way of Escape. By Sir Arthur Salter, Sir Josiah Stamp, J. Maynard Keynes, Sir Basil Blackett, Henry Clay, and Sir W. H. Beveridge. Halley Stewart Lectures, 1931. The Century Company. $1.75.

The Financial Aftermath of War. By Sir Josiah Stamp. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

Economic Stabilization in an Unbalanced World. By Alvin Harvey Hansen. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

SOME of the soundest and most realistic economic work in the world today is being done in Great Britain. It is not simply that the British economists are well trained, though there is no finer tradition than that in which they are brought up. But by the very necessities of their insular, yet imperial, position, the British people stand face to face with the hard realities of an economic situation that imperiously demands intelligent cooperative action on a world-wide scale. It is that situation which gives bite to the best of present-day British economic writing. Just as the problems and perplexities of the post-Napoleonic era gave rise to the intensely practical speculations of the much-misunderstood classicists, so the staggering difficulties of today are bringing about the creation of a literature some parts of which the student in future may well rate as high as the intelligent critic today places the work of Ricardo and his successors.

In that literature Sir Arthur Salter's "Recovery" is bound to take high rank, not for any keenness and originality of theoretical analysis, though it is marked by understanding of the possibilities as well as the limitations of economic theorizing, but for a masterly presentation of the immense body of facts, both economic and political, relevant to the crisis, and for the sanity, sobriety, and balance with which the author judges the significance of those facts. Unwilling to attempt to express the whole of the present infinitely complex situation in terms of any one convenient formula, Sir Arthur undertakes, with marked success, to analyze it into the various elements, agricultural, industrial, financial, political, and psychological, that make it up, and, with less success, in my judgment, to indicate the way out. He points out the disappearance of the old automatic adjustment of production to wants through free competition, and the necessity of finding a new way in which "competition and individual enterprise on the one hand, and regulation and general planning on the other, will be so adjusted that the abuses of each will be avoided and the benefits of each retained." The hardened critic is likely to look with skepticism on this attempt to mix oil and water, an attempt at present so characteristic of sacred business men and politicians clinging to a job—in neither of which categories do I mean to place Sir Arthur. But the critic should remember that great numbers of sensible and practical men agree with him in thinking it possible to construct out of our present society "such a framework of law, customs, institutions, and planned guidance and direction, that the thrust of individual effort and ambition can operate only to the general advantage." After all, men have muddled through much; maybe muddleheadedness is not altogether without its advantages in a world, like this one, not wholly clear and logical in its arrangements and development.

Among all the post-war books, "Recovery" is unique in the comprehensiveness with which it deals with all the outstanding problems of the present inextricably tangled situation—money and currency, banking, credit, and foreign loans, "reparations" (dead and damned), war debts (moribund and accursed), tariffs (mischief-makers par excellence), cartels and industrial organization (with unemployment of course looming large), armaments, alliances, League Covenant and Kellogg Pact. All are handled with eminent common sense and with the rare fulness of knowledge that befits the author's former position at Geneva. Sir Arthur believes that the path to security and reduction of armaments lies at present only through the strengthening of the League and the Kellogg Pact; he says frankly that in building up the peace machinery and establishing confidence in it, European activity is undermined by complete uncertainty as to what America would do in case of threatened war. His sober and moderate words offer Americans much food for reflection. His common-sense suggestions as to what we might actually do within the limits set by American tradition and the present state of public opinion raise the question whether the mind and heart of America are yet ready for the world cooperation necessary to anything better than what we have, just as his demands on Europe make one wonder whether the radical changes that he shows to be essential can in fact be worked out by governments dominated by economic interests intent on getting everything possible for themselves. Some of us believe that we are involved in a fatal contradiction.

There seems to be little reason, aside from the natural desire of the publishers to cash in on the success of the Salter book, for American publication of the Halley Stewart lectures, even though the lectures were good ones, containing many interesting suggestions. The distinguished authors naturally could say nothing specially important within the limits of a single lecture. I venture to say that the most important point in the whole course, at a time when politicians, business men, and even economists are talking glibly about economic planning without having thought the thing through, was that made by Sir William Beveridge: "There is here, I believe, an inescapable, fatal danger—the danger of mixing control and freedom. We have to decide either to let production be guided by the free play of prices or to plan it socialistically from beginning to end." Sir William votes for "seeking a way out of the world's crisis within the framework of the capitalistic system, by suppressing, through international cooperation, the anarchy of purchasing power . . . and keeping and increasing the liberty of production and exchange." Even those who disagree with this judgment should be grateful to him for pointing out that we here face a genuine alternative, instead of joining the ranks of those tender-minded reformers who would persuade us that we can eat our cake and have it too. Henry Clay's analysis of the industrial causes of the crisis, as opposed to the financial explanations commonly current, is a highly interesting and useful bit of theorizing. Sir Josiah Stamp's "Financial Aftermath of War" is the required publication of a series of popular lectures delivered at Aberystwyth in 1930. They make no pretense at profundity, but constitute a clear and simple explanation, after the fact, of some of the abominable industrial results of war finance.

Professor Hansen's book, which he and his publishers have damned with an impossible though accurately descriptive title, is a legitimate occasion of pride to every person interested in American scholarship. No more solid and important work in economic theory has appeared in any country since the war. It embodies an almost incredible amount of the most diverse factual material, all ordered and arranged in such a way as to illuminate and not obscure the author's theoretical argument, which has the rare merit of being at once clear, consistent, and reasonable. It is no book for babes and sucklings, and it will not be a best-seller, like Sir Arthur Salter's; but it will have to be taken into account by every future writer who pretends to deal seriously with this crisis and with the avoidance of future crises. It is divided into four parts, dealing successively with international causes of instability, world-wide unemployment, population stabilization, and a program of increased stabilization under capitalism.

Professor Hansen is an uncompromising but intelligent advocate of the price system; that is, he favors the direction of production and distribution by individual choice acting through the medium of prices, rather than the creation of a "planned" economy. He is too clear a thinker to imagine that we can have both at once. He shows clearly how the increasing measure of social control (as, for example, our control of railroad rates) has interfered with the "normal" operation of the price system, automatically adjusting production and consumption. Recognizing the huge waste involved in economic instability and the enormous social cost of unemployment as we know it under our system, he does not go into a panic about it, as most contemporary writers do. Instead, he weighs soberly the advantages and disadvantages of what we have, and the probable gains and losses of the alternative system of control, so far as it is possible to judge them on theoretical grounds and to check the results by Russian experience up to this point. This is theoretical work of a high order, and Professor Hansen demonstrates anew the incomparable value of theoretical economic analysis as a practical tool in the hands of one who knows how to use it. One need not agree with all his conclusions in order to admire the intelligence with which his work is directed and the skill with which it is done.

Without going into details, it is enough to say that Professor Hansen, while recognizing the desirability of a larger measure of stabilization, and indeed its necessity if capitalism is to survive, is squarely of the opinion that entire stability, if it could indeed be attained, would be purchased at too great a cost. He therefore favors the effort to stabilize consumption by the use of unemployment insurance and other devices of social control, without any attempt to secure entire stability of production, which he rightly holds to be impossible under a free market, whether capitalistic or socialistic. The conflict between freedom as we know it on the one hand, and regularity and order with consequent security on the other, is one that goes to the very heart of the problem of organized society. Just at the moment the desire for security is so completely dominant that most men are in a mood to sacrifice almost everything else, if necessary, in the hope of obtaining it. At such times it is particularly important to have at least a few clear-headed thinkers like Professor Hansen, capable of pointing out the probable gains and losses involved in various proposed courses of action; for the choices before us concern not only bread and shoes and automobiles, but the unquenchable desires of the human spirit.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Distinguished Tedium

The Burning Bush. By Sigrid Undset. Translated by Arthur G. Chater. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

CONSIDERED with "The Wild Orchid," to which it is the sequel, "The Burning Bush" must take an honored place among the world's most tedious works of fiction. Specifically, these two volumes are made up of approximately three hundred and fifty thousand words conveying information about the life of Paul Selmer, a Catholic, the son of well-to-do, liberal, divorced parents. The episodes the author selects from Paul's career for particular emphasis are his unhappy love affair with a girl of the lower classes, his religious conversion, his unhappy marriage, and the complicated troubles resulting from innocent meetings with his former mistress.

The two books are also conscious propaganda for the Catholic faith. In comparison with their other departments, the propaganda is the best part of them; that is, the propaganda for Catholicism is much more interesting and much more intelligently conveyed than the propaganda against so many other things—against liberalism, the Protestants, against communism, divorce, spiritualism. Sigrid Undset has one major objection, apparently, to everything in life which is not Catholic; her reason for objecting, by a beautiful logic, is that these things are not Catholic, and consequently they are works of the devil. She is militant; she is direct; she is willing to make her position on these matters clear if she has to repeat it on every page for eight hundred and seventy-eight pages. And so she does.

There is another little twist to the propaganda which enlivens the last two hundred thousand words—enlivens it provided you are interested in studying the ways in which propaganda is or is not effective. It is all, evidently, propaganda for the lesser evil. Paul doesn't experience any overwhelming ecstasy after his conversion. On the contrary, in "The Wild Orchid," before his conversion, he is shown as being made miserable by relatively minor unhappinesses in his life; he experiences great emotional distress and mental confusion from small sources of worry. In "The Burning Bush," after he has become a Catholic, and has what is for him a satisfactory way of judging his experiences, he undergoes greater trials without experiencing the same confusion. Prior to his conversion small doubts about his career, about his sweetheart's former lovers, about his divorced parents' relationship, are shown as having a great effect upon him, while afterwards he carries on in spite of the following difficulties: an unfaithful wife who is also completely brainless and extravagant, and who leaves him to return when she is with child (which turns out to be an idiot) by another man; shame visited upon his children; financial troubles of a vague sort; the reappearance of his mistress, in terrible straits; imprisonment for murder. In other words, the author implies that while Paul may have been in pretty bad shape even with his Catholicism, the imagination is threatened when it attempts to picture how he would have ended if he hadn't accepted it.

There is very little more in this long book. There were a few good character sketches in "The Wild Orchid"—that of Paul's mother was very good—but even so slight a reward for the industrious reader is omitted from the second volume. There would be no point in reviewing the book at all if it were not that it is the work of Sigrid Undset, who once won the Nobel Prize and is a distinguished writer whose name commands a certain respect from those who have never read her works. Readers who are interested in the political significance of fiction will find that Madame Undset says candidly what many other writers merely say by implication. In spite of all the information she gives about Paul, the author leaves out a good deal that one would like to know about him—she is almost prudish on the subject of his income, for example. At one point we learn that he becomes a Catholic at the same time that he becomes a successful business man, and at another point we are told that the workers in the factory he owns are on strike. No explanation is given; we are not told why the men are striking or what happens to the strike; it is a mere incidental annoyance to Paul at a time when he has other things to worry about. The tone of the various opinions offered is level and unruffled for the most part, but becomes snarling and angry when the reference is to Russia or to the French Revolution.

The weakness of the author's point of view is evident in the excessive length of these two books. They are long, not because the material demands such exhaustive treatment, but because the author repeats herself so frequently: it is as though she were conscious of the weakness of her case, and so repeats herself because she fears she will not be understood or believed.

ROBERT CANTWELL

Shorter Notices

Peace Broke Out. By Heinz Liepmann. Translated from the German by Emile Burns. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $2.50.

The title is the best single feature of this novel of post-war Germany. Herr Liepmann has an excellent subject in the days of panic among the petit bourgeois, when the mark was falling so rapidly that the fantastic character of money, and the flimsy base of such dogmas as the virtue of thrift, became apparent to everyone. Superficially a record of the happenings of a few days among a loosely-connected group, the novel is an attempt to dramatize the intellectual and moral and economic confusion of the times. The trouble is that the author seems to share the bewilderment he describes in his characters; in its way the novel is almost as disorganized as the times with which it deals.

Ebenezer Walks with God. By George Baker. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Ebenezer, retired manager of a Bible Emporium in Paternoster Row, is past sixty when his childless wife, Elizabeth, of similar age, insists upon adopting their orphaned great-nephew. The baby brings dissension to the pious couple, who have never quarreled before, and finally causes Ebenezer to have a breakdown. During his recovery, through a sense of guilt, Ebenezer develops the illusion that his little nephew is really Jesus come again. He keeps a journal thereafter of "His" doings, referring to the boy, whose right name is Paul, as "J." His wife tries to have him committed to an asylum for insanity. Ebenezer leave home, taking the boy, and settles among the poor. The rest of the story is a tender, fantastic farce concerning Ebenezer's "walks with God" and their joint adventures with Cockneys Elizabeth, and life. The views of the rigid old Calvinist are considerably altered on such subjects as tobacco, wine-bibbing Papism, and loose women. Mr. Baker's point seems to be that even though Paul, or "J.," is an ordinary boy, by being loved as though he were Christ he is able to show the way to a truly Christian life. This attractive idea is worked out with charm and a remarkably sure touch, though sometimes with a humor that is too conventional, particularly in the Cockney scenes. But as a whole the book is quite individual.

There Is a Door. By Kathleen Coyle. Paris: Edward W. Titus.

Miss Coyle's lovely prose and Mr. Titus's handsome format are the chief distinctions of this parable of life and death, the flesh and the spirit. The content of "There Is a Door" resembles too closely the worst of Maeterlinck, which might be described as the parable on all fours. Those mystics, the great religious teachers, have made use of the parable to express the essence of experience in concrete terms easily grasped by the common man. But mystifiers like Maeterlinck, and in the present instance, Miss Coyle, reverse the process, inflating the concrete until it eludes our comprehension and drifts away like smoke into nothingness.

Odin in Fairyland. By Olav Duun. Translated from the Norwegian by Arthur G. Chater. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This, the fourth volume of Olav Duun's saga of modern Norway, "The People of Juvik," is concerned with the early years of a boy whose developing character promises a revival of initiative and vigor in a family stock that has rather gone to seed. Odin is the illegitimate son of Elen (daughter of Aasel Haaberg and granddaughter of the old berserk, Anders) and Otte Setran, who also has a strain of the Juviking blood. An irresponsible ne'er-do-well, Otte had left for America before the child was born. When Odin is seven, Elen marries and places her son as herdboys for a queer couple who live by the sea at Kjelvik. There, in a world new and strange to him, he lives half in reality and half in imagination, peopling the hills with the nature spirits of folklore. In his fairyland he gradually acquires sturdy independence, learns to fight his own battles, and finds his first sweetheart. One is left with the impression that the boy has good material for manhood. In the original title, "I Eventyre," lies the suggestion both of adventure and fantasy. An allusive, abrupt style keeps the reader's mind alert, and an unobtrusive wit lurks in many an unusual turn of phrase.

The Captive Shrew. By Julian Huxley. Oxford: Basil Blackwell. 5 shillings net.

Julian Huxley, the scientist, believes that the thought which scientific research leads one into may be very fit subject matter indeed for poetry. He says:

As to publishing my verses, I have no apology handy: to wish to publish what one has written is just frailty which scientists share with other human organisms.

And the verses show the scientific mind turned to more emotional contemplation of the whys and wherefores of the Universe. In observing the shrew Mr. Huxley notes that "Life hurries without Power, and Mind, Cocooned in brain, is almost blind."

The subject of his lines are birds, beasts, people, love, places, thoughts. And if one cannot call Mr. Huxley a poet, one can feel him to be a close student of life in its many aspects. His verses are often fairly well turned, and the subject matter is likely to prove interesting.

Thinking of Russia. By H. H. Lewis. B. C. Hagglund, Publisher. Holt, Minnesota.

Red Renaissance. By H. H. Lewis. B. C. Hagglund, Publisher. Holt, Minnesota.

These two little pamphlet collections of very bad verse, show the tendency of the working-class poet to address his audience in terms they will comprehend. The author denounces the eclecticism of the modern poet and praises the New Masses for its attempt to print poems from poets who speak in proletarian terms. His themes are the denunciation of the capitalistic system, the praise of Russia, the rights of labor. The verses are sincere even though they may sound bombastic.

Nationalism and Imperialism in the Hither East. By Hans Kohn. Translated from the German by Margaret M. Green. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

Professor Kohn takes up the problem of the clash between European imperialism, embodied in the mandates commissions of England and France, and the nationalism of Egypt, Palestine, Arabia, Iraq, Trans-Jordania, and Syria where these mandates are operative and where they have sharpened national feeling. Professor Kohn shows how far imperialism has had to back down already, and makes visible by keen and close studies the ebb movement of the tide of Western expansion. His work has real distinction. It is exhaustive, scholarly, and completely objective without, however, anaesthetizing the living elements in the international situation it describes. It is written clearly and with force—a very interesting and valuable book.

American Foreign Policy in Mexican Relations. By James Morton Callahan. The Macmillan Company. $4.

This is a restatement of United States policies toward Mexico for the last one hundred and twelve years as seen through our official dispatches. It does not replace Rippey's "United States and Mexico" as the standard work on the subject.

Drama They're Off

AT the Ethel Barrymore Theater the new dramatic season got off to a pretty good start with the production of "Here Today"—a semi-satirical and wholly irresponsible farce-comedy which has only one serious defect: namely, that it is never quite as funny as it seems, because it always seems that it ought to be funnier than it is.

No one could deny that the author, George Oppenheimer, has a very promising idea. Bring a group of chronically irrepressible wise-crackers into improbable but intimate contact with a very serious family from Boston's best circle, and one begins to smile at the very possibilities. Give them a continuous stream of flippant commentaries which does not pause even to absorb the bewildered indignation of the respectable folk, and it is impossible not to say that this is very good indeed. Yet the fact remains that one does not laugh as heartily as one feels that one should be laughing, and that one ends by concluding that the fault is not wholly one's own.

The trouble can hardly be with the direction of George S. Kaufman—even though that direction does sometimes seem to lack accent and variety. Neither, on the other hand, can the

CURRENT PRICES INDICATE an upswing — BUT FIGURES DON'T LIE!

THE stock market is experiencing a pronounced "upswing"—yet The New York Times' business index of August 20th showed business activity at 52.2 per cent of normal, the lowest point it has yet touched. The United States Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that in July employment fell off again, leaving only fifty-five men employed for every one hundred employed in 1926.

What of the next ten months? Professor Bonn's analysis of America's economic future has been hailed by HAROLD J. LASKI as "the wisest book on America that has been published in many years." "Professor Bonn knows what he is talking about. His book is clear, penetrating, sound."—Stuart Chase.

THE CRISIS OF CAPITALISM IN AMERICA

by M. J. BONN, Member of the League of Nation's Gold Committee $2.50 at all bookshops

Do you understand the recent revolutions in South America?

THE COMING OF SOUTH AMERICA

by HENRY KITTREDGE NORTON

"Incomparably the best book that has appeared on South America in relation to the United States."—Philadelphia Record. "An enlightened and enlightening presentation of the facts and discussion of them."—Columbus Dispatch. $3.50

What of the minds of the coming generation?

REMAKERS of MANKIND

by CARLETON WASHBURNE

What are the leaders of educational thought throughout the world trying to do to the minds of children and young people? Carleton Washburne recently made an extensive tour of the world, and questioned Einstein, Gandhi and many other leaders of thought and action. This book records their replies. "A review of this book cannot possibly mirror its completeness nor its extravagance of absorbing detail."—New York World-Telegram. $3.00

Towards an understanding of the Oriental problem

CHINA: The Collapse of a Civilization

by NATHANIEL PEFFER

"The best book on China."—New York Herald Tribune. $3.50

The next of the JOHN DAY PAMPHLETS

By H. G. WELLS—WHAT SHOULD BE DONE—NOW!

A Memorandum on the World Situation. Ready September 22nd. 25 cents

JOHN DAY Books • 335 Fourth Avenue, New York

PLAYS □ LECTURES □ DINNER

"ANOTHER LANGUAGE"

A New Play by ROSE FRANKEN With GLENN ANDERS
MARGARET WYCHERLY, LAURA STRAUBE, JOHN BEAL
"Remarkably evocative, subtle, beautiful and tender, and as real as the truth. A splendid achievement of acting and direction."

—J. BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times.

BOOTH

THEATRE—45th St., West of Broadway
Eves. 8:50—Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2.40

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL, 242 E. 14th St.

Sunday Course

"A PHILOSOPHER LOOKS AT THE WORLD"

First Lecture Sept. 18, 5 P. M.

Subject—"THIS HUMAN TRAGEDY"

by Dr. G. F. Beck

The Nation on WEVD

Oswald Garrison Villard will speak on Wednesday, September 21, on the Presidential campaign.

September 21

8:15 p.m.

The Thomas for President and Maurer Committee

invites you to a dinner for

NORMAN THOMAS

Monday, September 19th at 6:45 P.M.

MECCA TEMPLE

130 West 56th Street New York City

Speakers

Norman Thomas, Heywood Broun,
B. Charney Vladeck, Louis Waldman,
Paul Douglas, Dr. Henry Neumann

Make Reservations now

The Thomas for President and Maurer Committee

112 East 19th Street New York City

TICKETS: $1.50

lack lie in a cast which is headed by the poker-faced Miss Gordon, whose solemn mien might bewilder more agile-witted persons than those who inhabit the Algonquin's idea of the on and only Back Bay. There seems, therefore, to be nothing for it except to conclude that the trouble lies somewhere in Mr. Oppenheimer's often scintillating script, and to remember once more that a collection of even the most amusing lines does not always—indeed does not ever—make the most amusing kind of play.

At any given instant "Here Today" is just exactly as funny as the line which is being said at that particular moment. Nothing works toward any climax, nothing builds upon anything else, and nothing is ever any better because of what was said before. One knows as much about the characters five minutes after the curtain has gone up as one knows about them when it is ready to descend, and that is not the way in which the most deeply, hilariously, and soul-satisfyingly funny plays are built. They must always be more than the sum of their parts, and that is exactly what this play is not. Even farce is a structure which becomes more dizzily preposterous as one unstable equilibrium is laid upon the foundation of a previous one; it is not a series of bright sparks which go out the same second that they dazzle.

Half a minute before the end of the play Mr. Oppenheimer remembers that he has a theme. The Boston girl who thought she was going to marry the most agreeable of the wise-crackers turns to him and his friends to explain why she has decided that it would not do. "You are different from me. You are here today and gone tomorrow. I want to be here tomorrow too. I want to prepare for something and plan for something. You don't." And a very good theme it is, too. If it had been borne consistently in mind it might have supplied the continuity necessary to make the play more than the brief Roman candle it is. Perhaps our author thought of it before he thought of the plot or the lines, but he kept the secret hidden from everybody else until it was too late. The play was already over before the rest of us knew that it was about anything at all.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Most of the New York reviewers gave the impression that "Ballyhoo of 1932" (Forty-Fourth Street Theater) is a distinctly third-rate revue. This reporter finds it difficult to understand why they felt that way about it, and suspects that some of them, at least, were translating moral into critical disapproval. They remarked, for example, that some of the sketches "touched a new low point in vulgarity," but anyone who has seen an Earl Carroll review, not to mention a dozen others, knows that this is simply not so. True, in one sketch the humor is mildly scatological, but the sketch really is amusing. Compared with "Of Thee I Sing" or a typical Ed Wynn show, "Ballyhoo of 1932" is not first-rate, but it is considerably above the average offering of its kind. It has humor and a generous supply of it, much of it of the type familiar to readers of Ballyhoo magazine; it maintains a consistently rapid pace; its chorus is unusually attractive, the dancing in it is very good, and it has more good tunes and amusing lyrics than I have heard in any similar offering in months. Among these are "Thrill Me" and "Man About Yonkers." Certainly it is superior in nearly every respect to "Smiling Faces" the musical comedy at the Shubert Theater headed by Fred and Dorothy Stone. The latter is handicapped by a really stupid book, and Fred Stone, while always amiable, is unfortunately not nearly as funny as Willie Howard. "Smiling Faces" compares well with "Ballyhoo" in the dancing, thanks to the astonishing grace and suppleness of a group called the Merriel Abbott dancers; but "Ballyhoo" is supported by the Albertina Rasch specialty dancers, and by the exceedingly graceful Gloria Gilbert.

H. H.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXV

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1932

No. 3508

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS .....	267
EDITORIALS:
Glassford Sees It Through.....	269
Mr. Roosevelt's Tariff Nonsense .....	270
Meeting Japan's Challenge .....	271
Liberalism and Sex .....	271
Books and Pocket-Books .....	272
CARTOON: THE ROAD BACK. By Edmund Duffy.....	273
THE POT AND THE KETTLE: THE TESTIMONY OF A GREAT EXPERT. By Oswald Garrison Villard .....	274
DANUBE BLUES. By John Gunther .....	275
THE SHOW BUSINESS. IV. CAN ANYTHING BE DONE ABOUT IT? By Joseph Wood Krutch .....	277
DON'T OVERLOOK PHILADELPHIA! By Saul Carson .....	279
MOURNING BECOMES HERBERT. By Paul Y. Anderson .....	280
SKIMMED MILK AND WATERED STOCKS. By E. R. McIntyre .....	281
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter .....	283
CORRESPONDENCE .....	283
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE .....	285
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Epilogue. By Frances Frost .....	286
Another Charlotte Brontë. By Dorothy Van Doren .....	286
Sunday Paper. By Gerald Sykes .....	286
How Possible Is Peace? By C. Hartley Grattan .....	287
Lady Caroline. By Clara Gruening Stillman .....	287
The British Sixties. By Lionel Trilling .....	288
Melanesian Poets and Poisoners. By Melville J. Herskovits .....	288
Exploding Skies. By Benjamin Ginzburg .....	289
Real Lives. By Arthur Warner .....	289
Shorter Notices .....	290
Drama: The Left Banksy. By Joseph Wood Krutch .....	290
Films: "Strange Interlude." By Alexander Bakshy .....	292

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY MAURITZ A. HALLGREN
DOROTHY VAN DOREN MARGARET MARSHALL

DRAMATIC EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

HEYWOOD BROWN H. L. MENCKEN MARK VAN DOREN
LEWIS S. GANNETT NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN
JOHN A. HOBSON ARTHUR WARNER
MURIEL C. GRAY, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $6.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE BRITISH NOTE on the new German attitude on disarmament is sound and well-reasoned if smacking somewhat of the toplofty. The rebuke administered for their manners and methods in raising the issue at this time, the Germans have well deserved. Their threat to withdraw from the disarmament conference, in response to domestic political considerations, is indefensible save as a pandering to nationalist and jingo sentiment, while Von Papen, in giving orders to go ahead with the third pocket battleship, is playing not merely with fire but with dynamite. If the German Government persists in this attitude, it will not merely smash the disarmament conference; it will raise at once the question as to what action France and England will take to uphold the Versailles treaty. The weakness of their position is that they themselves have not disarmed, and, despite the brave words in the British note, there is not the slightest evidence that, with or without the presence of the Germans, there will be that genuine and far-reaching disarmament which Germany and the world have had the right to expect. There lies the most direct road out of the situation, and the most honorable one. But if the Allies will not now take it, there is no reason on earth why those Germans who happen to want greater armaments should not possess their souls in patience a few years longer. Nobody in Germany, and not the nation itself, is suffering in the least degree as a result of the nation's being disarmed—it is a situation, in fact, for which the people should be profoundly grateful. If the Berlin militarists go on and further defy the Allies, by, let us say, increasing their army and altering its character, they will deliberately invite forcible reprisals, alienate the good-will which has just practically forgiven German reparations, and risk a fresh war which can only have one outcome.

WITH THE GERMAN POLITICAL SCENE changing daily and kaleidoscopically, it is difficult to gauge at this distance the meaning of the various recent happenings. But the fact stands out that Germany is well along in its revolution, which began in July when Von Papen took charge of the government. The republic is now only a shell, and the Weimar Constitution is laid upon the shelf. Von Papen has had his way in proroguing the Reichstag, but has called for a new election on November 6—an election which nobody wants and everybody dreads, and which will surely be unproductive of a working Reichstag majority. Meanwhile, President von Hindenburg continues to be the real ruler of Germany with powers almost as autocratic as the Kaiser himself enjoyed. While the Hitlerites profess to be discontented, and joined with the Communists and Socialists in censuring the Von Papen Government in the last vote taken in the Reichstag, it grows increasingly unlikely that they will take any extra-legal action against the government. Nor should they, if one considers that most of the measures of the Von Papen Government have been precisely along the lines of the Hitler program. Even the announced government training camps for youths, for which the poverty-stricken government easily finds the initial sum of $357,000, can hardly seem undesirable to the Nazis. It is still a puzzle just how the Junker government of today differs from the Hitlerites. Time alone will make that clear, but at present we do not see why Hitler should be unhappy, provided he can salve his wounded pride at not being a member of the government.

MAHATMA GANDHI PROPOSES TO STARVE himself to death in protest against the British Government's communal awards, which would divide the Indian population into twelve separate electorates according to religion, race, and occupation. Gandhi, like the Congress Party, is opposed to the whole idea of separate electorates, but his protest is specifically against special representation in the provincial legislatures (to which the communal awards have reference) for the depressed classes, the untouchables. Throughout his public career Gandhi has proclaimed "untouchability" to be the "greatest blot on Hinduism"; in his personal life he has carried on the fight against it, beginning with his adoption of an untouchable child many years ago. He feels that legally to separate the untouchables from the Hindus, as the communal award contemplates, is to recognize officially, and therefore perpetuate, a separation that he has been trying for years to wipe out. The objection of the Congress Party to separate electorates in general is based upon the same theory. It is impossible to deny the wisdom of that theory; and it is difficult to justify the British Government in its decision, especially in the light of the Simon Commission report, which the British Government can hardly dismiss and which expresses the following opinion:

Communal representation . . . is an undoubted obstacle in the way of the growth of a sense of common citizenship. . . . Communal electorates . . . perpetuate class distinctions and stereotype existing relations, and they constitute a very serious hindrance to the development of the self-governing principle.

The death of Gandhi by self-starvation would not only mean the loss to the world of one of its most significant figures. It would let loose in India a storm which the British already foresee. It is to be hoped that the government and Gandhi will somehow find a compromise.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT'S SPEECH on the railroads in Salt Lake City was a much abler and more statesman-like address than his talk on agriculture and the tariff. The Governor has grappled honestly with this problem and consulted informed advisers. The address is only mildly liberal in its tendency—it avoids the issue of government ownership or management—but within its limitations it is thoughtful. It advocates the termination of the present unfair competition between the railroads and motor trucks by bringing the latter also under federal supervision. It attacks those "financial comets," railroad holding companies, and insists that these, too, be brought under federal control. It approves the present policy of loans to railroads through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but only as an "emergency measure," and it justifiably attacks the present Administration for making these loans, "not in accordance with a plan for relieving fundamental difficulties, but only with the hope that within a year or so the depression would end." It recommends that the government "stand back of the railroads for a specified period," and attempt to prevent receiverships, but holds that when these become unavoidable, an "appropriate scaling down of fixed charges" should be made by the railroads. The Governor also recommends a thorough overhauling of the federal laws affecting railroad receiverships. This would be a reform of first importance if it could be achieved, though the Governor does not supply any details. Finally, he indorses the present policy of encouraging the consolidation of the roads into a few systems, and urges the gradual scrapping of unprofitable railroad mileage.

FOR SEVERAL GENERATIONS the slogan "As Maine goes, so goes the nation" has been capitalized by the party usually favored by the results. Of late years the Republicans have done most of the capitalizing, and while the Maine results have not been an infallible barometer, they have for half a century proved highly suggestive. Maine elected Republican governors and the nation Republican Presidents from 1860 to 1876. In 1880, when Garfield was elected, Greenbackers and Democrats united in the State campaign to elect their candidates, but the Democrats by themselves would have been in a minority. In the years of Grover Cleveland's victories Republican governors were elected in Maine, but by small majorities. In 1912 the Democrats won in State and nation, but in 1916 the Republicans were returned to power in the State, while Woodrow Wilson was reelected. Since then Maine has been safely Republican, in 1928 by the unprecedented majority of 140,000. How striking and inevitably prophetic appears the swing of more than 142,000 votes, which elected by approximately 2,500 votes not only a Democratic governor but two out of Maine's three Congressmen!

SOME OF THE RESULTS of the primaries held on September 13 were gratifying. In South Carolina the veteran Senator Ellison D. Smith defeated that champion demagogue, Cole Blease, and, it is to be hoped, eliminated him from future political consideration. In Colorado the progressive Democrats, headed by Senator Costigan, succeeded in nominating their candidate for the United States Senate, ex-Senator Alva Adams, and were able to give to Governor Roosevelt, when he arrived there, the assurance that the State would be safely Democratic in the coming election—a promise borne out by the fact that for the first time the Democratic enrolment has surpassed the Republican by 18,000. Equally gratifying is the news that Louisiana, by electing Representative J. H. Overton, has retired to private life Senator E. S. Broussard, whose affiliation with the sugar-cane interests has long made his remaining in the Senate and voting for sugar tariffs only short of scandalous. We note with regret, however, the defeat of the veteran Governor George W. P. Hunt of Arizona, who has presided over the destinies of that State since 1923—he had previously been the first Governor elected, and had also served from 1915 to 1919. A genuine liberal, his loss to public life is great. The retirement of Congressman Charles R. Crisp removes from the House the chairman of its Ways and Means Committee, who has had twenty years of Congressional service. All in all, the drift of voting is so favorable to the Democrats that it is no wonder Mr. Hoover has decided that he must take the stump and aggressively oppose Mr. Roosevelt.

HERBERT HOOVER WROTE on July 17 last, when he signed the so-called relief bill which granted $300,000,000 for temporary loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation "to such States as are absolutely unable to finance relief of distress," that as a result "we have a solid back log of assurance that there need be no hunger and cold in the United States." On September 15, forgetting all about that solid back log of assurance, he issued an appeal to the nation "to see that no man, woman, or child shall go hungry or unsheltered through the approaching winter." But he added: "We must maintain the bedrock principle of our liberties by the full mobilization of individual and local resources and responsibilities." Then the President, who as much as any man in our public life has shown himself callous and indifferent to individual suffering, preached that "a cold and distant charity which puts out its sympathy only through the tax-collector yields a very meager dole of unloving and perfunctory relief." Finally, he said, we are to "maintain the spiritual impulses in our people for generous giving and generous service—in the spirit that each is his brother's keeper." In these words he has again sought to shoulder off on private charity the sacred responsibility which is the state's, and nobody else's, of keeping starving Americans alive. Everybody knows that the response of charity next winter can only be a fraction of what has been given heretofore, that the suffering has already reached dimensions menacing in the extreme. Again we repeat our question to the President, "Is it to be mass murder, Mr. Hoover?" Only action by the government will prevent it.

WHEN THE PRESIDENT signed the bill increasing by $1,500,000,000 the loans that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation might make, it was on the strict understanding that these loans should be "self-liquidating" in character, that is, that they should consist of projects that would return an immediate and direct income to pay off the loans. It was supposed that this would apply particularly to toll bridges and tunnels. It is rather surprising, therefore, that the first so-called "self-liquidating" loan should be one of $40,000,000 toward an estimated $283,000,000 required to finance the vast metropolitan water district of Southern California. As it is estimated that it will require at least six years to complete the work, it will obviously be a long time before this project begins to be "self-liquidating." Moreover, it is estimated that only 1,000 men will be employed in the project by December 31 of this year and only 4,500 by July 1, 1933. If these figures are correct, they surely represent an amazingly small amount of employment for the expenditure of $40,000,000. That the first money under this new provision should have gone to the politically doubtful State of California is perhaps only a coincidence, but certainly the loan will bear further investigation. Apart from the justification of these specific loans, the whole general policy which the R. F. C. represents becomes increasingly dubious. Dr. Lewis H. Haney, professor of economics at New York University, has recently warned against the inflation "which may be forced upon us by the government's policy of forcing its credit into business through huge loans" by the corporation. Such a policy, he remarks, may "engulf us in a brief period of false prosperity similar to that which developed in 1896. The reaction will be inevitable."

Glassford Sees It Through

GENERAL PELHAM D. GLASSFORD'S reply to Attorney-General Mitchell's attack upon the character of the bonus army was clear and devastating. He demonstrated that the bonus army was not composed of criminals and Communists, and he denied once more—with a persistent courage which his pusillanimous and confused superiors must find incomprehensible—that troops were necessary on July 28.

His statements with regard to the character of the bonus army are remarkably borne out by the report of a quite disinterested survey of the army made immediately after it was driven out of Washington. When the army reached Pennsylvania, Mrs. I. Albert Liveright, State Secretary of Welfare, at the instance of Governor Pinchot, called a conference of representatives of social-welfare agencies to consider the bonus expeditionary forces "in relationship to the general problem of migrant unemployed." We quote from the recommendations of the committee appointed to inquire into the problem of caring for the bonus army, as of August 11.

The evidence presented to us today indicated that the men in the bonus expeditionary forces and their families camping in Pennsylvania are of a higher type than the average economic migrant. They represent a very fair cross-section of the unemployed and are not typical of the "hobo" of past years.

Among those making independent eyewitness reports to the Secretary of Welfare were J. Prentice Murphy, member of the Welfare Commission, and Helen Glenn Tyson, Assistant Deputy Secretary of the State Department of Welfare. From Mr. Murphy's long report we quote the following significant extracts:

One could not fail to be impressed by the appearance of the campers. . . . They showed a high degree of intelligence. . . . Every one of the approximately seventy-five men whom I questioned specifically as to their service records produced his service papers showing honorable discharge.

There were men who seemed quite obviously to be floaters . . . but there were very few of such men.

There were graduate physicians, nurses; a graduate pharmacist; passenger conductors; locomotive firemen; artisans, such as structural ironworkers; carpenters; white-collar people such as clerks, down to the casual and irregularly employed workers.

Mrs. Tyson's observations were very similar:

. . . They represented a cross-section of America, as had the army in 1918. They were highly conservative—indeed, had a middle-class psychology in their attitude toward the whole situation. Service badges, even distinguished-service medals, were in evidence. The men treasured their army papers. . . . There can be no question whatever that almost all of them were war veterans.

While the men had adopted the bonus as a symbol of their needs, they seemed entirely realistic about the limitations of a few hundred dollars to meet them. Their real demand was for security, and in their bewilderment and confusion they seem to have reverted to the old army ways, to the earlier institutional situation where shelter and food are provided and where leadership is given. American flags were everywhere, repudiation of the "reds" was violent; though the speakers often added that "that night in Washington was enough to make anyone a Bolshie."

Meanwhile, it becomes increasingly apparent that on July 28 the Administration sowed the wind. A resolution touching upon the violent expulsion of the bonus army from Washington was kept off the floor at the national convention of the Legion, but it is probable that the vote of ten to one by which the convention reversed its decision of last year and demanded immediate payment of the bonus was inspired at least in part by resentment against the Administration—particularly since the vote was taken the day following President Hoover's vigorous, straightforward, well-written, and unanswerable statement against payment. Whatever the inspiration, that demand and its sponsors become ever more menacing. Already we are being told that Congress will be stormed again in December by 50,000 or 100,000 men. The challenge of the reactionary Legion must be met sooner or later. But events since July 28 have demonstrated that force followed by official lying is the least effective way of meeting it.

Mr. Roosevelt's Tariff Nonsense

G OVERNOR ROOSEVELT'S speech to the farmers leaves us gasping. There are, frankly, passages in it which make us question our sanity, for we can make neither head nor tail out of them, and we defy anybody to tell us what they mean. We cannot even venture to guess what the Governor is really driving at, or what his proposals are. The whole performance is the worst blow which has been struck at his candidacy since it began, for it seems to confirm what his adversaries have charged—that he has a confused mind which has not thought things through, and therefore has no clear remedies to suggest. While he berated Mr. Hoover—at one point with absolute unfairness—he no more advanced the case of the farmer than has the President. If this satisfies farmers, then they are easily duped.

But the protected manufacturers ought to be feeling both satisfied and pleased, if they have had any fears that Governor Roosevelt might be radical on the tariff. Like Al Smith in 1928, the Governor makes the incredible blunder of accepting the entire Republican protection principle. He, too, discards the historic Democratic position of "a tariff for revenue only," and he, too, really believes the humbug that some kind of tariff can be worked out which will equalize the position of the farmer in our economic system, in relation to the manufacturer. Instead of coming out and saying what he must know, what we believe he knows at heart, that the attack should be on the whole tariff principle, he avoids alienating the protected and privileged interests by not threatening to put an ax to the whole poisonous tariff growth, which, like some evil jungle vine, is strangling our foreign trade and corrupting our whole domestic political and economic life. He has now nothing left to offer to the American people on the tariff issue except some modifications of the existing schedules. The only issue that he can raise with Herbert Hoover hereafter is as to what rates shall be increased and what lowered, and how that shall be done. He had a magnificent opportunity to declare, as did Cobden and Bright in the great fight against the Corn Laws in England nearly a hundred years ago, in clarion tones that there shall be no tariffs on foodstuffs, and also that all tariffs on materials and machinery used by the farmers shall be finally ended.

One has only to read passages in this speech to see the utter confusion of the candidate's thought. Here is one:

The Democratic tariff policy consists, in large measure, in negotiating agreements with individual countries permitting them to sell goods to us, in return for which they will let us sell to them goods and crops which we produce. An effective application of this principle will restore the flow of international trade; and the first result of that flow will be to assist substantially the American farmer in disposing of his surplus.

What does this mean? Would not such individual treaties involve ending the most-favored-nation agreements forthwith? And why should we negotiate agreements with countries to permit them to deal with us? Haven't they been dealing with us for years, hampered only by the increasing tariff restrictions? Is it not true that, if our markets were thrown open to the world, we should have demand enough for our surplus, provided we allowed other countries to pay for the surplus in manufactured goods? But no, Governor Roosevelt winds up his discussion of this phase of the problem by praising the farmers for saying: "We must make the tariff effective"! When it comes to his six separate specifications or remedies, the first one demands for the farmer "a differential benefit [which] must be so applied that the increase in farm income, purchasing, and debt-paying power will not stimulate production." How can that possibly be done? Crops in other countries, as in the United States, are constantly affected by weather and other crop conditions, by floods, by revolution, by a number of causes. How can any human being devise a differential tariff for the farmer which will keep him on an equality with the protected manufacturer, and yet never stimulate overproduction? This seems to us a conglomeration of words that means precisely nothing.

And the further we read into these proposed remedies the worse the confusion. Each one whittles away at the first. Thus, we hear that "the plan must finance itself." How, in heaven's name? The Governor merely says that agriculture is not seeking and will not seek "access to the public treasury"; beyond that nothing. His third recommendation is that agriculture "must not make use of any mechanism which would cause our European customers to retaliate on the ground of dumping." But—if the Governor is hinting at the export-debenture plan, as he appears to be—is there any country on earth that would not consider such subsidized exports dumped goods? And what is the mechanism to be? Again the Governor does not elucidate. He merely says: "It must be based upon making the tariff effective and direct in its operation"! How any tariff on agricultural products which we export on net balance can possibly be made effective we are not told. Next, however, we learn that we shall have to make use of existing agencies, and that the administration of this machinery, terribly complicated because of its relation to thousands of situations in other countries, must be decentralized so that the "chief responsibility for its operation will rest with locality rather than with newly created bureaucratic machinery in Washington." For the life of us we cannot understand this, nor what he means by the use of the word locality. We submit that this is the veriest nonsense.

As for the attack on Mr. Hoover, the Governor assails him because he said that "an adequate tariff is the foundation of farm relief," precisely as if he were not arguing for an "adequate tariff" himself. Then he misinterprets Mr. Hoover's remark that "continuance of overproduction means surplus," to be corrected only by lowered prices which would make unprofitable some of the acreage, into a scheme of Mr. Hoover to "lower the price; starve out one-third of the farms; then see what happens." This is indefensible, for whatever may be said of Mr. Hoover's agricultural or tariff policy in general, he was here plainly merely stating an economic truism and making no argument or demand based upon it. This is not only unfair politics, but politics and economics of such low grade that we cannot even apply the word kindergarten to them without being too complimentary.

Meeting Japan's Challenge

IN signing a treaty of alliance with Manchukuo on September 15 Japan has taken one more step toward the ultimate annexation of this puppet state, and has again challenged the civilized world. The Tokio militarists have attempted to win sympathy for this action by proclaiming that it has been taken to meet the "vital" needs of the Japanese people. The falseness of this contention is forcefully demonstrated by the events of the last year. The Japanese militarists inaugurated their campaign of subjugation in Manchuria on September 18, 1931, ostensibly for the purpose of restoring order, which was threatened by bandit raids, and of improving the economic and financial situation in Japan, which is dependent upon conditions in Manchuria.

What has been the result? The most casual newspaper reader realizes that Japan has failed miserably in securing either of these objectives, and that this campaign of aggression has merely aggravated the conditions which Japan sought to remedy. Since August 20 at least three bandit attacks upon the South Manchuria Railway have been made. Moreover, in early September Manchurian rebels opened a well-organized attack upon three large cities, including Changchun, the capital of the new state.

In Japan itself conditions are going from bad to worse. Despite the reimposition of the gold embargo last December, the unfavorable trade balance during the first six months of 1932 increased by 153,000,000 yen over the same period in 1931. The United States Commerce Reports declare that, except for Manchuria, Japan's "trade with China was practically at a standstill during the first part of the year." The Japanese yen has fallen from 49.35 cents a year ago to 23.37 cents today; Japanese 5½ bonds have declined during the same period from 96 to 52. Despite the brave assertions of the military fascists that they would relieve the distress of the Japanese farmer, the Diet adjourned on September 4 without appropriating more than a bagatelle for this purpose.

From the international standpoint Japan's present Manchurian policy makes another disastrous conflict with China sooner or later inevitable. The Chinese will never acquiesce in the loss of a territory inhabited by 29,000,000 Chinese, which has been a part of China at least since 1644. In view of its enormous superiority in population and the great power it may exercise through the boycott, China will inevitably wreak destruction upon Japan. But the result for both countries will be fatal—a future Sino-Japanese conflict must be prevented at all costs.

The most serious aspect, however, of Japan's recognition of Manchukuo is that it is an act of defiance against the Washington treaties of 1922, the League Covenant, and the Kellogg Pact. If Japan's challenge is not met, the world peace machinery, already pitifully weak, will be dealt a blow from which it may not recover. The members of the League and the United States must meet this challenge. They must meet it without bitterness—without the rancor which leads to war—but with a firmness born of the conviction that the future of world organization is at stake. Toward this end the United States should take four definite steps. First, as The Nation urged several weeks ago, it should send a strong delegation to the forthcoming sessions of the League Council and Assembly to deal with the Lytton report. Secondly, it should formally declare, jointly with the League members, that Japan has brought the "state" of Manchukuo into existence in violation of the anti-war pact and the Nine-Power Treaty. Thirdly, it should extend recognition to Soviet Russia, in order to avoid any possibility that Moscow will itself recognize Manchukuo in return for Japanese trade privileges and in order to make Soviet Russia a part of the common front against Japan. Fourthly, the United States, along with the League, should formally embargo any foreign loan or other extension of credit either to Manchukuo or Japan so long as the Tokio government does not live up to its international obligations.

These four steps are all within the range of practical international politics; they are the logical development of Mr. Stimson's peace policy, which has already received our praise. These steps are essential to the vindication of the anti-war pact and world peace machinery. While avoiding the danger of war, they make it impossible for the Japanese militarists to consolidate their position in Manchukuo, and they would ultimately cause a revolution against militarism among the Japanese people. Having taken these steps, the League of Nations and the United States must then secure genuine results at the world economic conference, in order to demonstrate that the existing peace machinery provides a far better means for satisfying the economic needs of Japan and other countries than a futile resort to force.

Liberalism and Sex

A RECENT morning's mail brought us a letter on which we propose to comment. It comes from a pastor in Kansas, and reads as follows:

I am a pastor in western Kansas. I preach to my people the wisdom of holy living and, as best I can, I practice what I preach. In general, we are liberals in politics and business, but we have not learned to scoff at Puritan morals and womanly virtue. We still believe—most of us—that chastity is a woman's crown that man should respect and imitate. Therefore I would question such an article as that by Ernst in The Nation for August 10, which seems to me to be an instance of Freudianism at its worst. Does the editor approve the attitude of the writer, who seems to have neither moral nor aesthetic sense? Does the editor hold that there should be no public standard of decency? Or does liberalism include, by necessity, this barnyard philosophy of life? Is there any necessary connection between liberalism and lechery? I would like to know the attitude of The Nation.

Now it is evident enough that our correspondent begs the question when he asks whether or not liberalism necessarily implies a "barnyard philosophy of life." Obviously the point under dispute is not whether we approve "a barnyard philosophy," but whether or not the morality implied by Mr. Ernst and others could fairly be described in those terms. Nevertheless, and despite our correspondent's very human unfairness, the question in his mind is one of real importance. It divides liberals who would otherwise work more effectively together, and it is not often very frankly met because nearly everyone would rather ignore it than give an answer which would satisfy, at best, only one of the groups which the question divides. Yet our correspondent's patently sincere question deserves an answer and we propose to give it—not flippantly but with the same gravity as that with which it is asked. Does or does not liberalism in politics and economics imply liberal or unconventional attitudes toward sexual morality?

At first sight it might seem that history would answer in the negative. The great Victorian liberals, despite their usual religious skepticism, were, for two reasons, conspicuously austere in both precept and practice so far as sex was concerned. In the first place, they felt themselves particularly open to attack because they were admittedly unconventional in other respects. In the second place—and this is even more important—their inquiring minds stopped short when they came upon one of those questions which have always seemed so delicate as to be almost undiscussable. What we learn before we begin to reason is more firmly fixed than anything we learn afterwards, and hence the first generation of liberals cast off their earliest reasoned convictions while they held firmly to those which they had acquired before they began to reason, while, indeed, they frequently protested that the criticism which they applied to other moral standards was irrelevant to all questions of sexual behavior.

Nevertheless, it is perfectly plain that every generation since the first has seen moral liberalism more and more usually associated with liberalism in other fields. As soon as a rational criticism was applied, it resulted in the discovery that what convention taught about sexual morality was no more reasonable than what it taught about the divine right of those "whom it had pleased God to make our betters." Much that was all but universally believed about the inviolability of marriage vows and the just punishment for any kind of incontinence was as completely arbitrary and as needlessly cruel as what was taught about the privileges of rank or wealth. One cannot logically ask that one section of the moral code be tested by its usefulness to humanity without asking that every other section be tested in the same way. And we, at least, believe it to be evident that the "new morality" in regard to sex is conspicuously more humane, more reasonable, and more useful than the old.

We certainly have no desire, on the other hand, to prescribe what any man must believe about sex before he can call himself a liberal or join with other liberals in working for the things in which all believe. But we have tried to answer our correspondent's question frankly while, at the same time, presenting as forcefully as we can both our reasons for believing as we do and our realization of the danger that a difference of opinion on such matters may sunder those who ought to be united. We shall end with a plea that the author of the letter we have quoted be not led by any disapproval he may feel into the camp of the enemy. Moral and religious respectability is one of the most dangerous of the red herrings which the conservatives are only too ready to draw across the trail. "Barnyard philosophy" is a phrase that can serve them quite as usefully as "Bolshevik menace" or "un-American ideas." But the political liberal who flees from his brothers because of that bugaboo is quite as likely as not to find himself in the arms of highly respectable Anglicans like the late J. P. Morgan or ardent advocates of "a clean city" like the now happily "ex"-Mayor Walker.

Books and Pocket-Books

A NEW publisher has conceived the idea that there is a public which wants to buy "distinguished books while they are best-sellers, in a full leather format in keeping with their distinction," and so he has arranged with other publishers to bring out such special editions to sell at $5. Now if there is a public that wants to pay more for its current fiction than the rest of us are paying, it should certainly be entitled to do so. But it seems to us very probable that before the list has grown very much some of the volumes chosen will prove to have been meretricious. Therefore we are rather among those who would welcome the opposite scheme from this one—current novels bound merely in paper covers, as in France, Germany, Italy, and Spain—if that would save us money—and binderies that for a reasonable price would provide any individual with the solid and handsome bindings he desires.

Moreover, it seems to us that the books which most of us really want to have in solid and permanent bindings are not those current novels which have not yet passed through the ordeal of time, but the classics which have survived precisely that ordeal. Here the current situation is a rather curious one. We have on the one hand a large number of cheap reprint "series," and on the other innumerable de luxe editions. The de luxe editions may range in price from $5 to $50 and up, but most of them have the serious defect, apart from their expensiveness, that they are meant to be admired rather than read. The covers are frequently so precious that one dreads to profane them with one's maculate hands; they are usually too heavy or bulky to be comfortably held for sustained reading; it is usually necessary to keep a paper cutter by one's side to slit the pages as one turns them; and the illustrations are usually made for their own sake rather than to illuminate or even to carry out the spirit of the text.

The cheap reprints usually sell for a dollar or less. The two most popular of these are probably the Everyman's Library and the Modern Library series. There is also the admirably printed World's Classics series published by the Oxford University Press. We have no complaint that these do not give "money's worth": on the contrary, the Modern Library's recent publication of such volumes as "Don Quixote" and "The Magic Mountain" in full provides astonishing examples of bargains and of compression. Even more remarkable from the standpoint of low price is the recent Jacket Library, containing books like "The Way of All Flesh," well printed and in cloth covers, for fifteen cents a volume. But these books published at a dollar or less can seldom stand a great deal of punishment; the type is frequently too small, there is often too much skimping on the inside border around the type; and most of us prefer more physical durability in such spiritually durable books. There is room, in short, for a series of classics of intermediate price—selling, say, like the ordinary new novel, at two dollars or two dollars and a half each. The recent compact but handsome and solid volumes of Blake, Hazlitt, and Donne, published by the Nonesuch Press at three dollars and a half each, or the Oxford Standard Authors series, selling at one dollar and a half and higher, are examples of what we mean. Their deficiency is that they do not contain enough titles.

The Road Back

THE POT AND THE KETTLE

The Democratic and Republican Parties stand nationally for the same thing. . . . The two old parties are undivided when it comes to anything but fictitious and unreal issues.

In their essence, the Democratic and Republican machines are alike. Both are controlled by the like powerful beneficiaries of privilege—privileged politically and privileged financially. To try to punish one set of defenders of political and industrial privilege by occasionally voting for the nominee of the other is to play into the hands of both. . . . It is to follow the course most gratefully appreciated by the corrupt bosses of both.

The Democratic and Republican organizations alike represent government of the needy many by professional politicians in the interest of the rich few.

DEAR readers, who was it that voiced these sentiments? Can any of you guess? No, it was not the "pessimistic, ever fault-finding, and censorious" editor of The Nation. No, it wasn't Norman Thomas, or Eugene Debs, or some "wild-eyed radical." It wasn't Woodrow Wilson in the heyday of his reforming "New Freedom." It certainly was not William Z. Foster or Emma Goldman. Well, I see you cannot guess, and so I had better tell you. The author of these sentiments was no less a person than the Honorable Theodore Roosevelt, twice President of the United States. Surely if there ever was an expert witness as to the character of the two old parties, he would qualify as such. Knowing a great deal better, he worked his way up through the machine and never really bolted his party until the summer and fall of 1912, when he gave utterance to the sentiments quoted above, when also he referred to his former Republican allies as a "set of crooks and thieves." Otherwise he gave to the pot and to the kettle of our national political life the fury of his abuse in equal measure and equal heat. Had he not watched them at close range during his years in the White House? Had he not done business with them both in order to get through legislation that he desired? Was he not intimately acquainted with the masters of privilege to whom he refers above? Did he not sneak some of them into the White House by a secret entrance at seven o'clock one morning, when, in the last days of his campaign for reelection against Alton Parker, he thought that he was being beaten, and sell his so-called idealism to these railroad magnates and captains of industry in return for large campaign contributions with which to buy the election? As a matter of record, he did.

I SUBMIT that these words that I have quoted from Theodore Roosevelt comprise a complete statement of the case of those of us who in this campaign are saying: "A plague o' both your houses; our self-respect will not permit us to vote for either." I cannot add one word to or subtract one from the clarity and truth of his description of the issues as they are again presented today. Yet we are being told once more that if we vote for Thomas and a new deal we are throwing away our votes, and insuring the reelection of Herbert Hoover (the State of Maine has just given the lie to this). We are sick of voting for "good men" in the hope that they will change the system or the situation. I admit that I personally fell for Woodrow Wilson in 1912, and hoped great things of him in the way of domestic reform. I even voted for Al Smith four years ago, not because I was under any illusion as to the character of his party, or what he could do with it if elected, but because it seemed to me supremely important to combat the new-fangled idea that a man cannot be elected to the Presidency of the United States if he happens to belong to the Roman Catholic church. But this year there is no such issue. It is only a choice between the intolerable Hoover, the most unfit and incompetent man, unless we except the late Brother Harding, to occupy the White House since the Civil War, and the kindly, well-meaning Franklin Roosevelt, who will be our next President if Maine has pointed the way. And when the kindly and well-meaning Franklin Roosevelt enters the White House, he will find for himself that the Democratic machinery is controlled, like the Republican, "by the powerful beneficiaries of privilege—privileged politically and privileged financially," and that as long as he advocates no radical program, in fact, no program at all which differs diametrically from that of the Republicans, he will not get the country anywhere. Let us finish once and for all with the idea that the election of a good man or a nice fellow will alter the situation in which we find ourselves, of being one of the most backward countries, politically speaking, in the world, ranking about on a level with Rumania and Turkey.

The Testimony of a Great Expert

* * * * *

IT would seem as if this ought to be perfectly obvious to any intelligent man, but here is my old friend, George Foster Peabody, writing to the New York Herald Tribune that this is no time for a protest vote. "I wish," he writes, "it were worth while to plead with the followers of the critical tempers of the editors of The Nation and New Republic to be patriotic pragmatists with their votes, and not merely critics." Therefore he appeals to us deluded editors and our dupes not to throw our votes to Norman Thomas—he says we take the stand we do in order "to avoid hard thinking and courageous action"! Bless my soul, this is the same sort of thing that Henry Cabot Lodge and Reed Smoot and Matthew Stanley Quay and Mark Hanna and all the rest of the big bosses would applaud to the sky, as Theodore Roosevelt pointed out. I know Mr. Peabody loves Franklin and believes in him. I know that he is therefore not to be swayed by the pictures of Governor

Roosevelt with his arms around Boss McCooey and Boss Curry of Tammany Hall, and Mayor Hague of Jersey City, who ought long since to have been driven out of public life. These men some of us would not touch with a thirty-foot pole even if we were candidates for the Presidency—least of all would Norman Thomas do business with them. But Mr. Roosevelt is, I suppose, merely pragmatic and practical, merely "doing what the situation calls for," with the result that these bosses will ride him and thwart him when he takes office as they thwarted Grover Cleveland and Woodrow Wilson on more occasions than one. Excuse me, dear Mr. Peabody, friend of my lifetime. I prefer to be dubbed a crank, an impractical idealist, as well as your affectionate

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Danube Blues

By JOHN GUNTHER

Vienna, August 15

HAVING made an unfortunate omelette out of Central Europe, the so-called Great Powers are seeking to retrieve whole eggs from the mess. The badly cracked states of Austria, Hungary, Rumania, and so on are to be carefully pasted together again, in order to encourage them in the belief that they are really nations and to satisfy British financial and French political desires. The Powers made Central Europe what it is today, at Versailles, at St. Germain, and at the Trianon, and they were tolerably well satisfied with the job until they discovered that a bank failure in remote and decrepit Vienna could, and did, shake Britain off gold. The condition of Central Europe thereupon became a serious matter. Central Europe had, meantime, all but expired. The Powers muddled toward "reconstruction," within the framework of the treaties, and M. Tardieu produced his famous still-born plan. Now new schemes are afoot, following the agreements at Lausanne.

The Lausanne treaty contains two resolutions specifically directed to Central Europe. The first suggests a conference before December on non-German reparations. This means that the hopelessly difficult quarrel between Greece and Bulgaria over the Hoover moratorium is painfully reopened, and also the monstrous business of the Hungarian optants, probably the single most obscure and intricate politico-financial imbroglio of the post-war period. At present Hungarian landowners who lost their property when Rumania seized Transylvania are recompensed by their own government through a reciprocal deal wherein Hungarian reparations to Rumania were canceled out. Count Bethlen as Premier simply turned the cash over to Count Bethlen, landowner—if I may oversimplify. It is going to take some bitter bargaining before this pleasant system is superseded. The non-German reparations conference will also, presumably, apportion to the smaller countries their share of the Lausanne loot, when and if the bonds are marketed. There is, of course, very scant chance of those 3,000,000,000 marks ever seeing the light of day. Meantime, Rumania stands to lose a gross sum of $3,200,000 per year in reparations, Greece about $3,500,000, and Yugoslavia about $17,500,000. The sums are small, judged by Western standards, but they are large in the life of local budgets, and the wind of bewilderment and wrath from Athens, Belgrade, and Bucharest has whipped the Danube high. The second Lausanne resolution affecting Central Europe is a vague and hopeful statement calling for a conference, another one, which shall (a) persuade the Danubian states to relax their currency restrictions, and (b) persuade God to raise agricultural prices.

Then, approved at Lausanne, came a 300,000,000 schilling ($42,000,000) Austrian loan, unusual among loans in that Austria did not want it—at least Austrians respectable enough to realize their dignity as a nation, or educated enough to add and subtract. Of the 300,000,000 schillings, 100,000,000 never reaches the country, but is repaid to the Bank of England for the advance which was to have "saved" Austria after the Credit Anstalt debacle in June, 1931. The rest was planned to buttress the melting reserves of the Austrian National Bank so that service could be maintained by Austria on the 1923 League reconstruction loan, the League's "key" loan, which is guaranteed by the governments, among others, of France, Great Britain, Italy, and Czecho-Slovakia. These governments would be liable for the service, 102,000,000 schillings per year, in the event of Austrian default. Their representatives at Lausanne were thus understandably eager to inflict on Austria enough cash to save their own pocket-books for another two years.

The Lausanne loan also embodied the provision of the 1923 protocol forbidding Austria to jeopardize its independence, in other words, to form a customs union with Germany. The loan protocol specifies the appointment of a League of Nations adviser, resident in Vienna, which is a good thing. It may hurt Austrian pride, but it will save Austrian pocket-books. It simply is not true, as most Central European countries are prone to plead, that the bedrock limit of economy in national administration has been reached. There is room for an ax as wide as the Danube and as sharp as poor Seipel's wit. Let Austria cut down its pension list. This country of 6,500,000 people has more civil servants than Great Britain. Let all the countries have a look at their armies. Austria, a disarmed state, spends $32,000,000 per year on military and police forces; Hungary spends $21,000,000 on its "disarmed" army alone; Czecho-Slovakia spends $60,000,000, and Rumania and Yugoslavia about $50,000,000 each. These are the sums formally admitted in the various budgets, so the real sums are sure to be far greater. It is a fairly safe bet that the five succession states spend at least $250,000,000 a year on arms—whereas the military budget of the old empire never exceeded a modest $75,000,000.

The Austrian loan brings up another and more serious problem. It is that of the wisdom or lack of wisdom of borrowing more money simply in order to maintain service on old debts. Count Karolyi, the Hungarian Prime Minister, told me in Budapest the other day that if someone were to offer him a loan of $10,000,000 on a silver platter, he would throw it out of the window. It would be nice to call this bluff. But indeed Hungary is grossly overborrowed, with a total foreign debt running to $700,000,000, which is about $100 per capita, almost as high as the per capita total debt of the United States. Hungary, Bulgaria, and Greece, the three countries which with Austria received League loans, have all had to default on them in varying degree. Bulgaria is trying to transfer a small percentage of its debt service, despite harrowing difficulty. Greece has gone the whole hog and defaulted on both interest and sinking fund. Austria and Hungary deposit the sums due in local currencies in blocked accounts at their national banks, but transfer of these sums into foreign currency will for many years be impossible. American investors, if any, have a right to know that only by borrowing new money can these countries ever pay what they already owe.

Everywhere in the Danube basin the faces of American bankers cooling their heads before blocked accounts in the various national banks are a pretty picture. Such smart young bankers, these! How well we remember them high-hatting us in the boom years, graciously pleading on street corners of Budapest, Prague, Athens, for people to take their (i. e., our) money away from them. How well-dressed they were, with such neat polka-dotted ties under such knife-edged collars, with such glaucous cheeks and pearly smiles, and what a profound knowledge they had of elementary high-school economics. Well, they have a name for them in Central Europe now—God's Frozen People.

So much has come from Lausanne so far. Not much. But more is coming. It seems pretty generally understood that some sort of deal was made between MacDonald, Papen, and Herriot for a new and modified consideration of the Tardieu Danubian plan. Germany, people are saying, will not so truculently oppose this effort, if it is made again, nor will Italy, which indeed has been thoroughly squelched and will probably keep clear of international settlements for some time to come. Now this is of the highest importance. The London conference for Danube salvation failed last April mostly because Franco-German distrust and disagreement were so acute in all fields that the negotiators locked horns on minor squabbles and hardly bothered even to face the real issues. It was not a conference at all. It was an abortive flirtation of enemies. It was also an election maneuver on the part of both Tardieu and Brüning and both were beaten by it. But today things are quite different. Lausanne may of course go the way of Dawes and Young, but at the moment there is some slight possibility of a Franco-German settlement. Without this, no Danube plan can come to anything. It is the sine qua non of Danubian recovery.

The original French plan was slick as soap, and deceptively ingenious. Austria, Hungary, Rumania, and Yugoslavia are, taken together, their own best customers. The French plan took note of this, and recalled that about 35 per cent of the trade of "Danubia" is with itself. It recalled familiar platitudes about the economic unity of the old empire. It pointed with distress to those grim old warriors, Politics versus Economics, destroying what trade there was left in Central Europe in their efforts to destroy each other. It deplored the economic chauvinism which produced ridiculously excessive tariff barriers, exchange restrictions, trade wars. And it suggested an immediate slice of 10 per cent in inter-Danube tariffs, with further reductions to be expected later.

It is a beautiful plan except that it simply will not work. One reason is political. It is very difficult for an observer even so near as Paris or London to appreciate the intensity with which most of the Danube countries detest each other. They would much rather sink alone than swim together. To keep even one country, Yugoslavia, from spontaneously splitting asunder under pressure of the loving cousins who compose it, has been a nightmare to every Belgrade cabinet since the war. Think of trying to get the Yugoslavs to join an embryo economic union with Hungary! They hate the Hungarians even more deeply than their allies, the Rumanians. A 10 per cent tariff cut would spell in the primitive political language of these countries a warning that their sacred nationalism was endangered. The Austrians are more civilized, but Vienna has never forgotten that the Czechs were once her cooks and chauffeurs, and the Viennese will never forgive a parvenu. The Viennese positively adore it when these countries, even their own, get mixed up in a new tariff war. As things now stand, they can't fight with arms but they are more than pleased to take hate out in trade.

Economically, the difficulties of any Danube confederation are enormous. Each country has precious mushroom industries to protect, and their legitimate economic interests are disconcertingly diverse. Czecho-Slovakia, for instance, is not really part of Danubia at all; it carries on more trade with Germany than with its four succession cousins together. Again, Hungary, Rumania, and Yugoslavia are agrarian countries, living by the grain they struggle to produce; but their export surplus, small as it is by world standards, is enormously more than the two industrial partners in the putative combination, Austria and Czecho-Slovakia, could possibly consume. Hungary, Rumania, and Yugoslavia have on hand about 2,000,000 tons, for instance, of wheat; but Austria's wheat import averages only about 250,000 tons a year; the Czech figure is less. Hungary alone, or Rumania alone, or Yugoslavia alone, might supply the Czech-Austrian demand, but the agrarian states plus Bulgaria would together utterly swamp a Danube confederation market.

The most important factor, we find, is Germany. It is true that the succession states grouped together are their own best customers, but Germany is the greatest single factor in Central European trade. You cannot minimize the force of a market of 63,000,000 people eager to buy Danube grain. Germany is Austria's best customer, Czecho-Slovakia's best, Rumania's best, Hungary's third best, Yugoslavia's third best. Conversely, Germany supplies 20 per cent of Austria's imports, 24.9 per cent of Czecho-Slovakia's, 21.3 per cent of Rumania's, 19.5 per cent of Hungary's, and 13.6 per cent of Yugoslavia's. About 10 per cent of Germany's total trade is with the succession states. Contrast this with figures for the other Powers: only 1 per cent of French imports comes from Danubia, and less than 1 per cent of British imports! The spectacle of France and Britain trying to freeze Germany out of a Danube scheme is therefore laughable. Germany is overwhelmingly the most important element in the whole problem. Even Dr. Benes, the Czech Foreign Minister, says so.

It is easy, then, to summarize. Without Germany, nothing is possible. But without French political and British financial support, very little is possible. One must not forget the exceedingly large French and British financial, as apart from purely commercial, interests in Central Europe. What one must hope for from the post-Lausanne negotiations is willingness by the French to admit Germany's commercial supremacy, plus German concessions to allow reciprocal intra-Danube tariff cuts. The Tardieu plan must somehow be warped around to include German preference schemes, so that an eventual agrarian bloc of Hungary, Rumania, Jugoslavia, and Bulgaria can trade more or less decently with the industrial Austro-Czech-German group. Not easy. And it depends utterly on general Franco-German amity. Meantime, business being business, France, Germany, and Italy, all three, have been competitively diving underneath the whole mess to sneak out private trade agreements to their own exclusive advantage.

Of course a Danube agreement in about 1940 will not do much good. It is this winter which will tell the tale. Austria and Hungary, among the Central European states, have collapsed completely once since the war, and it is going to be decided pretty soon whether or not this will happen again. Already their currencies, like those of their neighbors, have only an artificial internal value, and a little bit of inflation has begun. A Central European inflation might bring the rest of Europe down. Austria and Hungary are sick. It does not take long for sick nations to die.

The Show Business

IV. Can Anything Be Done About It?*

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ANYONE who has read the previous articles in this series will probably be almost too ready to agree that theatrical production costs too much. He will, moreover, be confirmed in this opinion if he is informed still further that between 1914 and 1929 costs rose about 100 per cent and that this rise was accounted for by proportional increases in practically every department, from the salaries of actors and stage hands to the price of the most trivial prop. But the theatergoer himself is partially responsible for the unnecessarily large outlay required to produce a play. He has become accustomed to absurdly lavish mountings, and the man who grumbles at paying $3.30 for a ticket to a simple drama and $5.50 for a ticket to one of the elaborate reviews is often the very one who would grumble at the slightest evidence of even reasonable economy. We are accustomed to a sumptuousness of scenic investiture which in many cases does not add enough to the artistic effect to justify the handicap which it imposes, and our theater would be a great deal more healthy if we would learn to demand less in certain respects. A good play is just as good if the curtains which deck the drawing-room windows have been used before, and no one ought really care whether or not a buffet is real mahogany. But unfortunately the American playgoer will recognize and resent the cheapness of a material much more readily than he will resent the cheapness of an idea, a character, or a phrase. He demands the best—in fabrics and furniture and clothes.

Of course this is not, however, the only reason why play production costs too much, and there are various reasons why the producer pays outrageously even for what he gets. Ask him what is the matter with the theatrical business and he is pretty sure to answer in one word, "Labor." Nor is it to be denied that he has a real grievance, even though, as I shall try to show, he is usually guilty of important sins of his own. Three years ago the stage hands received their last increases and they, almost alone among the workers in the theater, have, so far at least, accepted no reductions of any kind, though negotiations are now pending. Their pay is very high as the pay of laborers goes and (this is the producer's chief complaint) the iron-clad rules of their union necessarily involve great wastes.

It is true, for example, that a carpenter, an electrician, or a property man is theoretically paid at the rate of only $82.50 a week, while the various assistants receive only $7.25 a performance. But since the production of a play is not something which can be carried on in the routine manner of a factory, all the typical union rules concerning pay at an increased rate for broken time, overtime, holiday time, and the like become enormously important, and under certain circumstances the theatrical worker may pile up earnings ridiculously disproportionate to those of the actors, directors, or managers.

As I write I have before me the booklet setting forth the "Wage Scales and Working Conditions," issued by the Theatrical Protective Union No. 1, and there is no doubt of the fact that some of its provisions—especially those concerning what a particular kind of worker may or may not do, or what shall constitute a "load" for a transfer agent—have a kind of Alice in Wonderlandish quality. It may sometimes happen that a producer is compelled to employ a staff which does little except play poker in its room below stage, and as a perhaps extreme example we may cite the situation against which Mr. Ziegfeld was complaining loudly just before his death.

In reviving "Show Boat" Mr. Ziegfeld employed a stage crew of exactly the same size as that which he had employed during the original run of the play. But after its original run the play had been taken on the road with an increased crew. And since less than five years had elapsed between the time when "Show Boat" was on tour and the time when it was revived in New York, it was still technically "on the road." Therefore Mr. Ziegfeld was compelled to hire additional men at a cost of something like $800 a week, in spite of the fact that there was nothing whatever for them to do. Not unnaturally he felt that he had been wronged.

There seems little doubt that the unions are unreasonable to an extent which ultimately works to their own disadvantage by reducing the number of their opportunities to work, and it is possible that some of the abuses for which they are responsible will be remedied. This does not, however, mean that the producers themselves are guiltless of costly inefficiency. The account previously given of the processes of production ought to make it abundantly clear how much will depend upon the smoothness with which they are carried through. Undoubtedly it is difficult to coordinate them efficiently, but the fact remains that upon the extent of this coordination depends, more than upon any other single factor, what the cost of production will be. At best it will cost enough or too much. But delays, changes, and overtime labor used to get an inefficiently managed production ready in time for its scheduled opening can cause costs to mount so dizzily that they may easily be double or triple what they would have been and thus make all the difference between a tidy profit and a crushing loss.

* The fourth and last of a series of articles on The Show Business.—
EDITOR THE NATION.

Last and perhaps most important of all is the more general fact that theatrical activity of all kinds is too irregular or sporadic to be efficient. Workers and materials alike are employed for only an indefinite part of even the theatrical season and for that reason cost too much. The rent of a theater is very high because a theater is used only part of the time. Actors' salaries are high because even important stars ordinarily work only relatively few weeks of the year, and it is for the same reason that all other employees from directors on down to carpenters receive compensations which appear unreasonably generous. If a manager could lease a theater for a long period, hire actors, directors, et cetera by the year, and then keep his staff employed as constantly as, for example, a publisher keeps his staff employed, then both production and running costs could be cut nearly in half.

The Theater Guild has worked out an organization which makes possible an approach to this ideal. It has one theater of its own, it has a semi-permanent company, and it makes a definite number of productions per year in its own house, moving to other theaters only those plays which require long runs. It is partly for this reason that the Theater Guild has become an unusually stable institution, even though, it should be noted, it receives no concessions from the unions; and it may be added that in general the larger the play-producing organization, the more economically its operations can be planned. So far, however, as the "independent" producer is concerned, his activity continues to be so sporadic as to be inevitably wasteful. One year he may produce three or four plays, another year possibly none at all. He can maintain no staff, lease no theater, and gather no useful store of scenery, lighting equipment, or props. He exists through alternate periods of inactivity and bursts of feverish effort, in the course of which latter he pays high salaries to individuals who know that their employment may last only a couple of weeks and spends large sums for materials which may be soon sent to a storehouse where their value immediately sinks to almost nothing. Add the fact that the very nature of the enterprise attracts men who are reckless, impulsive, and changeable, and it is no wonder that, even if we leave out of account the many plays abandoned after try-outs, something like 70 per cent of those which reach Broadway during a good season close with a net loss for the producer or his backers.

Many of the remedies commonly suggested are more or less utopian, or at least imply a change in popular psychology which no one knows how to bring about. Of course it would be more economical if theaters were scattered over the city and built in regions where rents are cheaper than they are on Broadway—but experience has shown that the public will not seek such theaters out. Of course a genuine repertory theater can be run more economically than theaters managed under the present system can be run—but the American public does not want "standard" plays and will not patronize a repertory company. No theater off the beaten track has been financially successful, and admirable as is the work done by Miss Le Gallienne's Civic Repertory Theater, even it must be run at a loss because of the low prices charged.

So far as the immediate future is concerned, it will not, I think, see the American theater "saved" by any radical change in theatergoing habits. We are not going to have repertory theaters dominating the scene, we are not going to have the theaters built in cheaper sections, and we are not going to have state theaters. Even the various experimental groups—the little theaters, the summer repertory companies which operate in the country, and the like—will continue, I think, to be as they have been in the past merely experimental, and hence important largely because of what can be absorbed from them into the commercial theater. Even that ideal producing organization hinted at above—one, that is to say, in which a permanent company and staff are employed to produce a definitely planned-for series of productions—is not likely to be more than approximated, because there are various difficulties in the way—notably and above all the difficulty of securing suitable scripts with suitable regularity.

But if the depression continues, some changes will nevertheless have to take place. Theater rents will have to come down and so probably will labor costs—at least in proportion to the reduction which has already been made in actors' salaries. Finally and most important of all, the manager will have to manage more efficiently. In the past he has fixed his eye on big profits, and with the possibility of several hundred thousand dollars dangling before his eyes he has not been inclined to consider the difference between ten and twenty thousand dollars in production costs very important. In the future he may, like all other business men, have to think more seriously of that small margin which can make the difference between a reasonable profit and a definite loss.

It may seem a very unsensational conclusion to reach after a rather long consideration, but the chief trouble with the show business is a kind of extravagant recklessness which was generated partly by the traditionally hectic atmosphere of the theater and partly by the excitement of boom times. Perhaps our actors and playwrights have had too little temperament, but our producers have generally had too much. What we need in their department is not less commercialism but more—at least of a certain kind. Your manager ought, of course, to know a good play when he sees it, and it is doubtless a good thing if he cares enough for the art of the theater to want to put on the best manuscript he can find. But once he has selected his play he ought to become a business man first of all and to conduct his enterprise as a good business man would conduct it. Efficiency, care, executive ability become his great assets. The smoother things run and the less temperament interferes, the less wasteful the production will be. And in the end the audience will profit.

Don't Overlook Philadelphia!

By SAUL CARSON

GREAT things have been happening in the State of Grundy and Pinchot, in the city of Penn and Atterbury. But the press, preoccupied with New York's achievements in the field of city government, has given Pennsylvania little notice. New York is stirred by its Mayor's large bank accounts and its Mayor's accountant's disappearance. The bank accounts of some of our State officials are entirely overlooked. New York exercises itself over mere attempts to grab monopolies in buses and taxicabs. In Pennsylvania we give such things away and make no fuss about it. New York has discovered that one of its municipal officers held a mere few thousand dollars' worth of shares in a bronze company that had somehow something to do with city contracts. We have a former Mayor who admits being on the pay roll of the transit trust while he was chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board; and our Attorney-General apparently sees nothing wrong in such a connection with the transit trust—perhaps because the Attorney-General, too, has taken fees from the same trust while working for the State.

Enough of comparisons. Let us speak of the State of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia in their own right. In Pennsylvania the late chairman of our Public Service Commission, William D. B. Ainey, who headed that body from the time of its organization in 1915 until very recently, was accused of accepting $150,000 from the late Thomas E. Mitten. The latter headed Philadelphia's unified system of street cars, subways, elevated railways, buses, and taxicabs. Chairman Ainey entered a vigorous denial. But just as a special committee of the State senate was assembling to investigate the charges, Mr. Ainey resigned. Did the senate committee lay the resignation on the table and dig into the accusations? Not Pennsylvania. The senate accepted the resignation forthwith.

Another former member of the Public Service Commission, James S. Benn, banked $650,000 in ten years, during which time his salary totaled $100,000. In a period of a year and a half Mr. Benn bought government bonds which cost him $129,000. His salary during that period did not exceed $15,000. Governor Pinchot, apparently thinking that Mr. Benn's deposits and Mr. Ainey's income might have had something to do with increased rates granted public-utility corporations, asked the senate to investigate. And now Pennsylvania has another senate committee, created by a resolution which in its preamble invokes invective against the Governor—presumably for forcing senators to work overtime.

Again, here is a photostatic copy of a check for $100,000, signed by the late Mr. Mitten, indorsed by Mr. Mitten, and paid in cash "to bearer," his confidential secretary. The former secretary, now a free lance, shouts aloud his desire to trace the destination of that cash. The senate committee ignores him.

On the records of our legislature is spread information to the effect that a Mr. Albert M. Greenfield had transferred $736,000 in cash to the late Mr. Mitten. Mr. Mitten, theoretically an employee of the street-car company, had bought for the company a taxicab corporation. We find that the taxicab company he bought for his employers was owned by his own "straw man." So much is known. Where did the $736,000 in cash go? The same former confidential secretary, A. A. Chapman, wants to tell. The senate committee does not want to know.

Or take the case of a politician high in the councils of his fellows, a man who was leader of his ward, representative of his ward on the Republican city committee, candidate for Congress from his district, and holder of a job in the coroner's office, where he controlled much patronage. This man had been intrusted, by virtue of his position in the coroner's office, with administration of 115 estates and trusts. A political opponent made public the information that all had not been right with the man's administration of the various estates. Opponents of the organization had obtained warrants for the man's arrest. The sheriff's office, whose duty it is to serve such warrants, could not find the politician. Of course, the fact that the sheriff was boss of his potential prisoner's Congressional district had nothing to do with the matter. An enterprising attorney finally served the politician with a warrant. There were hearings, delays, adjournments. The man committed suicide, and that matter ended happily for the organization. Not a cent has as yet been recovered for the 115 estates and trusts.

Mayor Harry A. Mackey, from 1915 to 1923, was chairman of the State Workmen's Compensation Board. From 1918 to December, 1925, Mr. Mackey received $1,000 a month as counsel for the Philadelphia Rapid Transit Company. The transit company employs thousands of men. It might be presumed that one or two of these men sprained an ankle or hurt a thumb in those years between 1918 and 1923, when the chairman of the State Workmen's Compensation Board was also an attorney for the street-car company. Was Mr. Mackey culpable in thus accepting pay from the transit company while in that important State position? Not in Pennsylvania. Mr. William A. Schnader, the State Attorney-General, openly forgives Mr. Mackey on the ground that Mr. Mackey had a right to act as attorney for whatever client chose him as counsel. And to clinch his point, Mr. Schnader admits that he too was on the pay roll of the Yellow Cab Company, a subsidiary of the same transit trust, while working for the State as a special deputy attorney-general. His salary? Before Mr. Mitten of the transit company took over the Yellow Cab Company, Mr. Schnader's salary, according to his own statement made to the writer, was $6,000 a year plus 1 per cent of the gross income of the taxicab concern. After Mr. Mitten assumed control of the taxicab company, Mr. Schnader's salary was $12,000 a year—precisely what Mr. Mackey's salary had been. But Mr. Schnader no longer received the 1 per cent of gross income. Mr. Mitten complained throughout that period that his newly acquired Yellow Cab Company was losing money.

New York's doings are more widely publicized than ours. But don't overlook Philadelphia!

Mourning Becomes Herbert

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, September 17

GLOOM, thicker than a London fog, descended on the White House with the Maine election returns. The atmosphere is reminiscent of a funeral parlor or "Mourning Becomes Electra." Secretaries tiptoe about their chores with long faces, politicians make sad entrances and sadder exits, and even the boys in the press room bid small slams in muted tones as Mark Sullivan wipes a furtive tear. The picture of a Great Heart bleeding silently but steadily over the ingratitude of a perverse electorate fills every eye, and it is thoroughly depressing. Is all this grief and foreboding warranted? I think so. Not only is Maine normally Republican by a large majority, but it has suffered far less from the depression than the large industrial centers. The result indicates that the various straw votes—in which Roosevelt has been running far ahead—by no means reflect the full Democratic strength, because all of them have purported to show that Maine was safe for Hoover. Republican workers are discouraged, Democratic workers are correspondingly stimulated, and wavering voters are prompted to hop on the band-wagon. Still more important, perhaps, is the influence on campaign contributors. No one wants to bet on a dead horse; on the other hand, those with money to give are eager to expend it in behalf of the candidate who will be in a position later to reward them. The question of funds at Republican headquarters was acute already; the Maine disaster has aggravated it. For some time the Democrats have been hinting that their adversaries would be so unscrupulous as to use the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to amass a campaign chest. Recently a Washington bank obtained a loan of $600,000 from that institution, and a few days later the bank loaned $15,000 to the Republican National Committee. However, the head of the bank assures me positively that the two transactions were not related, and I believe him—believe it or not.

* * * * *

THUS far it seems obvious that Roosevelt is winning votes on his Western tour, but if he has accomplished any higher purpose I have been unable to discern it. For example, his Topeka speech on the farm problem undoubtedly will cause a lot of farmers to vote for him, but whether it contributed anything to a solution of the farm problem is questionable. To me it bore a disturbing resemblance to the addresses on the same subject delivered in 1928 by the Honorable Herbert Hoover. He also promised to mobilize the best talent and attack the problem from every angle. His program eventuated, as everyone knows, in the government losing more than a quarter of a billion dollars speculating in the grain and cotton markets. It seemed to me that Friendly Frank was hinting to the farmers that he was for the equalization fee, while avoiding an open statement to that effect. After all, the fee plan is not wholly disreputable: Owen D. Young has indorsed it, and—take it from a reporter who covered the Senate investigation of the radio trust—Owen D. is no red radical. The fact is that Roosevelt enjoys a tremendous political advantage in the fact that the country knows Hoover, and knows precisely what to expect if he is reelected. He enjoys another tremendous advantage in the fact that his personality is pleasing, that he has a sense of humor, and that obviously he is a very decent fellow. When he is placed beside the sour and devious Hoover the contrast is almost startling. Nevertheless, it might be reassuring to hear him tell just where he does stand on the pressing issues (excepting prohibition) of the campaign. The fact that Hoover won't is all the more reason why Roosevelt should. Indeed, all participants in a Presidential race should be prohibited from wearing gumshoes.

* * * * *

TO be awakened from one's dreams by the coughing of gassed babies must be rather terrifying. The Administration's incredible attempt to persuade the country (and possibly itself) that the ragged men, women, and children who were bombed out of Washington on the dreadful midnight of July 28 included "an extraordinary proportion of criminal and Communist elements," can be attributed only to stark panic. Aside from that mad adventure, Attorney-General Mitchell's tortuous effort to justify it must be set down as the deadliest blunder of the campaign. The vision and tact of the Administration are fairly measured by the circumstances that an episode which was planned as a master campaign stroke became within a month the source of its deepest anxiety. But the lie factory simply cannot turn out a finished product. With all his boasted glibness Mitchell's performance succeeded no better than those of Hurley, Joslin, and Davison. His principal accomplishment was to draw from Chief of Police Glassford a complete and devastating reply, showing that there was less crime in Washington while the veterans were here than after the expulsion, and that the percentage of veterans indicted for actual crimes was vastly smaller than that of the Harding Cabinet to which Mr. Hoover belonged, or even of Hoover's own original Cabinet. (Twenty per cent of the Harding Cabinet was indicted; 10 per cent of the original Hoover Cabinet has been indicted.) Considering what the unemployed veterans and their families had already suffered, the meanness of the effort to paint them as criminals is shocking. That anyone could expect to make political capital out of such an effort is inexplicable. I note that the gallant Hurley, after twice exposing himself to the boos of the American Legion convention, slunk out of Portland, but before departing he declared on his "word of honor" that not a single veteran's shack was fired by the troops. Concerning the quality of Pat's "honor" I am uncertain, but I am quite certain that the troops took drums of kerosene to Pennsylvania Avenue and Anacostia, and that soon after their arrival at the first camp an infantryman entered a drug-store and purchased a carton of matches. However, my testimony is not needed. At the moment when Hurley was pledging his "word of honor," the War Department was in possession of an affidavit by Private Thomas E. Davis, Company M, Twelfth Infantry, stating that he fired huts at Third and Pennsylvania avenues by order of his commanding officer. On top of this comes a statement from General Moseley, who is acting as Chief of Staff while the valiant MacArthur parades his decorations before the astounded natives of Prague and Warsaw. "We have nothing to apologize for," says General Moseley. "The huts were fired by troops in reserve. Troops were in waves. The last wave was ordered to burn down the hovels." The preceding waves, it should be added, had gone through with bayonets and tear gas. To oust Glassford for telling the truth would be an act of fright and desperation, but any policeman will testify that there is no one so dangerous as a coward with a gun.

* * * * *

ALTHOUGH Ogden Mills undoubtedly is a much abler man than his predecessor in the Treasury, he seems to have inherited Uncle Andy's ineptitude at estimating the federal revenues. When the Senate, during the last session, accepted Ogden's schedule of new taxes, we were told emphatically that the nation was assured of "a balanced budget." Indeed, I clearly recall that May day when Mills, emerging triumphantly from an executive session of the Senate Finance Committee, informed the poor, ignorant reporters in the anteroom that his "peace offering" had been accepted, and that the added levies would yield $1,025,000,000 in new annual revenue, which would meet the approximate requirements of the government. A tremendous sigh of relief issued from each reportorial breast. For months we had (at a modest wage) followed the Administration's heroic efforts to "balance the budget." Alas for optimism! It now appears that there is a Treasury deficit of approximately $400,000,000 for the first sixty days of the new fiscal year. Consequently, the next session of Congress must again face the job of increasing taxes and reducing expenditures. Nevertheless, it seems to me that Mills has a sound alibi. When one man is suddenly required to perform the same campaign services that were performed four years earlier by William E. Borah and Charles Evans Hughes, he cannot waste much time on figures.

Skimmed Milk and Watered Stocks

By E. R. McINTYRE

THERE are two kinds of stock in the dairy business as it is conducted today. One is the stock that produces the milk, the other is the stock that produces profits. The old wheeze about watering the milk applies exactly to the methods adopted by the officials and controllers of the dominant dairy trusts of America, who are in a position to water their gilt-edge paper stock much more effectively than any farmer could ever water his milk.

The reason why the stock of the principal national dairy trusts has been such a good investment lies in the hold they have upon all the centralized metropolitan and subsidiary markets, plus the unorganized state of dairy production, with its so-called "bargaining" cooperatives which agree to the ineffectual and harmful systems of price determination largely in vogue. The consumer has little to do with it, since the rate of consumption, except for the producer, seldom alters the general situation.

The system of holding-company finance has converted many local officers of distributing companies into outright speculators. These men, who were on the ground floor when the process began, took advantage of the chance to exchange stock in the operating company for holding-company shares, and have been playing the spot market ever since for all possible gains.

As a result, even those managers who were once rather close to farmers and shared with them the rise and fall in the fortunes of the dairy business, have long since, by means of stock manipulation, ceased to plod the slow pathway traveled by their cow-owning associates. An official of a milk-distributing company in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, began to invest in his company's stock fifteen years ago. His first real harvest came when a national chain became the holding company and he traded in his stock for a share in the bigger venture. Special audits have shown that during a period of eight years profits, accruals, and increment on 1,000 shares in his name have brought him total profits of $450,000. Aside from his direct salary, which was a generous one, this particular "milk man" has netted an average of $50,000 a year in stock values and cash dividends, including a profit of $32,000 through the sale of a few hundred shares in 1930. It is not likely that he worried much about the producers during this interval of rapid accumulation.

So much for 1,000 shares of stock. How did 1,000 head of stock contributing to the same business pay out in that period? One thousand cows owned by about fifty dairy farmers, according to the usual size of a herd in the Milwaukee area, yielded during the same period of eight years about 60 hundredweight of milk each per year, or 60,000 hundredweight. The net farm price of milk averaged $2 for 100 pounds, of which only $1 represented net profit above feed and labor costs, making a profit of $60,000 a year for eight years, or a total of $480,000. But this sum divided among fifty farmers meant a yield of only $9,600 for each farmer for eight years, or $1,200 a year per farmer. Furthermore, the taxes on farm equipment and live stock of the producers who were netting $1,200 a year had to be paid each and every year, while the speculators who were making $50,000 a year in paper stock were always able to deduct dividends received from the corporation in making out their income-tax returns.

It has been truly said that farmers themselves cannot erect and long maintain a monopoly in any common food commodity; but it is easily possible for organized groups of farmers situated as the fluid-milk producers are to become unwitting and helpless cogs in a flawless and well-oiled machine of privately managed profit-taking corporations.

Since 1920 the movement to gain absolute control of the distribution of all fluid milk and dairy commodities within the principal metropolitan consuming centers has proceeded with consummate success. Today about five chain organizations dominate the distribution of milk, cream, butter, and cheese throughout the leading cities of the Northern and Western States. They have within their control and dictate to a great degree the market for nearly 10 per cent of the intensive producers of raw material. The remaining 90 per cent feel indirectly the effect of this control, and they actually lose money when surplus milk by-products are thrown back upon them from the fluid-milk centers to depress and narrow their prices for condensed milk, butter, sweet cream, and cheese.

Within the past decade a national federation of fluid-milk producers has been formed to seek mutual protection in legislation, and to exchange price quotations and experience in collective bargaining, market conditions, and standards. In a few cases member associations have taken hold of the distribution of the milk as well as its production, but as a rule the procedure is to bargain with private dealers on price and to work out systems of regulating the supply. In most cases they are obliged to deal with members of a chain. Owing to the quality demands of the leading fluid-milk markets, the member producers surrounding those markets have found production costs higher for them than for producers in outlying zones where milk goes to cheese factories, creameries, and condenseries. Hence the rule has been for the association to set a higher base price for the milk used in the city's bottled supply and to sell the remainder at a surplus price somewhere near the prevailing butter-fat quotation.

In times like these the maintenance of such an artificial price margin in places adjacent to large supplies of manufactured-price milk has been almost as difficult as to dam Niagara Falls. But at this point the obliging civic-ordinance committees and boards of health have stepped in, to throw a screen around the milk shed. This development has been hailed at times by cooperative producers as a form of protection for the industry. But it is a very flexible screen. When milk is scarce and dealers want to import it in tank cars from long distances, the health authorities conveniently issue inspection permits. When consumption lags and milk is plentiful close to the city, the same authority is invoked to shut out the very milk it had admitted before. The chief beneficiary of this elastic system is the dealer.

Armed with local authority and backed by high finance, the operating companies that control each local zone are able to arrange that whatever money may at times be lost on whole-milk distribution is easily doubled and trebled in profits on commodities derived from low-cost surplus milk. The following example of procedure is typical—I have used specific prices prevailing in Milwaukee as of June, 1932.

The base price for fluid milk was $1.75 and the surplus price was 55 cents per 100 pounds, less the hauling charge of 20 cents per 100. A large share of all the surplus milk was utilized by the dealer as sweet cream. The retail selling price of cream testing 22 per cent was 13 cents a half-pint or $2.08 a gallon. For the cream which the dealer sold for $2.08 a gallon to consumers, the cost price was 29 cents, for the reason that in one gallon of 22 per cent cream there are 1.84 pounds of fat. Since 100 pounds of 3.5 per cent milk bought from farmers cost 55 cents, the cost of each pound of fat was only 15.7 cents. The difference between the dealer's sale price of $2.08 and the 29 cents which was the cost price represents $1.79 gross profit, or 86 per cent of the sales price—a handsome profit in 1932.

To illustrate the process in another illuminating way: Each 100 pounds of 3.5 per cent milk cost the dealer 55 cents, but the farmer had to pay 20 cents for hauling and 2 cents more for his association dues and advertising fund, leaving him 33 cents net. The dealer averaged 1.89 gallons of 22 per cent cream from each 100 pounds of milk. Sold in half-pints, the value to the dealer of this surplus milk was $3.94 gross minus 55 cents cost price, or $3.39 gross margin. Thus, the dealer's income from the 100 pounds of milk was eleven times as much as the producer's. At that rate, the farmer member of a cooperative "bargaining" association got exactly 11 cents for a sixteen-quart pail of milk, leaving the dealer free to skim off the cream in more ways than one.

When the dealer finds that he has an excess amount of cream left over from this surplus milk that the "bargaining" farmers have delivered to him for 55 cents, perhaps he makes some butter out of it. Or maybe he ships the cream into another market. In either event he helps to ruin the market for the outlying farmers beyond the limits of his own milk shed. He could really afford to dump it after taking such a heavy margin, but that, of course, is not the way of a highly efficient national chain.

What is to be done about this destructive price-juggling system? Everyone who is aware of the true state of affairs wants to know. Commissions and bureaus set up by some States, and in league with the Federal Farm Board's dairy-market experts, have no answer for it. Their only counsel to militant dairymen suffering under this monstrous maladjustment is "Remember your responsibility to your own market." When the producers' association in the St. Louis milk shed was battling with a stubborn private distributor in 1931, the managers of one of the dairy chains shipped milk from northern Wisconsin down into Missouri to break the farmers' small vestige of control. Responsibility ought to work both ways, but there seems to be no determination or power resting with the "saviors" of agriculture to prevent its being abused by the milk trust.

To provide an adequate supply of pure milk at reasonable prices is one of the greatest social questions of the age. If milk is a universal, indispensable food, then its sound economic position becomes a universal, inescapable problem for all. Equitably managed, the industry would easily weather the economic storm. Big dairy mergers have contributed better sanitation to the milk business, but so have intensive dairymen producing the raw material under severe regulations to hold their markets. Big dairy mergers have put thrift and business acumen into the improvement of the enterprise; but so have dairy farmers in breeding better cattle and keeping careful records. Big dairy mergers have expanded the capital structure and equipment of their plants and services; but thousands of dairymen have done relatively as much on far less means.

In many sections of the West dairymen, panic-stricken at getting only 50 cents a 100 pounds and pressed by debts and family needs, are breaking through to the consumer with so-called "bootleg" milk and cream. Wild schemes of milk-pooling and dumping are afloat among farmers, price wars are imminent, strikes and even violence have ensued.

Daring plans for taking control of the distribution of city milk by farmers' companies so as to escape the toll taken by the monopoly in salaries, stocks, and dividends are usually frustrated through lack of capital or experience. Furthermore, the erection of added new distributing facilities at extra expense might not result in victory but only plunge the producers deeper into difficulties.

Appeals to the various existing market outlets in the interests of stability for the dairy industry have fallen on deaf ears. The milk dealers are competing as far as getting cheap milk is concerned, but they are thoroughly agreed among themselves to keep the upper hand and to throttle all initiative or understanding among farmers. Consumers are chiefly interested at present in cheaper milk; dealers are concerned mostly with stocks and margins. The farmer's only resort lies in appeal to a thoughtless public. Some degree of stability must somehow be achieved in the dairy business or the whole industry may turn sour.

If the distributors will stop their effort to prevent producers from controlling their own products to the market entrance; if they will recognize that producers share in the good-will of the consumers and are equally jealous of keeping it; if the dealers will remember that the farmer has a real concern in good distribution and fair labor costs; and if and when the producers find that they are not obliged to pay swollen dividends out of shallow pockets toward an over-capitalized system—then perhaps the dairy industry will become stabilized.

In the Driftway

MOST of the world has learned to cherish rivers. In France particularly they are treasured by the cities through which they happen to flow. The classic example, of course, is Paris, where the Seine and its bridges play such a vital part in the life of the city. In the mind as well as on postcards, Paris is more often than not remembered in terms of the Seine and its ever-changing aspects. The Drifter's most persistent memory of that charmed city is of his first arrival there. He was fortunate enough to enter at the Gare Quai d'Orsay at sunset, when the river, its embankments, and the domes of Paris as far as the eye could see were bathed in rosy light. Likewise he remembers a picnic he once witnessed on the little island which lies under one of the long bridges across the Seine—the Pont Neuf if he remembers correctly. A party consisting of mère and père, two children, and a mild gray cat led by a string took up what seemed accustomed places against the embankment, next to the stream, opened a basket, and settled down for a quiet supper on the quiet bank of a beautiful river in the middle of one of the world's greatest cities.

* * * * *

RIVERS have played a tremendous part in the development of America, and probably no country has so many beautiful streams. But rivers in this country, outside the remotest mountains, are used almost exclusively for commercial purposes. In an American city, the river, like the railroad, runs through the most unsightly part; it is a dumping place for refuse and for human derelicts as well. And imagine a picnic beside one of our finest rivers, the Hudson, in our largest city, New York. For most of the island's length, of course, it is impossible to get near the river. Commerce owns it all. When finally the piers end and the river comes into view, it is cut off by the track of a railroad that owns the river bank for miles. And even if one could get to its shores, it would be unsafe to use it even for bathing for the reason that the largest modern city in the world dumps its sewage in Hendrik Hudson's river to be carried out to sea, polluting a dozen bathing beaches as it goes.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■

A RIVER is one of nature's finest manifestations. There is no more pleasant or reassuring accompaniment to life than a stream running steadily past one's door. Continuity and permanence, variety and peace, all are to be found in the daily life of a river. One of the Drifter's settlings down will certainly be on the edge of a broad stream or a swift brook which will carry off his cares every night and bring him fresh delights, including brook trout, each morning. Until that time, he is willing to be a charter and fighting member of any good Society for the Rescue of American Rivers.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The System Is Doomed

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to take vigorous exception to the closing remarks in your article Free Trade at Ottawa, in your issue of August 31, in which you say: "The British Empire cannot help itself at the expense of world trade. Both must prosper together, and that can be achieved, not by partitioning markets, but by lowering artificial trade barriers." This is on all fours with the argument so often made that this country should lower its tariff sufficiently to permit other nations to send us goods with which to pay their debts and to enable us to rehabilitate our export trade.

Have you ever stopped to consider that each capitalist country has a surplus production which its workers are unable to consume because of their insufficient income, and which the capitalists in spite of their riotous standard of living are likewise unable to absorb? Can you not see that it would be piling Pelion on Ossa to admit the production of other countries into the already overburdened home market?

That is the trouble with the capitalist system today. It is in a dilemma from which it cannot escape; no amount of tariff tinkering will solve the problem of markets for the surplus production of the workers. No matter what the capitalists, their political henchmen, or their editorial advisers may say or do, the system is doomed. Its extinction is only a matter of years.

Montvale, N. J., August 31

OTTO DITTMANN

Thomas for President

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will those people in Cincinnati and immediate vicinity who are interested in the candidacy of Norman Thomas for President get in touch with me, either by mail or telephone, with a view to organizing a non-Socialist committee to aid in his election? My address is 845 Dayton Street, Cincinnati. Telephone: West 0983-W.

Cincinnati, August 31

MARY D. BRITE

For Tom Mooney

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On August 14, the last day of the Olympic games, during a lull after the awards of victory, six boys and girls ran around the track wearing banners bearing the words, Free Tom Mooney. They reached their seats again and were arrested, while the final event, the parade of the nations, proceeded.

Through the courage of these young people the world heard at least one protest against the imprisonment of Tom Mooney. The names of a great many intellectual leaders who also protest against this injustice are mounted on signs at Olive Hill, Hollywood, but that is a silent protest and a safe one. Youth is more direct.

After a trial lasting two weeks and marked from start to finish by shocking bias, the court gave the defendants the maximum sentences, 90 days and 180 days, to run consecutively. In addition, Meyer Baylin was given a jail sentence of 100 days because of contempt of court and Ethel Dell a sentence of 50 days. To show how thorough he is, the judge, who is an appointee of Governor Rolph, set bail at $1,000 pending appeal.

Los Angeles, August 31

N. HIGMAN

Young Progressive League

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Having realized the necessity of a strong liberal youth movement in this nation, we have formed the Young Progressive League. The purpose of the league is to acquaint its members with the true facts and then to fight for the election of progressive men and women.

Young people between the ages of thirteen and sixteen may become members regardless of sex, race, creed, or nationality. Perhaps some of your younger readers who are already interested in current affairs may wish to join or at any rate receive information regarding this organization. If so, they should address me at 896 Fox Street. Information will gladly be sent them and their interest will be appreciated.

New York, August 31

IRVING ELLENTUCK

False Economy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We wish to call to your attention the situation that exists among the teachers of New York City. There are at present 10,000 unemployed teachers, of whom 5,000 have been denied licenses through the elimination tests of the Board of Education. The Board of Education has not made any appointments for the coming term, and it is probable that it will not make any appointments during the year 1933. Three hundred and ten teachers licensed in 1928 will lose their licenses this December. If the board continues its present policy, there is a great danger that all those teachers on subsequent lists will also lose their licenses and never be appointed. Furthermore, the board has announced that it will not give any teacher examinations in 1933, thus preventing those who have failed in the elimination tests from repeating them. Four hundred teachers who have held "permanent substitute" positions have lost these positions because of the board's policy of consolidating and increasing the register of classes. This increase in the pupil load will not only create more difficult tasks for the teachers employed, but will also very seriously hamper their efficiency. Thus, the sufferers are not only the employed and unemployed teachers, but the 1,000,000 school children as well.

In this situation it is imperative that the city and State governments immediately take measures to remedy these conditions. In the coming State elections, in which one of the major issues will be economy in the government, it should be the task of the political parties to insure that these economies shall not be effected at the expense of the educational system and the teachers.

The Unemployed Teachers Association calls upon the political parties to include in their State and local platforms the following planks:

1. No economies in education at the expense of the school children and the teachers.
2. Appointment of all teachers before their licenses expire.
3. Immediate relief at the expense of the State for all unemployed teachers, licensed or unlicensed.
4. Reduction of class registers throughout the school system to a maximum of thirty.

UNEMPLOYED TEACHERS ASSOCIATION

New York, September 1

Lectures on Russia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Nation readers in San Francisco and the Bay district will be interested to know that the American-Russian Institute for Cultural Relations between the two countries, founded here on the initiative of Dr. Ralph Reynolds, is planning a series of lectures under the auspices of the institute by people who have visited Russia. The series will begin in the present month with a lecture by Mrs. Lincoln Steffens (Ella Winter). It is expected that one lecture of this kind will be given each month during the season.

The institute, occupying Room 210, Woman's City Club, 465 Post Street, near the St. Francis Hotel, San Francisco, will be open every week day. It has on hand a number of books dealing with various phases of Russian culture under the U. S. S. R., exhibits of art under the Soviet, et cetera. The educational exhibit (Russian) now being shown at branches of the institute in the East will later on be brought to San Francisco.

Nation readers living in this region can help promote wider knowledge of Soviet cultural achievement by bringing their friends to the institute headquarters and securing programs of its activities. Mrs. Rose Isaak is now in charge and will gladly give whatever information may be desired.

WILLIAM THURSTON BROWN

San Francisco, September 10

Prohibition Ballyhoo

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The ballyhoo about the resubmission of the Eighteenth Amendment seems to me to be a waste of time and energy. All the votes for resubmission are futile. There is only one way to repeal the amendment and that is to submit a new one by a two-thirds' vote of Congress and send it to the States for ratification. All this talk about resubmission only serves to blind the people to the real issue before the nation—and that is our economic conditions. I hope The Nation will see it in that light and show it up.

Cleveland, Ohio, August 16

B. F. THOMPSON

For the Defense of Political Prisoners

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The California branch of the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners is fighting police terrorism, political imprisonment, and discrimination against political prisoners within the walls of San Quentin and Folsom, and also cooperating to aid the Scottsboro victims.

It has been instrumental in securing the release on parole of three of the Imperial Valley prisoners within the last month. Tetsuji Hariuchi, who was scheduled for deportation to Japan, was saved from imprisonment or death in that country by a change of destination to Soviet Russia. The committee raised the funds for his passage.

All Californians desiring to assist in this work are requested to send funds to Anita Whitney, Treasurer, 74 Macon-dray Lane, San Francisco. Information as to local conditions would also be welcomed.

San Francisco, August 21

ORRICK JOHNS

The World Jewish Congress

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial comment on the World Jewish Conference in your issue of September 14 indicates a complete lack of understanding of the conference and congress and of the opposition to both, which is unworthy of The Nation. The mere use of the terms world Jewish conference and world congress is misleading, inasmuch as they imply that world Jewry is represented at these conclaves. As a matter of record, the opposition far outnumbers the supporters.

You unjustly impugn the opposition by giving it credit for little courage and less intelligence, failing to see that as much courage was required in keeping off the congress band-wagon as in hitching on, and that honest and sound reasoning might just as well have led Jews to oppose the conference as to uphold it. As a publication known for presenting honest analyses of important problems and exposing shams, The Nation ought to go into this question more deeply.

New York, September 14

ALBERT ALLEN

Contributors to This Issue

JOHN GUNTHER is Vienna correspondent of the Chicago Daily News.

SAUL CARSON is a member of the staff of the Philadelphia Evening Ledger and author of a biography of Spinoza which will be published this year.

E. R. MCINTYRE is editor of a Wisconsin farm journal. C. HARTLEY GRATTAN is the author of "Why We Fought."

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN is the author of "Samuel Butler."

LIONEL TRILLING is now teaching at Columbia University. MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is in the department of anthropology at Northwestern University.

BENJAMIN GINZBURG is the author of "The Adventure of Science."

ARTHUR WARNER, a contributing editor of The Nation, is author of "A Landlubber's Log."

MEET TODAY'S CHALLENGE WITH UNDERSTANDING

Keep posted this winter on Current Events in politics and international affairs.

Know the recent trends in psychology and philosophy; in literature and the fine arts.

Hear interesting topics of the times discussed by world-famous personalities.

Problems of Today—

NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER, OGDEN L. MILLS, GLENN FRANK, HARRY A. OVERSTREET ("A Philosophy for Today," 6 lectures); EDWARD A. FILENE, JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH, LEWIS MUMFORD, JOHN DEWEY, HOUSTON PETERSON ("Epic Visions of the Modern World," 4 lectures), etc.

International Affairs—

MAURICE HINDUS, RICHARD VON KUHLMANN, JULIUS CURTIUS, GEORGE SOKOLSKY, CARLETON BEALS, etc.

Literature—

JOHN DRINKWATER ("Literature and Life," 4 lectures); JOHN ERSKINE ("American Spokesmen," 5 lectures); LOUIS ANSPACHER ("Shakespeare, Man of His Hour," 4 lectures); DOROTHY CANFIELD, RUPERT HUGHES, EVA LE GALLIENNE, WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS, etc.

The Arts—

WALTER PACH ("Trends in Modern Art," 4 lectures); EUGENE STEINHOF ("Architecture and Space," 2 lectures); DANIEL GREGORY MASON ("Great Composers," 4 lecture-recitals); JOHN MARTIN, MARTHA GRAHAM, DORIS HUMPHREY, AGNES DEMILLE, CHARLES WEIDMAN ("The Modern Dance in America," 1 lecture-recital); etc.

Science and Exploration—

ALBERT EDWARD WIGGAM ("Biology in Human Affairs," 4 lectures); DR. ARTHUR COMPTON, ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS, JULIAN HUXLEY, FATHER HUBBARD, "the glacier priest"; HERBERT SPENCER DICKEY, etc.

Member's Annual Ticket $15 ($25 for two) admits to nearly 200 events, held in the evening from mid-October until April 1st, in McMillin Academic Theater, corner of Broadway and 116th St.

Send this clipping, with your name and address for Complete Announcement.

THE INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

Columbia University, N. Y.

Do you wish to keep WELL-INFORMED?

In the following lecture courses offered by the School of Adult Education, lies an excellent opportunity to keep abreast of modern thought, and continue one's education in the cultural aspects of life. The only academic admission requirement is an alert and open mind.

An Approach to Shakespeare

How to Read the New Books

How the Modern Writers are Doing

How to Enjoy the Theatre

A Survey of Modern Fiction

Psychology Today

Abnormal Psychology and Mental Hygiene

Social Problems

Philosophies of Life

Philosophies of Civilization and History

An Introduction to the Music Dramas of Richard Wagner

A Survey of Symphonic Music

India (yesterday, today, and tomorrow)

Oriental Literature

The Appreciation and History of Art

Fee for each $15

GENERAL CULTURAL COURSES, conducted along the same lines as the usual college courses, are also offered in these and other subjects:

Personality Study

Elementary Public Speaking

Radio Speaking

Speech Improvement

Woman's Law Class

Introduction to English and American Literature

Reading Course in French

Reading Course in German

Fee for each $20

COMMERCIAL COURSES offered in:

Principles of Bookkeeping

Principles of Typewriting

Principles of Isaac Pitman

Shorthand

Principles of Gregg Shorthand

Advanced Shorthand Dictation and Transcription

Fee for each $20

Registration from September 6—26 from 9 A. M. to 8 P. M. in the Main Building at 32 Waverly Place

For bulletin with full description of courses, address

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION DIVISION

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY

107 Washington Square East

New York City

Books, Drama, Films

Epilogue

By FRANCES FROST

When under a sky more savage than a hawk,
The woods are a pattern of sorrow and secret dawn,
Then is my soul, of wounds and inward war,
Cleansed by the driven image of the sun.

And I am witness of the shape of love
Which, like that planet, burns above the storm:
Excessive fire, by midnight unremoved
From a constant heaven radiant and warm.

Then is the enduring ecstasy revealed
Where the homesick heart's four stricken quarters were,
While morning breaks in full triumphant flood
Upon this patient, earthen, and leafless star.

Another Charlotte Brontë

Charlotte Brontë. By E. F. Benson. Longmans, Green and Company. $4.

FOR three-quarters of a century the image of Charlotte Brontë which has existed in the mind of readers of the English novel has been the image placed there by Mrs. Gaskell in 1857. Mr. Benson, who after careful examination of the Brontë documents, adds to and subtracts from that picture, would be the first to admit that Mrs. Gaskell's memoir presented on the whole a faithful picture of life as it was lived in the remote parsonage on the moors. Mrs. Gaskell said that it was a bleak and unfriendly life, one which quite understandably could have nourished the strange genius of Emily and have encouraged the pathological shyness of all three of the sisters. And when Mr. Benson has finished his story, the life is still bleak and unfriendly, the moors seem an altogether proper environment, Emily is still strange, and Charlotte is still pathologically shy.

At two important points, however, Mr. Benson and Mrs. Gaskell differ. The latter dutifully described the years that Charlotte spent in Brussels at the Pensionnat Héger. But although she carefully read all of Charlotte's letters written during that time, including four vital ones to M. Paul Héger, and even quoted from some of them, she left out the supremely interesting fact, to students of the Brontës and particularly to readers of "Villette," that Charlotte, the reserved, the shy, the inarticulate, had undergone a period of torture as a result of her unrequited love for her schoolmaster. Nor is it hard to understand why Mrs. Gaskell left out this astonishing period in the life of her heroine. She was writing shortly after Charlotte's death, while the Reverend Arthur Nichols, Charlotte's husband, and the Reverend Patrick Brontë, her father, were still alive. They knew not a word of the pitiful love story, of Charlotte's importunities and of M. Héger's stony lack of response. What is the faithful biographer to do in such a case? Mrs. Gaskell, by her unguarded and careless statements on several other points, got herself threatened with more than one libel action. But in the Héger matter she simply was silent. After seventy-five years, Mr. Benson need be less scrupulous; and a highly important episode in Charlotte Brontë's life can be revealed to us.

The other interesting point developed by Mr. Benson concerns the authorship of "Wuthering Heights." By careful study of the existing documents, including letters from Branwell Brontë, the only brother, who came to such an unhappy end, he develops with considerable persuasion the theory that Branwell was the author at least of the first two chapters of Emily's unforgettable story. This does not detract in the least from its wild, triumphant power, but it helps to explain certain inconsistencies in style and an otherwise inexplicably awkward plot structure. Emily remains Emily. Mr. Benson makes her even more reserved, more silent. He effectively explodes Mrs. Gaskell's pretty story of the intimacy that existed between Emily and Charlotte. Anne was Emily's confidante; for Branwell, unlike the intransigent Charlotte, Emily had always pity and gentleness. When she was dying and Charlotte was full of loving eagerness to nurse her she would have no nursing. Charlotte's description of this last proud illness is worth quoting, both for the facts it reveals about both of them and because it is Charlotte's style at its best:

Never in all her life had she lingered over any task that lay before her, and she did not linger now. She sank rapidly, she made haste to leave us. Yet while physically she perished, mentally she grew stronger than we had yet known her. Day by day, when I saw with what a front she met suffering, I looked on her with an anguish of love and wonder. The awful point was that while full of ruth for others, on herself she had no pity: the spirit was inexorable to the flesh: from the trembling hand, the unnerved limbs, the faded eye, the same service was exacted as in health. To stand by and witness this and not dare to remonstrate was a pain no words can render. . . .

A strange pair, a strange household, a strange flower of genius that bloomed there for a short while. Mr. Benson recreates it all with admirable skill, with evident care, with reserve yet with a proper eloquence.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Sunday Paper

The Family Circle. By André Maurois. Translated from the French by Hamish Miles. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

THE longest novel that André Maurois has written is unusually easy to read and unusually hard to summarize. It moves with a legerity that is characteristically French; indeed, it conforms almost perfectly to the popular notion of what a French novel should be. Yet for all the finesse and clarity of its individual parts, it lacks as a whole the first ingredient that would seem to be presupposed in such a work, i. e., unity. For example, I am unable to explain exactly what the title means, though I am aware that it is vaguely ironical. The story is supposed to be a psychological study of a woman whose life is poisoned because in childhood she discovers her mother's unfaithfulness to her father, and who ends by inflicting the selfsame torture upon her daughter. Yet one needs only half an eye to see that Denise Herpain and her "complex" serve M. Maurois merely as a convention, somewhat like the plot of a musical comedy, while he seeks to hold his audience with other legerdemain. He is far too astute a showman to expect the members of the best-seller public to be kept entertained these days by a "straight" psychological study of an adulteress, à la Flaubert. So we allow the feature film, as it were, to drift into the background, and settle back to follow the newsreel flashes of intellectual chatter, especially designed for the populace, that take command of the screen. A statistical analysis, I believe, would show a preponderance of the book's pages devoted to this chatter, for it enters much of the "narrative" as well. It covers every conceivable topic of the day, from Proust to Hoover, from unemployment to romanticism.

In the secret ballot personal grievances play a much greater part than abstract principles. In the secret ballot the desire to catch a train is put before the salvation of Europe. . . .

. . . and what I aim at showing is that we are God's Robots. . . . It's a fine idea, Bertrand. You must write the play.

But do you imagine that communism would bring the slightest relief, say, to England's troubles? Communism, my dear fellow, would mean the end of England.

Hullo, you have Pilniak's book about the Volga. I found it exceptionally good.

In the end we wonder if it is a novel we are reading; is it not the Sunday newspaper?
GERALD SYKES

How Possible Is Peace?

The Causes of War. By Sir Arthur Salter and Others. A Publication of the World Conference for International Peace Through Religion. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

FOR a people who know a good deal about the consequences of war, we are singularly little interested in the causes of it. I doubt that there are ten thousand readers in the United States who have conscientiously studied any of the several excellent works on the outbreak of the World War. Consequently I have little hope that this brief notice will persuade many to look into "The Causes of War."

Of course, I do not mean to imply that this little book is a scripture. It is, indeed, far from perfect, and errs on the side of conventionality rather than the reverse. But all in all it is a good job, and never becomes as unrealistic in its discussions as the skeptical might suspect from the name of the group that published it. Several times in these pages I have inveighed against all religious and idealistic diatribes against war on the ground that they fail to place the emphasis where it belongs: they fail to take sufficient account of the fact that war is economic in basis and that peace must be economic likewise.

